OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning. The committee meets today to consider the nomination of former Senator Chuck Hagel to be Secretary of Defense.

Before we begin, I want to first welcome Senator Inhofe as the new ranking Republican on our committee, succeeding Senator McCain. Senator McCain has been a great partner over the last 6 years, and I thank him for all that he has done to get our bills enacted, for all of his leadership on a host of issues, for his support of the work of this committee, and for always keeping our hearings lively.

Senator Inhofe has shown his strong commitment to the national defense over his 20 years on this committee, and I know that we are going to work well together to continue the bipartisan tradition of the committee.

We're also pleased to welcome the eight Senators who are joining the committee this year, both those who are new to the Senate and those who are new to our committee—Senators Donnelly, Hirono, Kaine, and King on the Democratic side, and Senators Blunt, Cruz, Fischer, and Lee on the Republican side. You will all find that this is a wonderful committee where we work across party lines to support our troops and their families and their national defense mission.

I would also like to pause for a moment to offer my thanks and the thanks of our committee to Secretary Leon Panetta, who delayed his retirement and his return to California to serve our country first as Director of Central Intelligence and then as Secretary of Defense. Secretary Panetta has provided a steady hand at the Department of Defense (DOD) through 2 very difficult years, and has earned our great respect and our appreciation.

Finally before we get started, I would like to announce that the committee will be holding hearings next week on Benghazi and the week thereafter on the impact of the sequester on DOD.

Senator Hagel, we welcome you to the Senate Armed Services Committee and as an old friend of those of us with whom you served during your years in the Senate. There are few jobs that are more demanding than the position to which you have been nominated. The hours are long and extremely challenging, and require sacrifices from both the Secretary and his family.

We traditionally give our nominees an opportunity to introduce their families at these hearings, and we would welcome your doing so during your opening statement.

If confirmed, Senator Hagel would be the first former enlisted man and the first veteran of the Vietnam war to serve as Secretary of Defense. You cannot read Senator Hagel's account of his military service and not be impressed by it. As Senator Hagel explained a few years ago, "Probably most fundamental for me when we talk of going to war, we need to think it through carefully, not just for the political, and the geopolitical, and the diplomatic, and the economic consequences, and those are important. But at least for me," he said, "this old infantry sergeant thinks about when I was in Vietnam in 1968, someone needs to represent that perspective in our Government as well. The people in Washington make the policy, but it's the little guys who come back in the body bags."

Senator Hagel's background provides an invaluable perspective, not only with respect to the difficult decisions and recommendations that a Secretary of Defense must make regarding the use of force and the commitment of U.S. troops overseas, but also with respect to the day-to-day decisions that a secretary must make to ensure that our men and women in uniform and their families receive the support and assistance that they need and deserve.

It would be a positive message for our soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines in harm's way around the world to know that one of their own holds the highest office in DOD, and that he has their backs.

Senator Hagel, you would be in a position to make key recommendations regarding Afghanistan, where we are down to the pre-surge level of troops with 66,000 military personnel in the country. The Secretary of Defense is called upon to advise the President on the size and mission of a post-2014 residual force, and the pace of the drawdown between now and the end of 2014. The key to this transition is ensuring the readiness and ability of Afghanistan security forces to take over the defense of their own country. I have always believed that should be our main mission and its key to success.

During my trip to Afghanistan with Senator Jack Reed last month, we heard from U.S. commanders on the ground that Afghanistan security forces are operating on their own on most operations, including conducting more than 85 percent of operations with limited or no U.S. support in the difficult Regional Command East. Yet difficult obstacles remain to the process of reducing our forces and shifting responsibility to Afghanistan forces, including the difficulty of negotiating a status of forces agreement, including recent reports that the Afghanistan Government might slow down a successful program of growing and training the Afghanistan Local Police, and including questions about the current plan to reduce the size of the Afghanistan National Security Forces from 352,000 to around 230,000 after 2015.

We face a number of new and growing threats elsewhere in the world, such as the ongoing threat posed by Iran's nuclear weapons program and the increasingly destructive civil war in Syria with the risk that conflict could result in the loss of control over that country's substantial stockpile of chemical weapons. There's also the continuing instability in other countries affected by the Arab Spring, the growth of al Qaeda affiliates in ungoverned regions, including Yemen, Somalia, and North Africa, and the continued unpredictable behavior of a nuclear armed regime in North Korea.

We face these challenges at a time when the DOD budget is under a unique pressure as a result of cuts previously agreed upon by Congress, the budgeting by Continuing Resolution (CR), and the impending threat of a sequester. Secretary Panetta has said that a sequester would be devastating for our military. Senator Hagel's views today on the CR and the sequester will be of great interest to this committee and to the Nation.

Those of us who have served with Senator Hagel in the Senate know that he is a man who is not afraid to speak his mind. Senator Hagel has made a number of statements over the course of his career which committee members will ask him about during today's hearing. For example, Senator Hagel has stated that unilateral sanctions against Iran, "are exactly the wrong approach," and that, "they are the worst thing we can do would be to try to isolate Iran". I believe that while effective multilateral sanctions are preferable, that unilateral sanctions are an important part of the approach that the Obama administration has followed, and that Congress has supported. It appears that sanctions are producing tremendous pressure on Iran.

Another statement which has raised concern is Senator Hagel's recommendation that we conduct, "direct, unconditional, and comprehensive talks with the Government of Iran". Now while there is value in communicating with our adversaries, the formulation used by Senator Hagel seemed to imply a willingness to talk to Iran on some issues that I believe that most of us would view as non-negotiable, and, therefore, any willingness to talk to Iran would need to be highly conditional. Senator Hagel's reassurance to me in my office that he supports the Obama administration's strong stance against Iran is significant, and we look forward to hearing from Senator Hagel today in some depth on that subject.

We will also be interested in Senator Hagel's addressing troubling statements that he has made about Israel and its supporters here in the United States, a statement in 2008 that our policy of non-engagement with the Syrians, "has isolated us more than the Syrians," and a 2009 statement that "we should not isolate Hamas, a terrorist organization".

There is much to be explored at this hearing, but as we struggle with the difficult security challenges facing our Nation, the President needs to have a Secretary of Defense in whom he has trust, who will give him unvarnished advice, a person of integrity, and one who has a personal understanding of the consequences of decisions relative to the use of military force. Senator Hagel certainly has those critically important qualifications to lead DOD.

Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I would like to echo your remarks about Secretary Panetta and the work that he has done. I do not see him here today, but I do recall when he was first nominated, I was probably one of the first phone calls to him, and I have enjoyed working with him.

With Senator McCain, I feel the same way. I will certainly continue to depend on his counsel, and you and I have worked very well together in the past.

Mr. Chairman, before I continue my opening statement, I would like to raise a concern about the sufficiency of materials provided to this committee by our nominee. Senator Hagel was requested to provide the speeches he has delivered over the last 5 years, yet his initial submission was for only four speeches. Even though, as was noticed by Senator Cruz that he had honoraria for 12 speeches, but submitted 4 speeches. We received some more, but only late last night. I think it would have been a lot more helpful if we had received them before that, and I am hoping that we will be able to get that information before we have to cast votes on this nominee. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The President's nomination of Senator Hagel to serve as the next Secretary of Defense comes at a critical juncture in our military and national security interests. Senator Hagel is a good man who has a record of service. I first learned of that when he was first elected, and I have been a great admirer of the time that he spent in Vietnam and the sacrifices that he made.

While his service is commendable, the fate of his nomination should be decided by the totality of his record. It is the votes that he has cast, the statements that he has made over the many years of his career that will inform us as to his judgment, his view of America's role in the world, and his view of the military required to support that role.

As I told Senator Hagel in my office over 2 weeks ago, that after a long and careful review of his record, and there are things that he has said and there are things that I have personally experienced with him, that we are too philosophically opposed on the pressing issues facing our country, for me to support his nomination. Therefore, I told him I would not be supporting his nomination.

His record demonstrates what I view as a lack of steadfast opposition to policies that diminish U.S. power and influence throughout the world, as well as a recent trend of policy reversals that seem based on political expediency rather than on core beliefs.

On many of the security challenges facing U.S. interests around the world, Senator Hagel's record is deeply troubling and out of the mainstream. Too often, it seems, he is willing to subscribe to a worldwide view that is predicated on appeasing our adversaries while shunning our friends. I remember quoting Hiram Mann, who said, "No man survives when freedom fails, the best men rot in filthy jails, and those who cry 'appease, appease' are hanged by those they tried to please."

I am mentioning a few of these things because they are going to come out in this hearing. In 2000, an overwhelming majority of Senators sent a letter to President Clinton reaffirming our solidarity with Israel. I was one of them who carried that letter around. I remember it well. Senator Hagel was one of just four who refused to sign that letter, and I am sure he will want to comment about that.

In 2001, he was one of just two Senators who voted against a bill extending harsh sanctions against Iran. A year later, he urged the Bush administration to support Iran's membership in the World Trade Organization. Senator Hagel voted against a resolution designating Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corp, a group responsible for killing American soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, as a terrorist organization. On multiple occasions, he has advocated for direct negotiations with Iran, a regime that continues to repress its people, doggedly pursue a nuclear weapon capability, and employ terrorist proxies, including Hamas, Hezbollah, who threaten the security of Israel and the region.

Senator Hagel has also been an outspoken supporter of the nuclear disarmament and the Global Zero movement. We are very sensitive to that, and we know that the President has said many times he wants a nuclear free world, and I know that Senator Hagel is right there with him. But at a time when North Korea's belligerent actions threaten our allies with their nuclear capabilities and security of our own Nation and that of our allies, why would we want to unilaterally disarm ourselves of nuclear capability?

Of late, however, Senator Hagel has expressed views in meetings with Senate colleagues, I have been informed, and through the press that appear glaringly at odds with many of his long-held positions, particularly on issues dealing with Israel, Iran, and our nuclear arsenal. This apparent willingness to walk back or alter his position, possibly for the sake of political expediency on such important issues, is deeply troubling and sends a concerning message to our allies and adversaries alike.

Though I respect Senator Hagel, his record to date demonstrates that he would be a staunch advocate for the continuation of the misguided policies of the President's first term. Retreating from America's unique global leadership role and shrinking the military will not make America safer. On the contrary, it will embolden our enemies, endanger our allies, and provide opportunity for nations that do not share our interests to fill a global leadership vacuum we leave behind.

It is for these reasons that I believe that he is the wrong person to lead the Pentagon at this perilous and consequential time.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

We have two former chairmen of this committee with us to introduce Senator Hagel. No Senator has had two dearer friends or better mentors than I have had with Senators Nunn and Warner. I just want to welcome them back to this committee. I do not have to tell them that they are among dear, dear friends, those of us who have known them and who have worked with them. It is a real, real treat actually to welcome you back to the committee.

I think I will call on you, Senator Nunn, first. I think we will call on you alphabetically. I do not have any better way to do it. Sam, welcome back.

STATEMENT OF HON. SAM NUNN, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF GEORGIA, RETIRED

Senator NUNN. First, for the record, seniority and age are two different things. [Laughter.]

Chairman Levin, Ranking Member Inhofe, members of the Armed Services Committee, I am honored to join John Warner in presenting our friend, Chuck Hagel, to the committee and recommending that Chuck be confirmed as our Nation's 24th Secretary of Defense.

I think it is worth noting that 68 years ago this month, John Warner enlisted in the U.S. Navy to fight in World War II. That was the start of his great career of public service, and John, I am very proud to be here by your side.

Mr. Chairman, I spent a lot of my Senate career sitting in your seat waiting on a quorum. Congratulations on not having to do that today. [Laughter.]

Chairman LEVIN. I do not how long it will last, but thanks for pointing it out.

Senator NUNN. Mr. Chairman, I think it should be noted that you and Senator McCain have effectively guided this committee in its important role as a compelling and absolutely essential voice for a strong and effective defense. Together you have managed to pass authorization bills, even during contentious times. I thank you both for your dedicated service to our Nation. I am confident, Mr. Chairman and Senator Inhofe, that you will continue this tradition, and that Senator McCain will still be a very valuable member and voice on this committee.

I believe that our Nation is fortunate to have a nominee for Secretary of Defense with the character, the experience, the courage, and the leadership that Chuck Hagel would bring to this position. First, Chuck is acutely aware that even in an age of rapid technological advances, our military capability and effectiveness depend on the quality and the morale of the people who serve our Nation in uniform, as well as the families that support them.

Chuck received two Purple Hearts in Vietnam, and when he returned home, he continued to fight for veterans and for Active Duty military personnel. He knows that our people are our strongest assets. Second, Chuck's experience in Vietnam shaped his life and his perspective. War for Chuck Hagel is not an attraction. I am confident that if confirmed he will ask the hard and the smart questions before sending troops into battle.

Chuck Hagel knows that the United States has vital interests that are worth fighting for and dying for. He also knows that war should be a last resort and that our Nation must effectively use all of our tools, not limited only to our military, to protect our important and to protect our vital interests.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, there is a tension in these values, but it is a tension that we should welcome in the thought process and in the advice that our Secretary of Defense gives to our Commander in Chief and to this Congress.

From our service together on the Defense Policy Board in recent years, I know that Chuck Hagel has a clear world view, and that it aligns with the mainstream of U.S. foreign and defense policy, and also with President Obama. Chuck Hagel believes that we must build and preserve American strength as a force for good in the world. He recognizes that protecting our interests requires strong allies and friends, as well as strong American leadership.

Third, Chuck has the depth of experience and the leadership skills required to handle this tough job. There is certainly no shortage of security challenges around the world, as this committee knows, and as you have enumerated this morning, Mr. Chairman. A very large and impressive group of former Cabinet officials and public servants from both sides of the aisle have said that they trust Chuck Hagel with this important responsibility. I strongly agree.

Fourth, on the fiscal side, I am confident that Chuck will be a powerful advocate for a common sense approach, both within the administration and here on Capitol Hill regarding fiscal challenges to the defense budget. He understands that our defense capabilities are being threatened on two budget fronts: first, sequestration with its damaging across-the-board, upfront budget cuts, and second, rapidly rising costs within the Department's budget, including, but not limited to, health care, personnel, and retirement costs.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I believe that Chuck will work effectively with this committee and Congress in meeting these budget challenges while protecting our people, protecting our capabilities, and also while ensuring that the United States has the strongest military in the world.

Chuck Hagel was a soldier and a Senator, but he has been also a highly successful executive in both the public and private sectors. He built a successful company from the ground up. He is a man who knows how to prioritize, and he knows how to make tough decisions. He will listen to and carefully consider the views of our military and civilian leaders, and guide them as necessary.

Fifth, I believe that Chuck Hagel will be a balanced and responsible voice on nuclear weapons policy. President Reagan said it often and said it well: "a nuclear war cannot be won, and it must not be fought."

Mr. Chairman, as this committee knows, the risk of a global nuclear war has thankfully, substantially declined since the breakup of the Soviet Union. But with nine nations possessing nuclear weapons, with nuclear weapons usable material and knowledge spread across the globe, and with terrorists ready to use a nuclear weapon if they manage to buy, steal, or make one, we face enormous risk that a nuclear weapon will be used. If proliferation continues in countries like Iran and North Korea, and if we do not secure nuclear materials and weapons globally, the odds of use will go up even more.

Six years ago George Schultz, Bill Perry, Henry Kissinger, and I made the argument that we reduce reliance on nuclear weapons as a vital contribution to preventing that proliferation, keeping them out of dangerous hands, and ultimately ending them as a threat to the world. Two-thirds of living former Secretaries of State and Defense, and national security advisors have agreed with the vision and the steps that we outlined, including substantial work on verification and enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that all members of the committee and the Senate will read the recent statement by four credible and very experienced Americans—Ambassador Tom Pickering, Ambassador Richard Burt, General James Cartwright, and General John Sheehan—about their work with Chuck Hagel on nuclear weapons. They made it abundantly clear that they oppose unilateral moves. They support bilateral negotiations. They support verifiable U.S.-Russian arms reductions to be followed by multilateral negotiations, bringing other nuclear weapons countries into a serious and verifiable process of reductions.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, there are many essential characteristics and values that a Secretary of Defense should possess in our dangerous and challenging world. Let me name just two or three that I think are very important.

First, someone who is well-informed, has an open mind, engages in critical thinking, who is capable of and who seeks out independent thought. Second, someone who sets aside fixed ideologies and biases to honestly evaluate all options, and then provides his or her candid judgment to the President and to Congress. Third, someone who pays attention to people with the best ideas, regardless of their party affiliation. No one is perfect. We all know that. But Chuck Hagel comes as close as anyone I know to having all of these qualities.

Mr. Chairman, Senator Inhofe, and members of the committee, I served for 24 years on this important committee, and I recognize that much has changed since I retired 16 years ago. I continue to believe, however, that every major problem we face today requires the best input from both political parties if we are to arrive at a solution. I believe that Chuck Hagel will seek that input. I urge his support by this committee, and I urge the confirmation of his nomination by the U.S. Senate.

I thank the chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Nunn.

Senator Warner.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN WARNER, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF VIRGINIA, RETIRED

Senator WARNER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It is a moving experience for me to reenter this room. I served on this committee for 30 years. In that period of time, Senator Nunn was the chairman, and I was the ranking. But I want to say to you and Jim Inhofe—Jim and I have been good friends and we worked together not only on this committee, but other committees. You will be a splendid ranking member. You follow in the steps of my dear and valued friend of so many years, John McCain.

The leadership of this committee throughout my 30 years in the Senate has been drawn from the ranks of the strongest and the best of its membership. We have it today, and I have every reason we will have it tomorrow.

I would like to say a word to the new members of this committee. As I look back over a very fortunate record of public service for many years, no chapter of my career was more important than service on this committee. You will carry with you for the rest of your life the recollections of the work that you have done for one of America's most valued assets, the men and the women and their families of the armed services of the United States.

I have written out a nice long statement, and then last night late I received Sam Nunn's statement and Chuck Hagel's statement, and I said that I felt that another statement just would not do. I would rather say just a few words from the heart about the importance of what we have by way of decision before all of us today.

I thank Senator Nunn for that reference of 68 years ago in the Navy. I did no more than every other kid on my block. We all went. But I would like to remind you that a half century ago, you served in the Coast Guard. So, Grandpa, here is another grandpa. [Laughter.]

Good friends, we thank Chuck Hagel, and Mrs. Hagel, and his family because if confirmed, there is an enormous commitment by the family to this position. Having known Lilibet and slightly your children, you have made that decision to offer yourself for continued public service. Public service is a privilege. I have always regarded it as such.

I will not give a long statement. This statement by Senator Hagel will soon be shared with you. I read it through not once, twice, but again this morning. I say this carefully, I have read the statements that have been placed before the members of this committee for those 30 years. I have never read a more carefully prepared statement, a more forthright statement, and one that has no hedges or deviations. He hits firm on those issues that will make the decision in your minds and that of your colleagues as to whether or not he is qualified to take on this very important assignment.

I first entered the Pentagon in 1969 during the war in Vietnam under Melvin Laird. Jim Schlesinger followed, and I have worked with every Secretary of Defense since that period of time, all different, all with their strengths and indeed some of their weaknesses. But set forth in this is a series of commitments to you as a committee, to the members of the full Senate, and to the American public as precisely what his goals are and what he will do, how he will serve the President, how he will give the President his best advice. I know Chuck to give it very strongly.

I'm going to talk a little bit about Chuck Hagel, the man that I served with for 12 years. My distinguished colleague and longtime friend, Sam, had gone when Chuck arrived at the Senate. The first year he was here, we had the defense authorization bill on the floor. In those days, as it is today, that bill goes on that floor, that bill stays on that floor, sometimes a couple of days, sometimes a week, sometimes broken up, but we get it through. When it's done, we go immediately back to our committee spaces and begin to write that bill and get it to the printer so that we can go to conference. How many times have we done that together, Senator Nunn, Senator Levin, Senator McCain, Senator Inhofe, many times.

The first year he was here, he watched that process, and when I had taken the staff back to the committee room, surprisingly he showed up. I didn't know him that well, although I had studied his biography and I wanted to get to know him because of my deep and abiding interesting in the Vietnam period, having served for 5 years in that period as Under Secretary of the Navy.

He strolled into the room and I introduced him to the people. He said to the staff, you are one of the most impressive group of young people I've ever seen. I learned a lot. He shared some of histories as a simple, but elegant, soldier that he was. That is the way he started, and thereafter he voted for every single final passage of the authorization bill, every single final passage of the appropriation bill.

He was at home and learned in that generation of Vietnam, and I am so proud to have the affiliation of having been, yes, in comparative safety at the Pentagon. But I did go to the field of battle and see these young men and some women who engaged in that struggle. Chuck Hagel brings with him the experience of having come home to an America that was quite different than what I experienced when my generation came home from World War II. We were welcomed with open arms. America at that time in Vietnam, and how well John McCain can remember this, was very divided. When you wore your uniform back home, it did not receive the same respect that it deserved for the sacrifices that you and your colleagues had committed. Chuck will never forget that. I will never forget it. John will never forget it.

Today we welcome home and we do it with the fullest heart the young men and women who serve, but there have been times in history when that didn't happen, and that was one. That honed him to be prepared to take on his responsibilities as he addresses the declining budget situation, which is going to be a challenge. I am absolutely certain that he will stand up and fight as hard as two of his predecessors—Leon Panetta you mentioned today, and Robert Gates. They gave their President loyalty, but they gave him their best advice and tough advice, and fought for their troops, and drilled down to what they have to maintain whatever budget. Sequester is not the route. But whatever budget, he will maintain morale and combat readiness. Also, ladies and gentlemen, that pillar of strength of our military system, the All-Volunteer Force.

We had drafts in Vietnam. We saw the effect of that. We decided as a Nation to take a gamble, to let every person who wished to wear the uniform, giving that opportunity and to volunteer. No one is forced in there. That has to be maintained. This man has the experience, gravitas, and the strength to protect the All-Volunteer Force.

I also was deeply impressed by the Senate and the manner in which it confirmed John Kerry. John Kerry was also in that generation, and he served his trials and tribulations, and came home and faced that public in the same way Chuck did. The Senate confirmed him with a very strong vote. They sent him away ready to take on the enormity of his responsibility.

Now I mention that because in my experience, I have seen a good deal of camaraderie, but a good deal of competition between the Secretaries of Defense and the Secretaries of State. It is just sort of built in there, and sometimes a lot of sand gets in that gear box. But it is important to the United States that they, having the major jurisdiction over most of the policy issues, work as a team.

John Kerry and Chuck Hagel are a band of brothers out of Vietnam with that special bond, and I am sure that you will utilize that and remember it, and make those two departments performs their functions to best serve the President and to best serve the country.

I have pretty well said everything I should say. I want to be brief because it is important that this committee pursue its work. But again, Bob Gates, Leon Panetta set the bar for this century of those who take on this job. You mentioned your long friendships, Chuck, and how you know both. I would keep close contact. They have the experience to deal with this President of the United States, and you are the President's choice.

Folks, there is an old saying in the combat Army infantry and Marine Corps. "Certain men are asked to take the point," which means to get out and lead in the face of the enemy. Chuck Hagel did that as a sergeant in Vietnam. If confirmed, Chuck Hagel will do it again, this time not before a platoon, but before every man and woman and their families in the armed services. You will lead them. They will know in their hearts we have one of our own.

You are on your own, and good luck.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you. [Laughter.]

Chairman LEVIN. We thank you both, Senator Warner, Senator Nunn, for your extraordinarily powerful introductions. I just wish every member of the Senate and every American could have heard, and I hope will hear and read about what you said here today about Chuck Hagel. I also noticed there is another former Senator, who was a member of that band of brothers, who is with us today. I just noticed in the audience Max Cleland is here, and I want to welcome you, Max, too, as an old, old friend of this committee, and the Senate, and of the Nation.

Let me now call on Senator Hagel. Senator Warner, Senator Nunn, again, thank you for your introductions, and you are free to get back to your lives or to stay as you wish.

Senator Hagel.

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES T. HAGEL, TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Chairman Levin, Ranking Member Inhofe, and distinguished members of the committee. I am honored to come before you today as the President's nominee to be the Secretary of Defense.

First, as you suggested, Mr. Chairman, let me introduce my family—my wife, Lilibet. Our son Ziller, and our daughter, Allyn, are not with us today. Our son, Ziller, claims he's taking a test. We will confirm that later. But both are a son and daughter that Lilibet and I are very proud of. I think like any proud father and any proud mother, you all know how I feel about that as you have the same feelings about your children. It is the same way Lilibet and I feel about ours.

I also want to introduce my brother, Tom, who served with me in Vietnam, my brother, Mike, who is our number three brother, and I might add, who actually possesses any talent our family has. He has in the Pentagon 10 paintings as Chairman of the Air Force Artist Guild over the years, and they are hanging in different locations in the Pentagon. We have one brother of some acclaim, and one of us did make it, my brother, Mike. Mike's son is sitting behind him, Josh. He is one of three children that Mike has.

We have here also cousins, many friends, and people I owe money to. [Laughter.]

Who knows who else since I have received some publicity over the weeks.

I want to also thank my friends, Sam Nunn and John Warner. I want to thank them for their support, their encouragement, and their friendship over many years. As each of you who had the privilege of serving with those Senators, I, too, add my thanks for their tremendous service to our country. These two distinguished Americans represent what is best about American public service and responsible bipartisanship. They have embodied both in their careers, long distinguished careers, and are models for each of us.

Of course to my family and friends, and my fellow veterans who are here, as has been noted, Max Cleland, Jan Scruggs, good friends, veterans from all wars, who are here today who I worked with for many, many years. I am grateful to them. Not just to those friends, and supporters, and fellow veterans who are here, but those who are not, thank you.

A life is only as good as the family and the friends you have and the people you surround yourself with. I also want to thank my friend, Leon Panetta, for his tremendous service to our country over so many years. If I am given the privilege of succeeding him, it will be a high honor.

President Obama for his confidence and trust in me, I thank him. I am humbled by the opportunity and the possibility he has given me to serve our country once again. I fully recognize the immense responsibilities of the Secretary of Defense. I assured the President that if I am confirmed by the U.S. Senate, I will always do my best. I will always do my best for our Nation and for the men and women and their families, who are called on to make the enormous sacrifices of military service. Their safety, success, and welfare will always be at the forefront of the decisions I make.

I also assured the President that I would always provide him with my most honest and informed advice. I make that same commitment to this committee and to Congress. If confirmed, I will reach out to the members of this committee for advice and collaboration. It will be a partnership because the national security challenges America faces require it.

Our Nation's security is the highest priority of our leaders and our Government. We cannot allow the work of confronting the great threats we face today to be held hostage to partisanship on either side of the aisle, or by differences between the bodies represented in Articles I and II of our Constitution. The stakes are too high. Men and women of all political philosophies, and parties, and ideas die and fight for our country. As this committee knows so well, protecting our national security or committing our Nation to war can never become political litmus tests.

I know Secretary Panetta has put a strong emphasis on reaching out to Congress. I, like Leon, come from Congress, and respect and understand this institution's indispensable role in setting policy and helping govern our country.

We are all products of the forces that shape us. For me, there has been nothing more important in my life, or a more defining influence on my life, than my family. Whether it was helping my mother raise four boys after my father, a World War II veteran who died suddenly at age 39 on Christmas Day, or serving side by side with my brother Tom in Vietnam, or the wonderful miracle of my wife Lilibet and me being blessed with two beautiful children. That is who I am.

We each bring to our responsibilities frames of reference. These frames of reference are formed by our life's experiences. They help instruct our judgments. We build out from those personal foundations by continually informing ourselves, listening, and learning.

Like each of you, I have a record, a record that I am proud of. I am proud of my record not because of any accomplishments I may have achieved, or certainly because of an absence of mistakes, but rather because I have tried to build that record by living my life and fulfilling my responsibilities as honestly as I knew how and with hard work. Underpinning everything I have done in my life was the belief that we must always be striving to make our Nation a better and more secure place for all of our people.

During the 12 years I had the privilege of serving the people of Nebraska in the U.S. Senate, I cast over 3,000 votes and hundreds of committee votes. I have also given hundreds of interviews and speeches and written a book. As you all know, I am on the record. I am on the record on many issues.

But no one individual vote, no one individual quote, no one individual statement defines me, my beliefs, or my record. My overall world view has never changed: that America has and must maintain the strongest military in the world, that we must lead the international community to confront threats and challenges together, and take advantage of opportunities together; that we must use all our tools of American power to protect our citizens and our interests. I believe, and I always have believed, that America must engage in the world, not retreat from the world, but engage with the world. My record is consistent on these points.

It is clear that we are living at a defining time. Our Nation is emerging from over a decade of war. We have brought our men and women in uniform home from Iraq, and have started to bring them home from Afghanistan.

That does not mean that the threats we face and will continue to face are any less dangerous or complicated. In fact, it is quite the opposite. Recent events in Mali and Algeria remind us clearly of this reality. The 21st century complexities, technologies, economies, and threats are bringing the 7 billion global citizens closer together than ever before. As our planet adds another 2 billion people over the next 25 years, the dangers, complications, and human demands will not be lessened, but rather heightened.

Despite these challenges, I believe we also have historic opportunities to help build a safer, more prosperous, more secure, more hopeful, and more just world than maybe any time in history of man, for all people. Yes, the curse of intolerance, hatred, and danger exists around the world, and we must continue to be clear-eyed about this danger, and we will be. We will not hesitate to use the full force of the U.S. military in defense of our security. But we must also be smart, and, more importantly, wise, wise in how we employ all of our Nation's great power.

America's continued leadership and strength at home and abroad will be critically important for our country and the world. While we will not hesitate to act unilaterally when necessary, it is essential that we work closely with our allies and partners to enhance America's influence and security, as well as global security. If confirmed, I will continue to build on the efforts of this administration and of former Secretary Gates, Secretary Panetta, and Secretary Clinton to strengthen our alliances and partnerships around the world. I will also look forward to working with my former Senate colleague—your colleague—and our friend, John Kerry, in this pursuit.

As I told the President, I am committed to his positions on all issues of national security, specifically decisions that DOD is in the process of implementing now. This includes the Defense Strategic Guidance the President outlined in January 2012. Allow me to very briefly address a few of those specific issues now.

First, we have a plan in place to transition out of Afghanistan, continue bringing our troops home, and end the war, which has been the longest war, as we all know, in America's history. As you also know, discussions are ongoing about what the U.S. presence in Afghanistan will look like after 2014. The President has made clear, and I agree, that there should be only two functions for U.S. troops that remain in Afghanistan after 2014: counterterrorism, particularly to target al Qaeda and its affiliates, training, and advising Afghan forces. It is time we forge a new partnership with Afghanistan, with its government and, most importantly, with its people.

Second, as the Secretary of Defense, I will ensure we stay vigilant and keep up the pressure on terrorist organizations as they try to expand their affiliates around the world, in places like Yemen, Somalia, and North Africa. At the Pentagon, that means continuing to invest in and build the tools to assist in that fight, such as Special Operations Forces and new intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance technologies. It will mean working hand-in-hand with our partners here at home across the National Security and Intelligence Communities to confront these and other threats, especially the emerging threat—the very dangerous and real threat of cyber warfare.

Third, as I have made clear, I am fully committed to the President's goal of preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, and I have been on record on that issue. As I have said in the past many times, all options must be on the table to achieve that goal.

My policy has always been the same as the President's, one of prevention, not of containment. The President has made clear that is the policy of our Government. As Secretary of Defense, I will make sure the Department is prepared for any contingency. That is my job. That is my responsibility. I will ensure our friend and ally Israel maintains its qualitative military edge in the region, and will continue to support systems like Iron Dome, which is today saving Israeli lives from terrorist rocket attacks. That support I have always made clear and been on the record for.

Fourth, while we pursue the reductions in our deployed stockpiles and launchers consistent with the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), I am committed to maintaining a modern, strong, safe, ready, and effective nuclear arsenal. America's nuclear deterrent over the last 35 years has played a central role in ensuring global security and the avoidance of world war III. I have been committed to that. My record is clear on that. I am committed to modernizing our nuclear arsenal.

As we emerge from this decade of war, we must also broaden our Nation's focus overseas as we look at future threats and challenges. As this committee knows, that is why DOD is rebalancing its resources towards the Asia-Pacific region. We are in the process of modernizing our defense posture across the entire region to defend and deepen our partnerships with traditional allies, especially Japan, South Korea, and Australia, to continue to deter and defend against provocations from states like North Korea, as well as non-state actors, and to expand our networks of security cooperation throughout the region to combat terrorism, counter proliferation, provide disaster relief, fight piracy, and ensure maritime security.

I will continue this rebalancing even as we continue to work closely—closely—with our long-time allies of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and our friends, and with allies, and partners, and friends in other regions of the world. At the same time, we will continue to focus on challenges in the Middle East and North Africa where we have clear national interests. Rather, it is a recognition that the United States has been and always will be a Pacific power, and the Asian-Pacific area is increasingly vital to America's security and economic interests. That is why we must become even more engaged in the region over the coming years.

Doing all of this and much more will require smart and strategic budget decisions. I have made it clear I share Leon Panetta's and our Service Chiefs' serious concerns about the impact sequestration would have on our Armed Forces. As someone who has run businesses, I know that the uncertainty and turbulence of the current budget climate makes it much more difficult to manage the Pentagon's resources and our national security. If confirmed, I am committed to effectively and efficiently using every single taxpayer's dollar the right way, to maintaining the strongest military in the world, and to working with Congress to ensure the Department has the resources it needs, and that the disposition of those resources is accountable.

Even as we deal with difficult budget decisions, I will never break America's commitment to our troops, our veterans, and our military families. We will continue to invest in the well-being of our All-Volunteer Force. Working with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) and other institutions, we will make sure our troops and their families get the health care, job opportunities, and education they have earned and deserve, just as I did when I co-authored the post-9/11 GI Bill with Senators Jim Webb, Frank Lautenberg, and John Warner. This includes focusing on the mental health of our fighting force, because no one who volunteers to fight and die for this country should ever feel like that they have nowhere to turn. That is unacceptable in this country.

In my 12 years in the Senate, my one guiding principle on every security decision I made and every vote I cast was always this—simply this: Is our policy worthy of our troops and their families and the sacrifices that we ask them to make? That same question will guide me if I am confirmed as Secretary of Defense.

Our men and women in uniform and their families must never doubt that their leaders' first priority is them. I believe my record of leadership on veterans issues over the years, going back to my service in the Veterans Administration under President Reagan, demonstrates my rock-solid commitment to our veterans and their families.

We must always take care of our people. That is why I will work to ensure that everyone who volunteers to fight for this country has the same rights and same opportunities. As I have discussed with many of you in our meetings, I am fully committed to implementing the repeal of Don't Ask, Don't Tell, and doing everything possible under current law to provide equal benefits to the families of all our servicemembers and their families.

I will work with the Service Chiefs as we officially open combat positions to women, a decision I strongly support. I will continue the important work that Leon Panetta has done to combat sexual assault in the military. Maintaining the health and well-being of those who serve is critical to maintaining a strong and capable military, because an institution's people must always come first.

As we look ahead to the coming years, we have an extraordinary opportunity now at this moment to define what is next for America's military and our country. It is incumbent upon all of us to make decisions that will ensure our Nation is prepared to confront any threat we may face in the future, protect our citizens, and remain the greatest force for good in the world.

If confirmed as Secretary of Defense, it will be my great honor, working with the President, this committee, Congress, and our military, to ensure our policies are worthy of the service and sacrifice of America's men and women.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Hagel. Here is what the plan is now for the hearing. We will have a first round of 8 minutes each. We have a vote that is scheduled for 12:15 p.m. We are going to work through that vote, and we are also going to work through lunch, which means that we would ask you to vote some time during that 12:15 p.m. vote and come back for those of you who have not had your turn yet.

There are five votes at 2:15 p.m. I hope that we can complete our first round by 2 p.m. or 2:15 p.m. so that we could then have a late lunch at 2:15 p.m. during those five votes. We would then come back perhaps an hour later. We would ask those who have not had a turn, if that is the case, or during our second round, that to begin our second round that you on the final vote, vote early and then come back so we can start as quickly as possible around 3:15 p.m. or 3:30 p.m., I would assume, to either complete the first round if it has not been completed, or to begin our second round.

Because of the time crunch, we have standard questions which we ask of all nominees. I am going to ask those at a later time during this hearing, but we will ask them. Again, I think that we hope to finish today. We will leave the record open for questions. But our goal would be to finish today no matter how long it takes today, then to have the record open for questions.

Let us now begin our first round of 8 minutes.

Senator Hagel, you have made reference to the looming sequester. We received a letter signed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff relative to sequester which says that we are on the brink of creating a hollow force due to an unprecedented convergence of budget conditions and legislation. They have talked about the readiness crisis which would result: grounding aircraft, returning ships to port, stop driving combat vehicles, training, and so forth.

You have spoken very briefly about your agreeing in general with the impact. Would you expand on the impact of that sequester from your perspective?

Senator HAGEL. Mr. Chairman, I think the Service Chiefs have laid it out rather directly, plainly, as Secretary Panetta has. As recently as 2 or 3 days ago, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, Ash Carter, in an interview went into some detail.

The fact is, the bottom line if sequester would occur, it is not just a reduction in a significant amount of dollars that would occur, but it would be a convergence of taking the flexibility, the projection, the management, the future, away from those who are responsible for managing our budget. Furloughing civilian employees would have to occur. You listed an inventory of consequences; of cutting back on flying time, training, steaming. These are real consequences that would occur.

I know the Pentagon, the Chiefs, those who have responsibility for managing every department of this 3 million person operation, security institution, are preparing for the worst. But make no mistake, this is not an exaggeration. When managers are not given the flexibility, and the opportunity, and the tools to manage with complete uncertainty as to what is ahead, that is disaster.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. On the question of Iran and the use of force, the President has said that Iran's leaders should understand that President Obama does not have a policy of containment. He has a policy to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, that he has made clear that he will not hesitate, in his words, to use force when it is necessary to defend the United States and its interests. Do you agree with President Obama's position that, "all options should be on the table," to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon?

Senator HAGEL. I do. I have, and I strongly agree with him.

Chairman LEVIN. On Iranian sanctions, President Obama has said that the sanctions which have been put in place are crippling the economy of Iran. I happen to agree. Their currency has dropped 80 percent. Oil production has plunged. Their economy is in a shambles. Do you share the President's views on the importance and effectiveness of sanctions against Iran? If so, how do you reconcile your position with some of your past statements that suggest that the national security of the United States is not served by isolating Iran?

Senator HAGEL. First, I have always agreed with multilateral sanctions because I think they have an effect. I think this President, in particular, has probably done more than any president to effectively employ those kinds of international sanctions starting with a United Nations (U.N.) Security Council agreement and U.N. mandates. I agree with what the President is doing. I have said publicly, incidentally long before the President ever asked me to consider this job, that additional sanctions might be required.

As to my record on votes in the Senate regarding unilateral sanctions, I have differed on some of those. I have voted for some as well. It was always on a case-by-case basis. When I voted against some of those unilateral sanctions on Iran, it was a different time. For example, I believe one was in 2001. We were at a different place with Iran during that time. Matter of fact, I recall the Bush administration did not want a renewal of the 5-year renewal of the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA) during that time because they weren't sure of the effectiveness of sanctions.

That was not the only reason I voted against it. It was because I thought that there might be other ways to employ our vast ability to harness power and allies. It was never a question of did I disagree with the objective. The objective was, I think, very clear to both of us.

I recall, for example, in 2008, Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice sending a letter to the Chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Max Baucus, requesting that a sanctions resolution unilateral in the Finance Committee not come out of the Finance Committee because the Bush administration at the time was working with the Russians specifically, but with the Security Council of the United Nations to try to get international sanctions, which I think that effort, by the way, in 2008, led to the 2010 international sanctions.

Chairman LEVIN. Can you give us your view on the size of the U.S. force which might be necessary or would be necessary after 2014, the so-called residual force, if you have an opinion on the size? You indicated in your opening statement two missions for that residual force.

Can you also give us your opinion about the size of the Afghanistan National Security Force after 2014, and whether you agree with me, and Senator Graham on this committee, and others that we ought to reconsider the position that the Afghanistan National Security Force should be reduced by a third starting in 2014 to about 230,000 from what its current goal is, which is about 350,000.

Senator HAGEL. As you all know, General Allen has presented his options to the President for the President's consideration. As far as I know, as of this morning, the President had not made a decision on what a residual force, numbers wise, would look like. I have not been included in those discussions, so I do not know, other than knowing that he has a range of options, as you do.

But I would say that from what the President has told me, what Secretary Panetta has told me, that decision will be made to assure resourcing the mission and the capability of that mission.

As to what kind of a force structure should eventually be in place by the Afghans, I do not know enough about the specifics to give you a good answer, other than to say that I think that has to be a decision that is made certainly with the President of Afghanistan, what we can do to continue to support, train, and protect our interests within the scope of our ability to do that. Obviously the immunity for our troops is an issue, which was an issue in Iraq. All those considerations will be important and will be made. If I am confirmed and in a position to give the President on that, I will with consultation of our commanders on the ground and our Service Chiefs giving the best options that we can provide.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you review that question of the size of the Afghanistan force with an open mind if you are confirmed?

Senator HAGEL. I will because I think we have to.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hagel, my first question is not to be responded as to explaining the position. I want to state the position or restate the position on five things that I mentioned in my opening statement, and merely to ask you if these are accurate reflections of things that happened in the past.

The first one is in 2007, you voted against the designating of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corp as a terrorist organization. The second thing in 2006, you were 1 of 12 Senators who refused to petition the European Union (EU) to identify Hezbollah as a terrorist group. Third, in November 2003, you failed to vote on a Syria accountability act authorizing sanctions on Syria for its support of terrorism and occupation of Lebanon. Fourth, in 2001, you were one of only two Senators that year to vote against renewal of the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act. Lastly, in 2001, you were one of four Senators who refused to sign the letter supporting Israel. Are those accurate?

Senator HAGEL. Let's start with the——

Senator INHOFE. No, I just want to know if these are votes that took place. Do you agree that those votes took place?

Senator HAGEL. I want to ask about the letter that you just noted in your fifth point, what was the date in the letter?

Senator INHOFE. The date?

Senator HAGEL. You said I refused to sign a letter.

Senator INHOFE. It was October 2001.

Senator HAGEL. A letter to——

Senator INHOFE. Okay, skip that one. Are the other ones true? [Laughter.]

Senator HAGEL. It is very important, Senator, that we——

Senator INHOFE. It is very important because I was holding the letter at the time that we were gathering signatures.

Senator HAGEL. I see. On the 2008 question regarding designating the Revolutionary Guard as a terrorist organization, I did vote against it.

Senator INHOFE. I am sorry, and I do not want to be rude. You and I are very good friends, but I know that my time is going to expire. Others are going to ask you why you did this. I was asking for the accuracy, and you do not want to answer that, that is fine.

Senator HAGEL. No, I just said I did vote against it, and I was going to explain why I voted against it.

Senator INHOFE. I know, and they will be asking you for your explanation. I want to get to three other things, and that is why it is critical that we keep moving along here.

One of the criticisms I have had of this administration is the lack of priority and funding for the military. While they have increased the deficit by $5.3 trillion in 4 years, the only major part of the budget that has decreased has been the military.

Now, that is something that is pretty well known. A lot of people do not like that idea. The thing that bothers me just as much is putting another agenda under the military budget. For example, you have heard Senator McCain, and me, and others talk about the fact that the Navy paid for 450,000 gallons of fuel, some $26 a gallon that you can get on the market for $3. The Air Force, the same thing, except that it is $59 a gallon.

The question I would have of you is just a commitment that if you are confirmed, will you confine the dollars that we are going to spend in the defense budget for defense purposes, for warfighting purposes?

Senator HAGEL. Of course I will because that is the intent of our budget and DOD.

Senator INHOFE. Good. I appreciate that very much. There was an article the other day in the Washington Post by Jennifer Rubin called "Our Dimwitted State Department". It was kind of an interesting article. There are four questions that I am going to ask that you respond for the record. For people who do not know what that is, that means later on in writing.

The questions that I liked that she asked were, did the sale of the F–16s encourage Mohamed Morsi to crack down on his people? Number two, had we known he would crack, would we still have sent the weaponry? Number three, how will we respond to Morsi's anti-democratic moves and the rise in violence against Christians in Egypt, or, as will likely be the case, a failure to live up to Egypt's security obligations regarding Gaza? Four, have we miscalculated the Muslim Brotherhood? That would be for the record.

Question. Did the sale of the F–16s encourage Morsi to crack down on his people?

Answer. I do not believe that there is a correlation between the sale of F–16s and the recent violence in Egypt. The F–16 aircraft has been a key component of the U.S. defense relationship with the Egyptian Armed Forces (EAF) for the last 30 years. The EAF have been a reliable partner during Egypt's transition, and provided security to reinforce Egyptian Ministry of Interior forces during elections and when called upon by President Morsi during the recent protests in the Suez Canal governorates. I believe it is in U.S. interests to maintain our defense relationship with Egypt. Working together to maintain the U.S.-Egypt defense relationship is also in the interest of Israel. It is critical that the U.S. Government continues to assist with the professionalization and the building of EAF capabilities to enable border security, participate in regional missions, and continue Egypt's role as a pillar of regional stability.

Question. Had we known he would crack down, would we still have sent the weaponry?

Answer. I cannot speak for the administration, but as I stated, I do not believe that there is a direct linkage between the sale of F–16s and the recent unrest in Egypt. I join U.S. and foreign leaders in condemning the recent violence. It is clear that a large number of Egyptian citizens are frustrated with the direction and pace of political and economic reform. It is critical that all stakeholders, government and opposition, work to address their frustrations and concerns peacefully and through dialogue.

Question. How will we respond to Morsi's anti-democratic moves and the rise in violence against Christians in Egypt, or as will likely be the case, a failure to live up to Egypt's security obligations regarding Gaza?

Answer. If confirmed, I will take every opportunity to call for a transparent, inclusive political process grounded in universal rights, the rule of law, and respect for the rights of women and religious minorities. The United States maintains the ability to halt assistance to Egypt if it is determined that there are major reversals in Egypt's democratic transition, a severe degradation in the rule of law, or changes in Egypt's foreign or military policy that directly threaten U.S. interests, including any changes to the Treaty of Peace with Israel.

I will also be clear with Egyptian leaders that Sinai security remains a serious concern, which poses risk to Egypt's internal stability as well as the security of Egypt's neighbor Israel. Restoring Sinai security requires consistent action against violent groups acting in the Sinai and weapons smuggling into Gaza. If confirmed, I will look for opportunities to provide U.S. security assistance through training and border security equipment to assist Egypt in addressing this shared security objective, as well as consistently engage senior Egyptian leaders on Sinai security.

Question. Have we miscalculated the Muslim Brotherhood?

Answer. No. We are clear-eyed about the Egyptian leadership; the fact is that the Freedom and Justice Party—the political arm of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood—won a majority of votes in Egypt's presidential elections. President Morsi has publicly committed to upholding Egypt's international obligations, including the Peace Treaty with Israel. We need to hold him to these commitments, as he attempts to lead Egypt's political transition and democratic consolidation, address Egypt's rapidly deteriorating economy, and develop sustainable civil-military relations. President Morsi, as the democratically elected leader of Egypt, has a special responsibility to build national consensus and strengthen Egypt's democracy. In my view, U.S. support through economic and security assistance, as well as consistent engagement, is critical so that Egypt will continue to serve as a pillar of regional stability and peace.

Question. Do you support a third site of ground-based interceptor? It would be on the east coast somewhere.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the analysis Congress requested in section 221 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 to evaluate additional missile defense locations in the United States, including on the east coast, will be delivered on a timely basis, and that Congress remains informed about the Department's analysis about how to best protect the U.S. Homeland.

Senator INHOFE. In the area of the Global Zero policy, you and I talked about that in my office. Others have talked about it. We are very much concerned.

When I heard Senator Warner and others talk about what used to be the case, the problem, in terms of nuclear capability, we used to be talking about Russia and the United States. It is not true anymore. Our intelligence has told us since 2007 that Iran will have that nuclear capability and a delivery system by 2015, so it is other countries that are involved in that.

The question I would ask you, in your book you wrote that, "We must once again convince the world that America has a clear intention of fulfilling the nuclear disarmament commitments that we have made." Then a bit more recently you said, "I believe that providing necessary resources for nuclear modernization of the triads should be a national priority." Do you stand by your last statement?

Senator HAGEL. My last statement was——

Senator INHOFE. Your last statement is saying that, "I believe that providing the necessary resources for nuclear modernization of the triads should be a national priority."

Senator HAGEL. Absolutely it should be, and I agree with that. That is what the policy of this administration is.

Senator INHOFE. I am merely bringing out the inconsistency because when you were involved with supporting the Global Zero or whatever the organization was, their declaration is, "We, the undersigned believe that to protect our children, our grandchildren, our civilization from the threat of nuclear catastrophe, we must eliminate all nuclear weapons globally. We, therefore, commit to working for a legally binding verifiable agreement, including all nations, to eliminate nuclear weapons by a date certain."

Senator HAGEL. The position of Global Zero, my position, some of the individuals—national security leaders, as Senator Nunn talked about, including himself, has never been unilateral disarmament, ever. Never. We have over the years, which I have supported, the United States has led the efforts to reducing nuclear warheads. There was no more significant voice for that than Ronald Reagan when he laid before Secretary General Gorbachev in 1986 a rather bold plan. In fact, I believe, paraphrasing President Reagan, we must eliminate nuclear warheads from the face of the planet. I believe he said something to that effect.

Global Zero has been very clear on this. Their effort is in line with every major national leader in the world, including President Obama, to continue to try to make an effort to reduce our nuclear warheads. But in a dangerous world, nuclear arsenals and our containment policy, which I mentioned in my statement, has been critically important. We are not going to unilaterally disarm.

Verifiable. It has to be bilateral. It has to be negotiated, as all our treaties have been.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Senator Hagel, but the reason I mentioned the mission statement is that is the group that you belong to. We can talk about that later. You may want to expand on that for the record.

My time has expired, but I have one last question I would like to ask, and that is, given that Iran—"The people"—and I am quoting right now—"from Iran, people of the Middle East, the Muslim region, and North Africa, people of these regions hate America from the bottom of their heart." It further said, "Israel is a cancerous tumor in the heart of the Islamist world." It further said, "Iran's warriors are ready and willing to wipe Israel off the map."

The question I would like to ask you, and you can answer for the record if you would like, is, why do you think that the Iranian foreign ministry so strongly supports your nomination to be the Secretary of Defense?

Senator HAGEL. I have a difficult enough time with American politics. Senator, I have no idea. But thank you, and I will be glad to respond further for the record.

Question. The question I would like to ask you, and you can answer for the record if you would like, is, why do you think that the Iranian foreign ministry so strongly supports your nomination to be the Secretary of Defense?

Answer. While I cannot speak to the motivations of the Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson behind making those statements, there should be no doubt that I fully support and—if confirmed—will faithfully execute the President's multi-vector strategy towards Iran. This strategy has included tough-minded diplomacy, crippling sanctions, and serious contingency planning with the objective of preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Reed.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

First, I would ask unanimous consent that several letters of support, including one from 13 former Secretaries of Defense, Secretaries of State, and National Security advisors, strongly endorsing Senator Hagel's nomination, be placed in the record.

Chairman LEVIN. It will be placed in the record.

- Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America (IAVA)
  "Without Senator Hagel's leadership in Washington, there would not be a Post-9/11 G.I. Bill." "Senator Hagel has always been a strong advocate for veterans; at the Department of Defense, there is no doubt he will continue that legacy. Time and time again, from Vietnam to the VA to the USO, Senator Hagel has answered his country's call to serve, demonstrating courage, character and resolve at every turn. We encourage the Senate to approve his nomination swiftly." – Paul Rieckhoff, Founder and Chief Executive Officer

- AMVETS
  AMVETS National Commander Cleve Geer endorsed President Barack Obama's nomination of Chuck Hagel as the next Secretary of Defense. "AMVETS fully supports President Obama's nomination of Chuck Hagel for the future Secretary of Defense," said Geer. "As a veterans service organization, AMVETS' main mission is to serve as an advocate for veterans, their families and the community in which they live. I am confident that former Sen. Hagel will utilize his experience and understanding of America's military to lead this nation's troops and the Department of Defense."

- VoteVets.org
  VoteVets' petition for Hagel was signed by over 8000 veterans and military families. "Senator Hagel is a tremendous pick for Secretary of Defense, who I know very well, and I have little doubt that he will serve President Obama with distinction – both as a voice of reason within the administration, and as a faithful advocate for carrying out the policies of the Commander in Chief. When it is all said and done, we will be talking about him as one of the finest Secretaries of Defense we've ever had." – Jon Soltz, Founder and Chairman

- Military Officers Association of America (MOAA)
  "While MOAA does not endorse or oppose specific candidates for elected of appointed office, we believe Sen. Hagel is certainly a candidate who is fully qualified for appointment to this extremely important position. MOAA's past work with Sen. Hagel has been very positive, and we believe he brings an important sensitivity to the human side of budget and operational considerations. His experience as a combat-wounded Vietnam veteran, as Deputy Administrator of the VA and his two terms in the Senate provide a range of perspectives that would serve any Secretary of Defense well. MOAA previously recognized Sen. Hagel's efforts to protect the interests of military beneficiaries with our Arthur T. Marix Congressional Leadership Award. [...] MOAA does not believe cabinet nominees should be held hostage to political litmus tests." – Admiral Norbert R. Ryan, Jr., USN (Ret.), President

- Non Commissioned Officers Association of the USA (NCOA)
"NCOA strongly supports the appointment of The Honorable Chuck Hagel to be Secretary of Defense [...] His military service including being twice wounded in action has instilled the values of service and personal sacrifice and for which he knows well the human cost of war. He has been an advocate for Soldiers, Marines, Sailors, Airmen, and Coasties to ensure the training and equipage of America's 21st Century Military Force to coincide with a solid revised Defense posture to meet conventional and unconventional world challenges. Senator Hagel has also championed personnel issues relating to combat dwell time, force protection, transition issues including electronic medical issues, preparation for future employment and training, veterans benefits including enhancements to Post 9/11 educational benefits. He also recognizes the value and sacrifice of families of the men and women who serve in this nation's Uniformed Services." – Richard C. Schneider, Executive Director for Government Affairs

- Vietnam Veterans of America (VVA)
"We like Hagel. We think he's a great guy, and having a combat veteran in there would be a good thing," Vietnam Veterans of America President John Rowan said.

- The American Legion
"[Hagel] is a longtime member of the Legion; he joined right after he returned from Vietnam. He's a longtime advocate for veterans in the VA and especially for veterans exposed to Agent Orange. Our organization has consulted with him among others on various national security matters. Having said that, the American Legion is prohibited by our congressional charter... from endorsing any candidate for elected or appointed office." – John Raughter, communications director for the American Legion

- Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund
"I first met Mr. Hagel in 1981, when he was the No. 2 man at the Veterans Administration. He had just thrown out of his office some people who were demanding that he stop his support for Maya Lin's design for the Vietnam Veterans Memorial. His integrity and toughness were impressive then. Both qualities have grown since. Long before he became a senator, Mr. Hagel was an infantryman in Vietnam. He fought the enemy up close, and he had to put Americans in body bags. I am sure that as defense secretary, he would not hesitate to use military force aggressively if our nation or its allies are in danger. Yet he knows well that war is terribly unpredictable and needs to be avoided. He has shown some fury at those who have never seen war but encouraged it during the past decade. This is called courage. He has earned his stripes." – Jan C. Scruggs, Founder and President

VFW STATEMENT ON SENATOR CHUCK HAGEL NOMINATION

VFW EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR SPEAKS ABOUT NEXT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

January 07, 2013

The following statement is by Robert E. Wallace, executive director of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, regarding today's nomination of Sen. Chuck Hagel to become the next Secretary of Defense:

"It is not the place for America's oldest and largest combat veterans organization to advise or recommend to the President who he should nominate for cabinet positions. However, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the U.S. considers Chuck Hagel — a twice-wounded Vietnam War infantryman and former two-term U.S. senator from Nebraska — to be uniquely qualified to lead the Department of Defense."

IRAQ AND AFGHANISTAN VETERANS OF AMERICA

Hagel Nomination Praised by IAVA

IAVA released a statement today praising the nomination of former Senator Chuck Hagel for Secretary of Defense.

"IAVA applauds the President's nomination of Senator Chuck Hagel to serve as Secretary of Defense," IAVA founder and CEO Paul Rieckhoff said. "Senator Hagel is a welcomed choice and this is a historic day for veterans of all generations. Iraq and Afghanistan veterans know Senator Hagel as a trusted friend, advocate and role model. He is a man of tremendous character who we can always count on to put our country ahead of politics. As a decorated combat veteran of Vietnam, Senator Hagel uniquely understands the challenges America's armed forces are facing worldwide. He also understands the challenges they face when they transition home, which will be essential in the years ahead. As we confront an alarming suicide rate, a shrinking military and high unemployment for veterans, we need a Secretary of Defense who knows where we're coming from. After over ten long years of war, now is the time for a combat veteran like Senator Hagel to lead the Pentagon.

"As a former enlisted soldier, Senator Hagel understands the challenges our troops and veterans face on a deeply personal level. He's a man of great integrity who knows what it's like to put his life on the line for his country. He has walked in our boots, and we know we can trust him to always have our back."

Senator Hagel served as an enlisted soldier in the U.S. Army infantry from 1967 to 1968, when he was a squad leader in the 9th Infantry Division. He earned two Purple Hearts for his service in Vietnam. After returning home from Southeast Asia, Senator Hagel used the Montgomery G.I. Bill to attend college. Later, as a U.S. Senator, Hagel was an initial sponsor of the Post-9/11 Bill, which expanded G.I. Bill benefits for a new generation of veterans returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. IAVA was instrumental in the passage of the New G.I. Bill and worked closely with Senator Hagel on this historic piece of legislation.

"Without Senator Hagel's leadership in Washington, there would not be a Post-9/11 G.I. Bill," Rieckhoff added. "Senator Hagel has always been a strong advocate for veterans; at the Department of Defense, there is no doubt he will continue that legacy. Time and time again, from Vietnam to the VA to the USO, Senator Hagel has answered his country's call to serve, demonstrating courage, character and resolve at every turn. We encourage the Senate to approve his nomination swiftly."

AmVets National Commander Approves Defense Secretary Nomination

LANHAM, Md., Jan. 8, 2013—This afternoon, AMVETS National Commander Cleve Geer endorsed President Barack Obama's nomination of Chuck Hagel as the next Secretary of Defense. Obama announced the nomination yesterday, Jan. 7, 2013.

"AMVETS fully supports President Obama's nomination of Chuck Hagel for the future Secretary of Defense," said Geer. "As a veterans service organization, AMVETS' main mission is to serve as an advocate for veterans, their families and the community in which they live. I am confident that former Sen. Hagel will utilize his experience and understanding of America's military to lead this nation's troops and the Department of Defense."

If confirmed by the Senate, Hagel will be first infantryman to serve as the Secretary of Defense. He will replace current Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta, who has been in this position since 2011. Hagel's experience ranges from serving in the Army during the Vietnam War to representing Nebraska as a senator.

About AMVETS:
A leader since 1944 in preserving the freedoms secured by America's armed forces, AMVETS provides support for veterans and the active military in procuring their earned entitlements, as well as community service and legislative reform that enhances the quality of life for this nation's citizens and veterans alike.AMVETS is one of the largest congressionally-chartered veterans' service organizations in the United States, and includes members from each branch of the military, including the National Guard and Reserves.

Chuck Hagel would make an Outstanding Secretary of Defense

January 16, 2013

Fax: 202-228-0036

Dear Chairman Levin and Ranking Member Inhofe:

While some of our organizations cannot recommend whom the President should appoint to his cabinet, we believe that Senator Chuck Hagel would make an outstanding Secretary of Defense, and is uniquely qualified to lead the men and women of America's Armed Forces.

Chuck Hagel is true patriot who volunteered to fight in the war of his generation when he could easily have opted for a safe assignment. Twice wounded in the service of our nation, this combat veteran knows first-hand what it means to wear the uniform, what it means when the nation sends its young people to war, and the price that our Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen and Marines sometimes pay in our defense.

He has fought with and for our troops his entire adult life: as a 21-year old infantry sergeant in Vietnam; as the deputy head of the VA who pushed for Agent Orange Benefits and for the Vietnam Veterans Memorial; as the President of the USO; and as a U.S. Senator who co-authored the Post-9/11 G.I. Bill. As Secretary of Defense he will be a strong advocate of preparing servicemen and women for a smooth transition from the military to the VA system, including making jobs and training, and efficient electronic records a top priority. His door would always be open to veterans' service organizations.

Chuck Hagel knows that, while military force in defense of the nation is unfortunately sometimes necessary, decisions concerning war and peace, life and death, never should be undertaken lightly. This is the least that we can ask of our leaders.

The President has said that "in Chuck Hagel our troops see a decorated combat veteran of character and strength. They see one of their own. Chuck is a champion of our troops and our veterans and our military families." "Chuck knows that war is not an abstraction. He understands that sending young Americans to fight and bleed in the dirt and mud, that's something we only do when it's absolutely necessary." As veterans, we could not agree more. As the nation commemorates the 50th anniversary of the Vietnam War, it is fitting and proper that the next Secretary of Defense should be a wounded and decorated veteran of that conflict – the first Vietnam veteran and the first enlisted man to hold this post.

Sincerely,

President

January 18, 2013

The Honorable Carl Levin
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services
United States Senate
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am writing on behalf of the 380,000 members of the Military Officers Association of America (MOAA) to express MOAA's concern about some arguments being raised in opposition to the nomination of Sen. Chuck Hagel to be Secretary of Defense.

While MOAA does not endorse or oppose specific candidates for elected or appointed office, we believe Sen. Hagel is certainly a candidate who is fully qualified for appointment to this extremely important position.

MOAA's past work with Sen. Hagel has been very positive, and we believe he brings an important sensitivity to the human side of budget and operational considerations.

His experience as a combat-wounded Vietnam veteran, as Deputy Administrator of the VA and his two terms in the Senate provide a range of perspectives that would serve any Secretary of Defense well. MOAA previously recognized Sen. Hagel's efforts to protect the interests of military beneficiaries with our Arthur T. Marix Congressional Leadership Award.

While there is every potential we might disagree with some future decisions Sen. Hagel or any other Secretary of Defense will have to make on specific issues, we don't believe such speculation is a fair basis for questioning his qualifications.

MOAA believes, barring unexpected revelations of clearly disqualifying circumstances, the Senate should confirm a President's nominations for cabinet positions.

While each senator must vote his or her conscience, MOAA does not believe cabinet nominees should be held hostage to political litmus tests.

Sincerely, Best Regards

Dear Chairman Levin and Ranking Member Inhofe:

The Non Commissioned Officers Association of the USA (NCOA) strongly supports the appointment of The Honorable Chuck Hagel to be Secretary of Defense.

The association's membership is comprised of current and former enlisted members of the active duty military, Guard and Reserve Components to include all elements of the United States Coast Guard. The members of NCOA share a common experience with Senator Hagel who personally experienced the rigors of military service to include combat in the Vietnam War.

His military service including being twice wounded in action has instilled the values of service and personal sacrifice and for which he knows well the human cost of war.

He has been an advocate for Soldiers, Marines, Sailors, Airmen, and Coasties to ensure the training and equipage of America's 21st Century Military Force to coincide with a solid revised Defense posture to meet conventional and unconventional world challenges.

Senator Hagel has also championed personnel issues relating to combat dwell time, force protection, transition issues including electronic medical issues, preparation for future employment and training, veterans benefits including enhancements to Post 9/11 educational benefits. He also recognizes the value and sacrifice of families of the men and women who serve in this nation's Uniformed Services.

The NCOA has no hesitation in asking that Senator Hagel receive an expeditious hearing that confirms his confirmation to be the next Secretary of Defense. This Association recognizes the challenges that will be faced as Secretary of Defense and believe Senator Hagel is well qualified to lead the Department of Defense.

VOTEVETS.ORG CHEERS HAGEL PICK

Group Garnered Over 8000 Veterans and Military Families in Support of Hagel

WASHINGTON, DC - The largest progressive group of veterans in America, VoteVets.org, today cheered the pick of Chuck Hagel to be the next Secretary of Defense. The group previously launched a petition in support of Hagel, which gained over 13,000 sigatures, including over 8000 Veterans and Military Families.
http://votevets.org/news/releases?id=0528

In a statement, VoteVets.org Chairman and Iraq War Veteran Jon Soltz said:

"Senator Hagel is a tremendous pick for Secretary of Defense, who I know very well, and I have little doubt that he will serve President Obama with distinction – both as a voice of reason within the administration, and as a faithful advocate for carrying out the policies of the Commander in Chief. When it is all said and done, we will be talking about him as one of the finest Secretaries of Defense we've ever had.

Chuck Hagel brings three key things to this post. First, and foremost, as an enlisted soldier, who fought in Vietnam and was awarded the Purple Heart twice, Chuck Hagel's heart is still with the fighting men and women in uniform. He deeply understands what our warriors go through, when deployed. And so, when it comes to military action, Chuck Hagel will ask two questions: Is this good for American security, and is this good for our troops? That is something that is desperately needed.

Second, when it comes to American security, Chuck Hagel bravely broke with his party and his party's President, to stand up against the war in Iraq, which will go down in history as one of our most misguided military ventures. Chuck Hagel has no fear when it comes to standing up to neoconservatives, and their preemptive war, nation building dreams. As a Republican, he adds a very crucial dose of credibility when he speaks out against wrongheaded military action.

Third, and equally as important, Chuck Hagel is a vociferous advocate for cutting Pentagon waste - from outdated weapons to our over-bloated nuclear arsenal, both of which eat up billions and billions of dollars. In these tough economic times, Chuck Hagel will have no problem identifying waste at the Department of Defense, and cutting it. Those savings will both help the American economy, and free up resources to ensure that our troops are taken care of, as they deserve.

Along with John Kerry at the State Department, service men and women will have a real dream team – secretaries who served in war, were wounded, and performed heroically. President Obama is to be commended for standing up for our men and women in uniform, and putting the very best people for the job at the Departments of Defense and State."

Founded in 2006, and backed by over 220,000 members, the mission of VoteVets.org is to use public issue campaigns and direct outreach to lawmakers to ensure that troops abroad have what they need to complete their missions, and receive the care they deserve when they get home. VoteVets.org also recognizes veterans as a vital part of the fabric of our country and will work to protect veterans' interests in their day-to-day lives. VoteVets.org is committed to the destruction of terror networks around the world - with force when necessary - to protect America. While non-partisan, the group is the largest progressive organization of veterans in America.

Dear Chairman Levin and Ranking Member McCain,

Vietnam Veterans of America (VVA) is pleased and proud to stand in support of the nomination of Senator Chuck Hagel as Secretary of Defense.

We have known Chuck Hagel for more than thirty years. We know him to be a man of the highest character and integrity who will take care of the troops while accomplishing the mission. He has the range and depth of knowledge in foreign affairs as well as defense policy to more than have sufficient gravitas to be an excellent Secretary of Defense. He is an inspired choice.

Senator Hagel's initial experience with governance in the nation's capital did not end well. He left the then Veterans Administration, where he had been Deputy Administrator, because the VA bureaucracy refused to be honest about the health effects of Agent Orange, and the effort by many at the VA to destroy the VET Centers – the Readjustment Counseling Service –to treat Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). As far as we know, Chuck Hagel is the only one in our generation to resign such a post on principle. This is very much in keeping with the spirit of our nation's Founding Fathers.

After leaving full-time public service, Chuck Hagel started his business, Vanguard Cellular, and worked tirelessly to make it a real success, creating many jobs along the way. As a private citizen, he helped keep the issue of adequate care and assistance to veterans with PTSD in the fore. Even while building his business he made time to be active in veterans affairs, assisting in the effort to build the Vietnam Women's Memorial and serving on the Board of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund.

As a Senator, he was a key player in securing the GI Bill for the 21st Century, as well as other key programs to assist the veterans of our latest wars. He was the critical champion in the Senate in strengthening veterans' preference in federal hiring, which has made the current campaign to hire veterans of Afghanistan and Iraq into government positions successful.

As a combat-tested soldier who acquitted himself well in battle, he knows first-hand what it means to commit our troops to war. He gets it that warfare is ultimately about the mud and the blood and the efforts of troops on the ground, so he will ensure that we continue to be the best-equipped and trained military in the world. We also believe that Senator Hagel understands that it is small business where much of the best innovation comes from, and so will ensure that there is real competition at DoD, which is another way of saying that he will be committed to small business as a key partner in acquisition and innovation strategy.

VVA recommends Chuck Hagel, without reservation, for quick confirmation as Secretary of Defense, a position for which he is uniquely and pre-eminently qualified.

Sincerely,

John Rowan
National President

Ambassadors' Open Letter:
Senator Hagel Impeccable Choice for Defense Secretary

We support, most strongly and without qualification, President Obama's reported intention to nominate Senator Chuck Hagel to be the next secretary of defense. Each of us has known the senator over the past twenty years and has found him invariably one of the best informed leaders in the U.S. Congress on the issues of U.S. national security. Senator Hagel's credentials for the job are impeccable. As a decorated Vietnam veteran, an extremely successful entrepreneur in the private sector and as a two-term senator, he brings unusually high qualifications and experiences to the Department of Defense at this time of budget constraint and challenges to reshape America's military power while keeping it strong for the coming decades.

Senator Hagel's political courage has impressed us all. He has stood and argued publicly for what he believes is best for the United States. When he was attacked for opposing the war in Iraq as "unpatriotic," he replied, "To question your government is not unpatriotic – to not question your government is unpatriotic."

Time and again he chose to take the path of standing up for our nation over political expediency. He has always supported the pillars of American foreign policy – such as: a strong NATO and Atlantic partnership; a commitment to the security of Israel, as a friend and ally; a determination to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons; and the defense of human rights as a core principle of America's role in the world.

Each of us has had the opportunity to work with Senator Hagel at one time or another on the issues of the Middle East. He has invariably demonstrated strong support for Israel and for a two state solution and has been opposed to those who would undermine or threaten Israel's security.

We can think of few more qualified, more non-partisan, more courageous or better equipped to head the Department of Defense at this critical moment in strengthening America's role in the world. If he is nominated, we urge the speedy confirmation of Senator Hagel's appointment.

Sincerely,

Nicholas Burns, former Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, Ambassador to NATO and Greece

Ryan Crocker, former Ambassador to Iraq and Afghanistan

Edward Djerejian, former Ambassador to Israel and Syria

William Harrop, former Ambassador to Israel

Daniel Kurtzer, former Ambassador to Israel and Egypt

Sam Lewis, former Ambassador to Israel

William H. Luers, former Ambassador to Venezuela and Czechoslovakia

Thomas R. Pickering, former Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, Ambassador to Israel and Russia

Frank G. Wisner, former Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, Ambassador to Egypt and India

The Honorable Carl Levin, Chairman
The Honorable James M. Inhofe, Ranking Member

Committee on Armed Services, United States Senate
Room SR-228 Russell Senate Office Bldg.
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Chairman Levin and Ranking Member Inhofe:

On behalf of the Foreign Area Officer Association (FAOA) and the defense international affairs community, I am writing in support of the nomination of Senator Chuck Hagel as the next Secretary of Defense. FAOA is the professional organization of our military's specially-trained and experienced international affairs and language/culture experts (the FAOs), including Defense Attachés and Security Cooperation personnel--retired, reserve, active duty, and civilian force.

Chuck Hagel has been a strong and active supporter of FAOA and the defense international affairs and language/culture functions, and we were honored to have Senator Hagel as our Distinguished Speaker last year, to participate in his Atlantic Council events, and to assist with promoting his forward-looking book: America: Our Next Chapter. Through these interactions, it was clear that he fully understands and greatly values the role and contributions of the defense international affairs community to our national security. He is a kindred spirit with our purpose, passion, and pursuit of advancing an insightful military and foreign policy, fully informed by true international affairs and region/culture experts. Our nation and Defense Department needs this kind of clear thinking and nuanced approach.

Senator Hagel is a warrior, a statesman, and a profound thinker about the nation's security. Throughout his career, Senator Hagel has also fought for our troops – from an infantry sergeant in Vietnam, to the deputy head of the Veterans Administration, President of the United Service Organizations (USO), and as a Senator and co-author of the Post-9/11 G.I. Bill. Chuck Hagel is uniquely qualified to lead the men and women of our Armed Forces, and would make an outstanding Secretary of Defense. If confirmed, he would also be the first Vietnam veteran and former NCO to be the Secretary of Defense

We urge you to promptly confirm him!

We write regarding the qualifications of former Senator Chuck Hagel to be Secretary of Defense. As former Generals and Admirals from the Army, Air Force, Marines and Navy, we are certain that Senator Hagel would be a strong leader in the Pentagon.

Senator Hagel is eminently qualified for the job. He is a decorated Vietnam veteran, a successful businessman, a leader in Ronald Reagan's Veteran's Administration and, since his election to the Senate in 1996, one the country's leading voices on foreign policy. He would bring a long-term strategic vision to the job and to the President's Cabinet.

Senator Hagel has stood up for what he believes are best interests of the United States for many years, regardless of party or politics. We all know that the next Secretary of Defense will have a challenging job to do – in this time of budget constraint and unprecedented challenges around the world, the leadership of the Department of Defense must be strong. But, as then-Senator Hagel said to his colleagues on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 2007: "If you want a safe job, go sell shoes."

Most importantly, we believe that the person who can best lead the Pentagon is one who understands the importance of the challenges that our warfighter faces. Everyone in the Department of Defense, from the most-recently enlisted Privates to the senior General Officers, respect his service to his country on the battlefields in Vietnam. Even more, his decades of work with Veterans organizations show that he will forcefully advocate for continued support to the men and women of our armed forces long after they have returned from today's battlefields.

We look forward to working with Senator Hagel if and when he is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Senator Hagel has been a voice of moderation and balance in an unbalanced time, and we can think of few people better qualified to lead the Department of Defense.

Sincerely,

FIFTY AMERICAN STATESMEN TO SENATORS: CONFIRM CHUCK HAGEL AS SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Diplomats Support Hagel In Largest-Ever Direct Appeal of its Kind

Washington, D.C. -- In a historic letter to the Senate being delivered today, 50 former U.S. Ambassadors and senior officials from the Defense and State Departments and the National Intelligence Council express their support "strongly and without qualification" of the nomination of Chuck Hagel to head the Department of Defense. The letter, the largest-ever direct appeal by American diplomats to Congress in support of a cabinet nomination, urges the Senate Armed Services Committee and Senate leadership to support a speedy confirmation of the former congressman, business owner and decorated veteran.

Citing their experiences serving Democratic and Republican presidents from Harry Truman to Barack Obama and working with Senator Hagel on national security issues over two decades, the signers commend the nominee for his unique courage, judgment and commitment to the country's interests over political expediency; and call his credentials "impeccable." They also applaud Hagel's unwavering support for "the pillars of American foreign policy": "a strong military; a robust Atlantic partnership; a commitment to the security of Israel, as a friend and ally; a determination to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons; and the defense of human rights as a core principle of America's role in the world."

Former Deputy Secretary of State John C. Whitehead, former US. Trade Representative and Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Carla Hills, former Chairman of the National Intelligence Council Joseph Nye participated in the letter. Professional diplomats Frank Wisner, Nicholas Burns, Richard Murphy, Ryan Crocker and Morton Abramowitz; as well as six former Ambassadors to Israel:Thomas R. Pickering, Daniel Kurtzer, Sam Lewis, Edward Djerejian, William Harrop, and Edward Walker; also signed. The letter highlights Hagel's strong support for Israel and a two-state solution and his opposition to anything that would undermine Israel's security.

The letter is being delivered electronically and by hand to Senate leadership and each member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The full text of the letter is below.

Dear Senator:

We support, strongly and without qualification, President Obama's nomination of Chuck Hagel to be the next Secretary of Defense. Most of us have known the Senator for a decade or more and consistently have found him to be one of the best informed leaders in the U.S. Congress on national security issues. Senator Hagel's credentials for the job are impeccable. As a decorated Vietnam veteran, a successful entrepreneur in the private sector, and a two-term United States senator, he brings exceptional qualifications and experience to the Department of Defense, particularly at this time of budget constraint and challenges in reshaping America's military power while keeping it strong for the coming decades.

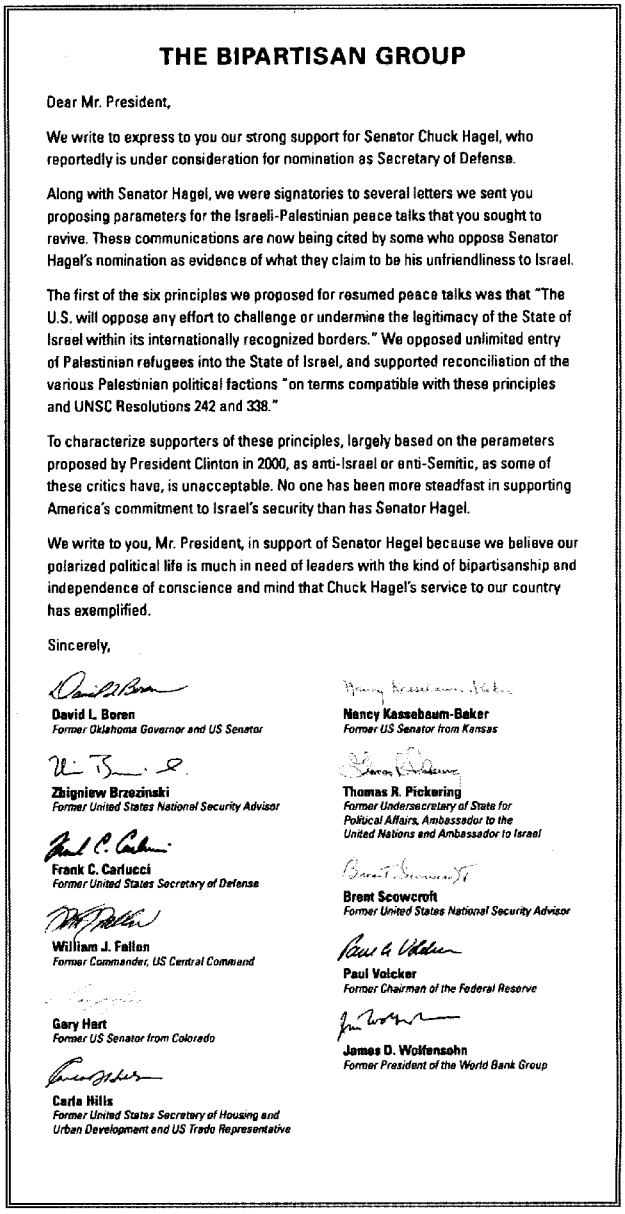
Senator Hagel's political courage has impressed us all. He has stood and argued publicly for what he believes is best for the United States. Time and again, he has chosen to take the path of standing up for our nation, rather than the path of political expediency. He has always supported the pillars of American foreign policy: a strong military; a robust Atlantic partnership; a commitment to the security of Israel, as a friend and ally; a determination to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons; and the defense of human rights as a core principle of America's role in the world.

We have spent most of our lives in the service of our country, deeply committed to America's security and the example of our democracy. Many of us served in the U.S. armed services and most of us have served for decades as professional diplomats. We are, by profession, non-partisan and have served loyally under Presidents from Harry Truman to Barack Obama. We come from virtually every part of this nation and represent a broad spectrum of Americans.

Most of us have had the opportunity to work with Senator Hagel on Middle East policy and other aspects of foreign relations. He has those rarest of qualities: good judgment and common sense. He listens, learns, and takes wise positions that advance the interests and security of the United States. He has repeatedly demonstrated his strong support for Israel and for a two state solution, and has opposed those who would undermine or threaten Israel's security.

We are greatly encouraged and proud that President Obama has chosen Chuck Hagel to serve our nation again, this time as Secretary of Defense. Few are as qualified, courageous, or well equipped to head the Department of Defense at this critical moment as the nation seeks to strengthen America's role in this changing world.



We urge speedy confirmation of this outstanding American patriot to be the next Secretary of Defense.

THE BIPARTISAN GROUP

Dear Mr. President,

We write to express to you our strong support for Senator Chuck Hagel, who reportedly is under consideration for nomination as Secretary of Defense.

Along with Senator Hagel, we were signatories to several letters we sent you proposing parameters for the Israeli-Palestinian peace talks that you sought to revive. These communications are now being cited by some who oppose Senator Hagel's nomination as evidence of what they claim to be his unfriendliness to Israel.

The first of the six principles we proposed for resumed peace talks was that "The U.S. will oppose any effort to challenge or undermine the legitimacy of the State of Israel within its internationally recognized borders." We opposed unlimited entry of Palestinian refugees into the State of Israel, and supported reconciliation of the various Palestinian political factions "on terms compatible with these principles and UNSC Resolutions 242 and 338."

To characterize supporters of these principles, largely based on the perameters proposed by President Clinton in 2000, as anti-Israel or anti-Semitic, as some of these critics have, is unacceptable. No one has been more steadfast in supporting America's commitment to Israel's security than has Senator Hagel.

We write to you, Mr. President, in support of Senator Hegel because we believe our polarized political life is much in need of leaders with the kind of bipartisanship and independence of conscience and mind that Chuck Hagel's service to our country has exemplified.

Senator REED. Mr. Chairman, I think the President chose wisely. There are very few people in this country with the experience, as a combat infantryman, decorated and wounded, as a business leader, as the second leader of the Veterans Administration, as a U.S. Senator, as someone who every day understands that the decisions we make will be carried out by young Americans, actually looked in the face of young Americans, who has seen them suffer and die for this country. I think that quality is, if not unique, extraordinarily part of the nominee before us. Again, I think the President made a wise choice.

I think Senator Inhofe's discussions of the Global Zero Report is an opportunity for a quote, and let me quote. "There is one way safely and legitimately to reduce the cost of national security, and that is to reduce the need for it. This is what we are trying to do in negotiations with the Soviet Union. We are not just assessing limits on a further increase of nuclear weapons. We seek instead to reduce the number. We seek the total elimination one day of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth." President Ronald Reagan in his second inaugural address.

The notion of Global Zero is not something unique. I would also point out that as signatories to the nuclear disarmament treaty, the Nonproliferation Treaty, Article 6 undertakes to commit at least to a treaty ultimately on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective control.

This is an aspiration that the United States has embraced for a very long time under presidents of both parties. I think, as Senator Hagel pointed out, this is not unilateral disarmament. This is a long process of making sure we have the nuclear weapons in place to deal with appropriate challenges, some of them very different than the Cold War, but the aspiration is important. It has been a bipartisan and constant one for decades. Is that a rough summary of what you might agree to, Senator?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, it is, Senator. Thank you.

Senator REED. The other issue is that there were several specific points raised with your record, and let me give you the opportunity to respond, if you will, to the questions that Senator Inhofe posed with respect to votes. If you have the list before you or——

Senator HAGEL. The what? I'm sorry?

Senator REED. Senator Inhofe posed several issues about a 2007 vote, a 2006 resolution with Hezbollah, 2003 Syrian sanctions, et cetera. You were prepared to comment. I think it is appropriate that you have an opportunity to comment. If you want to do so now, I would invite you to do so.

Senator HAGEL. I would be glad to further comment for the record because I have none of those specific quotes in front of me, and which I will, Senator, listing every vote I took.

I would say, though, included in those votes, which I do recall some of them, was a vote in 1998, a vote in 2000, a vote in 2006, specifically against Iran, sanctioning companies, unilateral sanctions, that in any way assisted in Iran's building their capability of nuclear weapons or rocket or missiles. I voted for those.

I recall signing a letter, a Warner-Levin letter in 2002 to the President of the United States regarding anti-Semitism in Russia. I wrote a letter to President Clinton specifically in 1999 recommending to President Clinton a number of steps that he take with President Yeltsin regarding anti-Semitism in Russia. I remember specifically there were two unanimous consent resolutions in 2006 against Hezbollah, against Hamas, against Syria, and Iran that we had unanimous consent, I supported on the floor of the Senate.

So there is a more complete record, Senator, than just one, or two, or three, or four, and those are some of them that I recall. As I noted in one of the responses back to Senator Inhofe, I did not take any action on any vote, as I suspect every colleague has the same way to approach votes, on this specific issue, on Hezbollah, Hamas, which I am on the record many times designating and saying that Hezbollah and Hamas are terrorist organizations. I am on the record many times in speeches, and on the floor of the Senate, and in the book I wrote in 2008 saying that Iran is a state sponsor of terrorism. That is not new. That is in my record.

But the way I approached every vote I ever took in the Senate was based on what I thought could be most effective, what was the situation at the time, how could we do this smarter and better. I have always believed that the President of the United States is the elected leader of America. He has within his responsibilities, and I believe it is clearly articulated in Article 2, to conduct foreign policy. I always thought the best way to deal with foreign leaders was let the President do that directly, for us to communicate with the President.

I do not think there was a letter that I can recall I signed to a President on any of these issues that I agreed with it that I did not sign. So it was never a matter of differing objectives here. It was a matter of how best we could do it.

I mentioned in 2008, the Secretary of State did not want one of those unilateral sanctions to go forward during the Bush administration, wrote a letter, 2001, which is one of the issues that Senator Inhofe brought up. The Bush administration was opposed to a 5-year renewal of ILSA.

Now, I am not saying that is right or wrong, but every one of the decisions I made, every vote I cast, was based on at the time what I thought made the most sense.

1997: Hagel voted in favor of the FY1998 National Defense Authorization Act (H.R.1119).
1997: Hagel voted in favor of the FY1998 Department of Defense Appropriations bill (H.R.2266)

Senator REED. Senator, you have clearly stated that you are supportive of the President's efforts to support the State of Israel. You have indicated specifically the example of Iron Dome. I recall a statement recently by Defense Minister Barak that he has seldom seen or never has seen the same level of military support to the State of Israel that he has seen in the last several years.

You are, I presume and I hope, fully prepared to carry out that same effort, that same level of support, because of the vital interests that we share with the State of Israel.

Senator HAGEL. I am, and I have a record on that. In my book in 2008, interviews, speeches, I have always said I am a supporter of Israel. In some cases, I have said I am a strong supporter of Israel. In some cases I have even written, and I think it is in my book, that we have a special relationship with Israel. We always have had.

I have never voted against Israel ever in the 12 years I was in the Senate whether it was military authorizations, additional supplemental appropriations. The record is very clear on that.

I might add, as long as we are on this subject, that—and Senator Nelson may have a clearer view of this since he was just in Jerusalem, there have been a couple of recent statements made by the current Israeli Ambassador to the United States, the former Israeli Ambassador to the United States, now the Deputy Foreign Minister of Israel, that were fairly positive about me.

I think all the Israeli leaders I have dealt with over the years and met, I have been to Israel many times. The first two times I was in Israel was when I was the head of the United Services Organizations (USO). I kept the Haifa USO open. We did not close it. There was a lot of pressure when I took over the World USO to close USOs around the world, and we did. There was a lot of pressure to close the Haifa USO. I am the one that made the decision not to do that.

The former Chief of Naval Operations of Israel, Admiral Zev Almad, who has recently been interviewed about me, has strongly supported me and said specifically that I was a strong friend of Israel. Now the USO is closed, but the current then director of the USO, a lady by the name of Gila Garrison, who lives in Haifa, said I was a strong supporter and friend of Israel.

I think my record is pretty clear on my support of Israel, and I would, of course, continue to support the President's policies. I think he has been as strong a supporter of Israel as maybe any President since 1948 when Harry Truman helped give birth to Israel. This President has been there. As he said, I have Israel's back—$3.1 billion in assistance, almost $300 additional million out of the Defense Department for Iron Dome, what we are doing with David Sling Arrow. I am a strong supporter of all those programs and will continue to support them.

Senator REED. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. Before I call on Senator McCain, there is a quorum that is now present, and I now ask the committee to consider a list of 952 pending military nominations. They have all been before the committee the required length of time.

Is there a motion to favorably report those nominations?

UNIDENTIFIED SPEAKER. I so move.

Chairman LEVIN. Is there a second?

UNIDENTIFIED SPEAKER. Second.

Chairman LEVIN. All in favor, say aye? [A chorus of ayes.]

Opposed, any? [No response.]

The motion carries. Thank you all very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased to see an old friend here before the committee, and especially pleased to see Senator Warner and Senator Nunn, two of the great members of this committee, who have contributed so much to our Nation's defense.

Senator Hagel, members of this committee will raise questions reflecting concerns with your policy positions. They are not reasonable people disagreeing. They have fundamental disagreements. Our concerns pertain to the quality of your professional judgment and your world view on critical areas of national security, including security in the Middle East.

With that in mind, let me begin with your opposition to the surge in Iraq. In 2006, Republicans lost the election, and we began the surge, and you wrote a piece in the Washington Post called "Leaving Iraq Honorably". In 2007, you said it is not in the national interests to deepen its military involvement. In January 2007, in a rather bizarre exchange with Secretary Rice in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee after some nonsense about Syria and crossing the border into Iran and Syria because of Syria, and a reference to Cambodia in 1970, you said, "When you set in motion the kind of policy the President is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous. Matter of fact, I have to say, Madam Secretary, I think the speech given last night by this President represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam. If it is carried out, I will resist it." Then of course you continued on and on for months afterwards talking about what a disaster the surge would be, even to the point where it was clear the surge was succeeding.

In March 2008, you said, "Here the term quagmire could apply. Some reject that term, but if that is not a quagmire, then what is?" Even as late as August 29, 2011, in an interview with the Financial Times, you said, "I disagreed with President Obama, his decision to surge in Afghanistan as I did with President Bush on the surge in Iraq."

Do you stand by those comments, Senator Hagel?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, I stand by them because I made them.

Senator MCCAIN. Were you right? Were you correct in your assessment?

Senator HAGEL. I would defer to the judgment of history to support that out.

Senator MCCAIN. The committee deserves your judgment as to whether you were right or wrong about the surge.

Senator HAGEL. I will explain why I made those comments.

Senator MCCAIN. I want to know if you were right or wrong. That is a direct question. I expect a direct answer.

Senator HAGEL. The surge assisted in the objective. But if we review the record a little bit——

Senator MCCAIN. Will you please answer the question? Were you correct or incorrect when you said that "The surge would be the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam." Where you correct or incorrect, yes or no?

Senator HAGEL. My reference to the surge being the most dangerous——

Senator MCCAIN. Are you going to answer the question, Senator Hagel? The question is, were you right or wrong? That is a pretty straightforward question. I would like an answer whether you were right or wrong, and then you are free to elaborate.

Senator HAGEL. I am not going to give you a yes or no answer on a lot of things today.

Senator MCCAIN. Let the record show that you refuse to answer that question. Now, please go ahead.

Senator HAGEL. If you would like me to explain why——

Senator MCCAIN. I actually would like an answer, yes or no.

Senator HAGEL. I am not going to give you a yes or no. I think it is far more complicated that, as I have already said. My answer is, I will defer that judgment to history.

As to the comment I made about the most dangerous foreign policy decision since Vietnam was about not just the surge, but the overall war of choice going into Iraq. That particular decision that was made on the surge, but more to the point, our war in Iraq, I think was the most fundamental bad, dangerous decision since Vietnam.

Aside from the cost that occurred in this country through blood and treasure, aside what that did to take our focus off of Afghanistan, which, in fact, was the original and real focus of a national threat to this country, Iraq was not. I always tried to frame all the different issues before I made a decision on anything.

Now, just as you said, Senator, we can have differences of opinion, but that is essentially why I took the position I did.

Senator MCCAIN. It is a fundamental difference of opinion, Senator Hagel. Senator Graham and I, and Senator Lieberman, when there were 59 votes in the U.S. Senate, spent our time trying to prevent that 60th. Thank God for Senator Lieberman. I think history has already made a judgment about the surge, sir, and you are on the wrong side of it. Your refusal to answer whether you were right or wrong about it is going to have an impact on my judgment as to whether to vote for your confirmation or not. I hope you will reconsider the fact that you refuse to answer a fundamental question about an issue that took the lives of thousands of young Americans.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, there was more to it than flooding——

Senator MCCAIN. I am asking about the surge, Senator Hagel.

Senator HAGEL. I know you are, and I am trying to explain my position. The beginning of the surge also factored in what General Allen had put into place in Anbar Province, the Sunni Awakening. We put over 100,000 young soldiers——

Senator MCCAIN. Senator Hagel, I am very well aware of the history of the surge and the Anbar Awakening, and I also am aware that any casual observer will know that the surge was the fundamental factor, led by two great leaders, General Petraeus and Ambassador——

Senator HAGEL. Well, I do not know if that would have been required and cost us over 1,000 American lives and thousands of wounded.

Senator MCCAIN. So you do not know if the surge would have been required. Okay.

Senator Hagel, let me go to Syria now. More than 60,000 people have been killed in Syria. Do you believe that we should be more engaged in Syria?

Senator HAGEL. I know this administration is very engaged in working with its partners.

Senator MCCAIN. So you do not think we should do more?

Senator HAGEL. When you say "do more," do you mean——

Senator MCCAIN. Do you think we should make sure that the Syrians get the weapons they need, and perhaps establish a no fly zone? Do you think we do?

Senator HAGEL. I believe that part of our review is looking at those options.

Senator MCCAIN. It has been 22 months, Senator Hagel.

Senator HAGEL. I was not there. I do not know the details. I am not there now.

Senator MCCAIN. I am sure you have read in the newspapers that 60,000 people have been killed, and that it is in danger of spilling over into neighboring countries. My question, I guess, is how many more would have to die before you would support arming the resistance and establishing a no fly zone?

Senator HAGEL. I do not think anyone questions the terrible tragedy that is occurring there every day. It is a matter of how best do we work our way through this so that we can stop it to begin with, and then what comes next. I think the President——

Senator MCCAIN. Did you disagree with President Obama on his decision for the surge in Afghanistan?

Senator HAGEL. I did not think we should get ourselves into—first of all, I had no regional position as far as no formal position. But I did not think we were——

Senator MCCAIN. But you were reported on August 29, 2011 saying, "I disagreed with President Obama and his decision to surge in Afghanistan."

Senator HAGEL. That was my personal opinion, yes.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator McCain.

Senator Nelson.

Senator NELSON. Since the issue of Iraq has come up here, I just want to state for the record and lay the predicate that this Senator was one of many that voted for the authorization to go into Iraq, and as it turns out, the lessons of history, we were given incorrect information as a justification for going into Iraq.

We were told by the Secretary of Defense, by the Secretary of State, by the National Security advisor, and the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) that there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. So for a lot of the decisions that were made at the outset, they were decisions that were informed with incorrect information. As the committee is judging Senator Hagel on that decision as well as others, I want to tell the committee what was this experience of this Senator.

Now, what I would like to do with my time here is that since there are a few of this in this room that served in the military during the Vietnam era, and you clearly had that experience in combat, Senator Hagel, I would—and by the way, a lot of people do not know anything about Vietnam, and do not know how difficult it was, as Senator Warner has so eloquently stated in his comments, how the Nation was divided.

But I would like for you, as the committee is getting to know you, to know something about your service in Vietnam, and your combat experience. Were you wounded, Senator Hagel?

Senator HAGEL. Senator Nelson, thank you. If I may, and if I read into your question some latitude in answering, I would respond this way. I think my time is better served to maybe talk about more of the specific things, like Senator McCain asked me about and some others. Maybe weave some of my experience as to how it formed my judgment, rather than going through a 12-month journal of my time in the jungles when my brother, Tom, and I were both wounded twice together.

When Tom and I served there, 1968 was the worst year we had. Those who may not recall that year, we sent over 16,000 dead Americans home. Now, that is unfathomable in the world that we live in today, 16,000 dead Americans. I saw that from the bottom.

I think Chairman Levin, in an accurate and appropriate quote about what I said, in his introductory statements about what formed me, and it directly goes to Senator McCain's question about the surge. Just as I said in my statement, I had one fundamental question that I asked myself on every vote I took, every decision I made. Was the policy worthy of the men and women that we were sending into battle and surely to their deaths? In many cases, unfortunately tens of thousands of cases that we are living with, these poor families are living with, wounded, the results, the consequences.

I know it is easy here—it is anywhere—if you do not have a connection to some of this to see these things a little differently. It does not mean I am any better, Senator. It does not mean I am any smarter. It does not mean I am any more appreciative of the service of our country. That is not it. I saw it from the bottom. I saw what happens. I saw the consequences and the suffering when we are at war.

So I did question a surge. It was not an aberration to me ever. I always ask the question, is this going to be worth the sacrifice, because there will be sacrifice. In the surge case in Iraq, we lost almost 1,200 dead Americans during that surge and thousands of wounded. Now, was it required? Was it necessary? Senator McCain has his opinion on that shared by others. I am not sure. I am not that certain that it was required. Now it does not mean I am right. It does not mean I did not make wrong votes. But that is what guides me.

You asked me the question about my time in Vietnam and was I wounded. I was a very insignificant part of this. We were just doing our job, Senator, as every military person knows that. Some of this committee has rather distinguished members who served, starting with Senator McCain, and the sacrifices he has made to this country.

But it does condition you. I am not shaped, framed, molded, consumed by that experience. Of course not. But it is part of me. I tried to explain that in my opening statement. We are all shaped by those experiences. I hope that experience that I have had is for the better. I hope if I have the privilege of serving as Secretary of Defense it will put someone in charge at the Pentagon—not questioning past Secretaries of Defense; I can only speak for myself—who understands the realities of consequences of war. It does not mean I am better, but that is who I am. I do not walk away from that. I acknowledge that. But it does not consume me, Senator.

I do not see the lens of every world event and whether we should use American power through the lens of Vietnam. That is part of me. It is part of that lens. I think that is for the better. I think we need to be cautious with our power. I think we need to be wise with our power.

We have great power. We have awesome power. No nation in the world is even in our league. We have done so much good with that power. I do not think there is a nation in the history of man who has ever been as judicious and careful with its power as we have. I want to make sure we continue to do that, as you all do.

We will have differences, Senator, on policies, but all I can do is my best based on my own experiences. As I also said in my statement, reaching out, listening, learning, never knowing enough, understand circumstances change.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Nelson.

Senator Sessions.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you. Senator Hagel, it is great to have you with us and to have this hearing and an opportunity to discuss important issues. I admire your service to your country, and your combat experience is something we all honor and respect.

I have been for the most part chairman, ranking member, or member of the Strategic Forces Subcommittee of this Senate Armed Services Committee for the time I have been in the Senate. We came into the Senate together. So I have had some experience and knowledge about the great debates involving nuclear weapons and national security. I believe the Secretary of Defense should be the core, the rock-solid person, for defense of America. I believe he should project an image of solidity and steadfastness that the whole world and American people can depend on.

I am more than a little troubled by the report that you participated in—the Global Zero report that calls for the total elimination of nuclear weapons, and clearly suggests that is an achievable goal in a realistic period of time, although certainly not immediately. Your report writers defend you. They have issued an article defending you and the report that was just issued last year. They protest mightily and say that, "Chuck Hagel and Global Zero's views on nuclear weapons are in the national security interests and squarely in the mainstream."

Indeed, your defendants insist you are in the mainstream because your position is that of President Obama's, and dramatically they assert you are out of the mainstream if you believe otherwise.

So your report explicitly calls for, "an urgent and transformational change in the U.S. nuclear force structure, strategy, and posture". I think it is a rather exceedingly dramatic report frankly.

Now, specifically as to the historic nuclear force triad that has been the bedrock of our defense policy for half a century, your report calls for bilaterally or unilaterally totally eliminating the intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) triad leg. In fact, the report refers to itself as a dyad instead of a triad report. You propose eliminating the 76 nuclear B–52 bombers entirely, leaving only 18 B–2 bombers, reducing nuclear submarines from 14 to 10.

Further, the committee report that you were one of the five members that produced it, you favor eliminating all tactical nuclear weapons, de-alerting all weapons, and according to the report as I read it, that would mean it would take from 1 to 3 days to place a weapon on alert. I certainly agree that that would be a transformational change in our nuclear force structure, strategy, and posture. I think it is a big historic thing.

Now, General Kehler, the present Commander of the U.S. Strategic Command (STRATCOM) and Secretary of Air Force Mike Donley do not agree with the recommendations in this report, people you will supervise. General Kehler told the press on August 8, 2012, "I do not support the former vice chairman," and that is General Cartwright. "I do not think that we are in a place he suggests now, nor do I see that particular place any time soon." So you will be supervising him.

Would you share with us where you are today on that issue? Do you support the view of General Kehler, or do you support the view of the commission report that you signed?

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Senator. Let me first correct some of your interpretation of what the Global Zero report was, and is, and what it actually said.

First, it did not propose or call for anything. It was, in fact—the word specifically used at the front end of that report was "illustrative," proposing nothing, but laying out different scenarios, and possibilities, and schedules. But here is the key part of all this, and by the way, this was summarized in a letter to President Obama in 2009. Bilateral, never unilateral. Nothing was ever suggested on a unilateral basis to take down our arsenal. Negotiated, verifiable. These are all terms that were in the report.

As Senator Nunn said in his opening statement, and I have alluded generally to this, the mainstream thinking of most Presidents we have had the last 65 years, and I go back to Ronald Reagan's comments as Senator Nunn quoted, was reduction of nuclear weapons for the obvious reasons. That is why we have engaged in treaties to reduce nuclear weapons. Those were not unilateral arrangements, those were bilateral arrangements.

The United States and the Russians have about 90 percent of the nuclear in the world today. Now there are others who have them. There are nine nuclear powers, dangerous. Obviously the so-called loose nukes or non-state actors, terrorist groups getting a hold of these are threats.

Senator SESSIONS. But, Senator Hagel, I think——

Senator HAGEL. I just want to make sure that is clear.

Senator SESSIONS. I know, but it is not clear in your report. The report says on page 1, "These steps could be taken with Russia in unison through reciprocal presidential directives, negotiated in another round of bilateral arms reductions, or in implemented unilateral." A little further on——

Senator HAGEL. Well, that is not proposing.

Senator SESSIONS.—it says it two more times in this report that these ideas could be a—less good approach would be to adopt this agenda unilaterally. It suggests that it should be adopted. That would not be as good, but you would do so. There is another reference to that, and it does call for these reductions. In your conclusion, you say, "The United States should seek to achieve such reductions in 10 years and plan to base its arsenal on a dyad of nuclear delivery vehicles."

You go on to say, "Trident missile submarines—the optimal mix would consist of 10 Trident submarines and 18 B–2 bombers, the normal conditions it would have for the warhead stockpile would be deployed on these carriers. The other half would be kept in reserve. All land-based intercontinental missiles armed with nuclear payloads would be retired, along with carriers of non-strategic nuclear warheads, all of which would be eliminated. That is the tactical nuclear weapons, all of which would be eliminated from the stockpile. B–52 bombers would be completely dismantled or converted to carry only conventional weapons."

I do not believe that is consistent with the policy of the country as a whole. I supported legislation to create a bipartisan commission several years ago to help us—Senator Levin and others supported that. The House supported it, and it passed—to help us determine how much further we can continue to draw down our nuclear weapons. It was chaired by William Perry, the Secretary of Defense under Carter, James Schlesinger, who served in the Carter and Nixon cabinets. It had John Glenn on it, Martin Halperin, Lee Hamilton, James Woolsey, Keith Paine, and others. They had access to the Defense Department secret documents and information, and they came out with quite a different view.

Let me just point out some of the things that they came up with. They said maintain the triad. They said maintain tactical nuclear weapons. They recommended no change in the alert statute, and, in fact, the Defense Department's nuclear posture review under President Obama and Secretary Gates, explicitly found the alert status should not be altered in their review of nuclear weapons. They fundamentally found a need for nuclear weapons. That is the point. Your commission basically said that it undermines the request for nuclear weapons.

I will give you a chance to respond. On Global Zero, they sort of I think foresaw this argument. Before your report was issued, they said this, "The conditions that might make possible the global elimination of nuclear weapons are not present today, and their creation would require a fundamental transformation of the world political order."

That is a very strong statement, and I think it was aimed at this idea that is practical and realistic for us to expect that the world is going to move to zero nuclear weapons.

So first, I want to ask you one question that you told me in our meeting that I appreciated. President Obama stated when we did the New START treaty discussion, vote, and debate, "I intend to modernize or replace the triad of strategy nuclear systems, a heavy bomber, and air launch cruise missile, and ICBM, and nuclear-powered ballistic missile submarine."

He committed to, "accelerate the design of the Chemistry and Metallurgy Research Replacement Nuclear Facility and the Uranium Processing Facility"—those are the two buildings where our modernizations would take place—"and request full funding for those projects".

First, let me ask you, would you support that vision and commitment the President made?

Senator HAGEL. Absolutely I do, and——

Senator SESSIONS. Then you are free to respond to what I was saying. But I really do feel that—I am uneasy about this vision expressed in that committee report of yours.

Senator HAGEL. Let me just briefly come back to what you said, Senator, and I appreciate you giving me a chance to respond.

First, my record has always been very clear, everything I have voted on in my career in the Senate and wherever I have been. A strong, agile, safe, secure, effective, nuclear arsenal for the United States is not debatable. I voted that way. I believe that. You know that the home of STRATCOM is now in Senator Fischer's State, which used to be the State I represented or I used to be in that State as a Senator. It has not changed.

I know a little something about it, not as much as you and others on the committee, but I have been to that facility many times. I know General Kehler very well, know all the STRATCOM commanders very well. You know what the motto of STRATCOM is. It is a pretty significant motto. "Peace is our business."

What has kept the peace, as I noted in my opening statement as much as anything else in the world since World War II, is that nuclear deterrent. This prospective, Secretary of Defense, would never do anything or in any way take any action that would minimize, or harm, or downgrade that reality. But again, I go back to—not to get caught up in this report. This report was about illustrative possibilities, what and how could things be done. Always bilateral. Always verifiable. Always negotiable, just as we have always done in our treaties.

I will stop there. That is the commitment I make to you. I made it to the President. My record is clear on that.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. I think we have to move on.

Senator SESSIONS. Just thank you. I would just say the vision stated in your Global Zero report, I believe, is likely to create instability rather than confidence and stability, create uncertainty in the world among our allies and our potential adversaries. I do not believe it would meet the goal that you said not to weaken our ability.

So I am troubled that—I feel—I appreciate your comments today, but I am troubled by the language in that report.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Sessions.

Senator McCaskill.

Senator MCCASKILL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. In the 6 years I have served on this committee, I have served under Senator Warner as a ranking Republican member, and Senator McCain as a ranking Republican member. I have to tell you that there has never been a time that I did not sense that we all agreed that our work on behalf of our Nation in terms of protecting our country and defending our country, that it was a bipartisan effort.

I believe very strongly that this committee needs to be bipartisan. I hope that the new ranking member holds the same regard for that as Senator McCain and Senator Warner did, because at all times I felt that they were respectful and were willing to listen to our disagreements. I am hopeful that will continue, and I will be optimistic that it will.

I am going to ask a series of questions, and then at the end of them, if you need more time, just say so.

Do you believe that all options should be on the table when we confront Iran?

Senator HAGEL. Absolutely.

Senator MCCASKILL. Do you believe Iran is currently a state sponsor of terrorism and provides material support to Hezbollah and to Hamas?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, and I am on the record a number of times saying that.

Senator MCCASKILL. Do you support sanctions against Iran?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator MCCASKILL. Do you believe that the United States should unilaterally eliminate its nuclear arsenal?

Senator HAGEL. No.

Senator MCCASKILL. Do you agree with four national security leaders, including Henry Kissinger, Sam Nunn, William Perry, and George Schultz, President Reagan's Secretary of State, when they said, "The four of us have come together in a nonpartisan effort, deeply committed to building support for a global effort to reduce reliance on nuclear weapons, to prevent their spread into potentially dangerous hands, and to ultimately to end them as a threat to the world. We remain committed to working towards this vision and advancing the steps essential to achieve this goal." Do you agree with those four bipartisan national leaders in the area of national security and foreign policy?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator MCCASKILL. I wanted to take a few minutes to talk about some of the things we talked about in my office, and some people on the committee are going, oh, here she goes on contracting, but the auditability of the Defense Department.

I know you stated in some of the advance policy questions that you want to hold people accountable on auditability. I do not think most Americans realize that as we face shrinking budgets and as we want to secure the preeminence of our military, and not hollow out the spending at the Defense Department, that auditability is a crucial ingredient to us being able to figure out whether all the money that is being spent there is being spent like Americans would want it to be spent.

Can you reassure me that auditability, as prescribed by law, coming through this committee, that it needs to happen no later than 2017? Can you make a commitment to me today on the record that will be a priority of yours, making sure as, Secretary Panetta did and Secretary Gates before him, that auditability will be an essential priority of your time as Secretary of Defense?

Senator HAGEL. As I told you, Senator, I will. I make that commitment to this committee.

Senator MCCASKILL. Then turning to contracting, I have yet to have provided to me, other than raw numbers that we spent, any data that would indicate that major infrastructure rebuilding as part of a counterinsurgency strategy works.

There are many things that work in a counterinsurgency strategy, and one of them, as it was originally posed to me back some 6 years ago on this committee by General Petraeus, was that the Commander's Emergency Response Program (CERP) funds, that walking around money to fix plate glass windows in neighborhoods, that that was an essential part of the counterinsurgency (COIN) strategy.

That morphed into our military building major infrastructure projects without really any data ever to indicate that the billions of dollars that we were spending was, in fact, advancing our military mission.

In addition to that, it is clear if you want to look at Iraq and the failures that Iraq represents in some ways, one of the failures is the crumbling investments that this country made in Iraq: the health centers that never opened, the water parks that sit crumbling, the power facilities that were blown up before they even had an opportunity to operate. I can go down billions of dollars of waste because we didn't do the analysis on sustainability after we left.

I am convinced that we have made the same mistakes in Afghanistan. I would like your response to this issue of major infrastructure building while we are in a conflict being conducted by our military, not by the U.S. Agency for International Development, not by the State Department, and whether or not you would make a commitment to come back to this committee with a report analyzing whether or not there is data to support that aspect of the COIN strategy.

Senator HAGEL. I will make that commitment, and it is part of the larger series of questions and factors always involved when a nation gets clearly committed, as we were, and still are, in Afghanistan, and were in Iraq for 8 years. When you are at war, the highest first priority is to take care of your people. As a result of that, all the rest of the normal latitude, and guidance, theory, and policy, is secondary.

I think in both of those wars, because we got ourselves in so deep with so many people, and the welfare of our men and women was paramount, we tried a lot of things. We had never been this way before. We had never seen anything quite like these two situations. As a result, our Special Inspectors General have come up with billions and billions and billions of dollars that are unaccounted for, corruption, fraud, waste, abuse. It really is quite astounding. But when you think about the universe of money that went into both those wars, no one should be surprised.

Now, how do we fix it? What do we do? To your point, how do we learn? How do we learn from this? We need to learn from this. It was not the fault of the military. The military was asked to do everything. We overloaded the circuits of our military. We said, you do it. You have the money. You have the structure. You have the organization. You have the people. Now go do it.

We put these people—these young captains—you talked about CERP funds—in very difficult spots. These young captains were given $100,000 in cash, essentially walking around money to take care of tribal chiefs and so on and so on. It wasn't their fault. They were told to do this. This is what was part of the strategy.

I do not question necessarily any particular strategy or part of it, but I do think it is part of the whole that you are talking about. If I am confirmed and go over there, I will take a look at this, and we will go deeper and wider into this because we owe it to our people. We owe it to the people of this country who pay the bills. For the future, what did we learn for future challenges?

Senator MCCASKILL. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator McCaskill.

Senator Chambliss.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thanks, Mr. Chairman. Chuck, again, congratulations on your nomination. As we talked the other day, you and I have been good friends since I came to the Senate in 2002, sat next to each other for 6 years on the Intel Committee, and during that process you cast some votes that I questioned. But we were always able to dialogue, and it never impacted our friendship, and I am very appreciative of that.

You also were introduced by two of my dearest friends, Senator Nunn and Senator Warner, which certainly is a credit to you.

I want to drill down, Chuck, on the issue that I think is going to be very much at the forefront—probably the number one issue you are going to have to deal with, assuming that you are confirmed, and that is the issue of our relationship with Iran and where we go in the future, short term as well as long term.

Now, you wrote in your book, "We blundered into Iraq because of flawed intelligence, flawed assumptions, flawed judgments, and ideologically driven motives. We must not repeat these errors with Iran, and the best way to avoid them is to maintain an effective dialogue." You then go on to advocate again, "for a direct and strategic diplomatic initiative".

Now, I heard you in your opening comments say that your position on Iran is prevention, not containment, when it comes to their nuclear weaponization. I want you to expand on that, and I want to go back to Senator Inhofe and Senator Reed's question or comment relative to why you did not vote to designate the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Council as a terrorist organization.

Iran is the number one terrorist sponsoring state in the world. I do not think there is any disagreement about that. I want you to expand on your position on a nuclear weaponized Iran, and talk about red lines. If your position is truly prevention and not containment, Chuck, what is the red line? What is the point? We know there are some things happening over there right now that are very serious. So how far do we go?

Do you still advocate direct negotiations with Iran as you said and you made clear that all options are on the table, and you stated again that military options is one of those. If you will, talk about direct negotiation. We have never negotiated with a terrorist state. Why do you feel like that we ought to dialogue with them, even on this issue today?

Lastly, what alterations, if any, do you think are necessary to our military force posture in the Gulf region to deter Iranian regional ambitions and support international diplomatic efforts to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons capability? That is a broad statement on my part, broad question, but this is the issue from a national security standpoint, Chuck, and I would like you to be pretty specific.

Senator HAGEL. Let us start with the specific question on a vote regarding designating the Revolutionary Guard as a terrorist organization. You recall because you were there, there were 22 Senators who voted against that. The effort against it, the main point made on the floor of the Senate came from Senator Jim Webb. His point was we have never, ever designated a part of a legitimate government, a state—and when I say "legitimate," it does not mean we agree with Iran, but it is a member of the United Nations. Almost all of our allies have embassies in Iran. So that is why I note an elected legitimate government, whether we agree or not.

But we have never made any part of a legitimate independent government designated them or made them part of a terrorist organization. We have just never done that. So you say, well, so what? What is the big problem? The problem was, at least 22 of us believed—they were both Republicans and Democrats, by the way, in that vote, but it was Jim Webb who was on the floor most of the time on it—said that if you do that, that is tantamount to giving the President of the United States authority to use military force against Iran without having to come back to get a resolution from, or partner with, or cooperate with, the Congress of the United States. Essentially if we vote for this, we are giving a President, in a sense, that authority. Now, you can agree or disagree with that.

But I listened to that debate, and there was some pretty thoughtful debate. That debate I thought was pretty powerful with me. We were already in two wars at the time, and I thought that this made sense, and so I voted against it. That is why I voted against that. You might also remember that almost Secretary of State Kerry voted against it. Then Senator Obama, he gave speeches against it. He did not vote that day. Vice President Biden voted against it. Dick Lugar voted against it. There were some other Republicans.

As to the Iranian red line, Persian Gulf, some of the Iranian questions you asked. I support the President's strong position on containment as I have said, and I will speak more specifically to a couple of the examples you used from my book. But his position I think is right.

When you asked the question about red line, I think the President has gone as far as he should go publicly on that. He said clearly that in his words, he has Israel's back. He said that his policy is not to allow the Iranians to get a nuclear weapon.

What constitutes when action would be taken? I think that is always something that should not be discussed publicly or debated publicly or out in the public domain.

Your quotations from my book, which you acknowledge as well that I always said the military option should be on the table, and I had said that consistently as well as engaging with Iran. I have always thought it is far smarter to approach these very serious threats, including Iran, probably as significant a threat as we have out there today, although North Korea is beyond a threat. It is a real nuclear power and quite unpredictable. I think Pakistan is another very complicated reality.

But staying on Iran, I think we are far smarter to do what the President has been doing, which I laid out, by the way, in my book. I have a chapter on Iran. I have two chapters on Iraq. I have a chapter on the Middle East. Getting the world community behind us with these U.N. sanctions through the Security Council of the United Nations. These are tough sanctions. They are having a tremendous impact, you know that, on Iran.

If, in fact, the military option is the only one required, I think we are always on higher ground in every way, international law, domestic law, people of the world, people of the region to be with us on this if we have tried and if we have gone through every possibility to resolve this in a responsible, peaceful way rather than going to war.

Everything I said in my book was about that. I do not have a problem with engaging. I think great powers engage. I think engagement is clearly in our interests. That is not negotiation. Engagement is not appeasement. Engagement is not surrender. I think if the time is right, the climate is right, the dynamics are right, we should find ways, if we can find ways. We cannot force it. But I think we are always smarter and wiser to take that approach initially.

Posture in the Persian Gulf. Senator, our Fifth Fleet is located in the Persian Gulf in Bahrain. As you also know, we have a couple of carrier battle groups in that area. Our military posture there is very strong. It is very ready. It is very capable. These are contingencies and options that the Secretary of Defense, working with these Service Chiefs and their combatant commanders, always have to give in the present and make sure that we are prepared.

Let me stop there, I may have missed some of the specific things that you wanted to discuss.

Senator CHAMBLISS. I am understanding you to say that you are not ready to discuss red lines in a specific way. Am I hearing that right?

Senator HAGEL. I do not think that is my role now to start with. I am not the Secretary of Defense. But I think the President is wise in his course of action in not discussing that publicly. I think it is a far smarter way to handle it, and I think he has said what he needs to say. I think it has been understood in Iran. I think the world understands his position.

By the way, I have just been handed a note that I misspoke and said I supported the President's position on containment. If I said that, I meant to say that obviously his position on containment, we do not have a position on containment. I recognize that I have had more attention paid to my words the last 8 weeks that I ever thought possible, so I do not take any chances. Thank you.

Senator CHAMBLISS. I think I understood you correct on containment and prevention.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Just to make sure your correction is clear, we do have a position on containment, which is that we do not favor containment.

Senator HAGEL. We do not favor containment. That is the President's position, and that was my position.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. I just want to clarify the record.

Senator HAGEL. If you need further clarification, that is why I am here.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Chambliss.

Senator Udall.

Senator UDALL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Good morning, Senator Hagel.

Senator HAGEL. Senator.

Senator UDALL. Thank you for your service. Thank you for your willingness to once again heed the call and lead DOD.

We had a great private meeting with you last week. We covered many of the threats and challenges that our country faces: shrinking budgets, strategic national security shifts, and ensuring, as you have underlined over and over again already this morning, that we continue to provide fair and equal opportunities for all of our servicemembers and their families.

Again, I want to tell you I appreciate that opportunity. I am going to take you up on your offer, if you are confirmed, to continue sitting down with you as a member of the Armed Services Committee.

I know this issue has already been addressed, but I want to make sure that I am on the record as raising my concerns, and I want, as I think this committee should, to give you every opportunity to clarify and underline your point of view.

When we met privately, you emphasized your determination to keep all options on the table with regard to Iran, including a military strike, if Iran continues to pursue a nuclear program in defiance of this international obligation.

We also discussed your longstanding support of Israel and our longstanding relationship. But you have critics out there—I do not have to tell you that—who maintain that your record on Iran is in question, and that you are anti-Israel. These are serious charges.

So let me direct some questions your way. Why should Americans trust that you will consider every option when it comes to one of the most serious national security threats facing us today, which is Iran?

Senator HAGEL. First, thank you for an opportunity to clarify these issues. My record has been very clear on Iran. Senator Chambliss noted from my 2008 book and my chapter, specifically noting that I said the military option must remain on the table. I said that as recently in an op-ed that I co-authored last year in the Washington Post with two former U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) commanders.

We talked about Iran, and one of the very specific points we bring out in that op-ed was the military option must remain on the table along with all the other areas of effort, expertise, diplomacy, economics, and sanctions, the President is using, which I have already said I support.

My record is rather thorough on this, and I would continue to support that position, and I strongly support the President's position.

Senator UDALL. Senator, talk about your view on Israel, our relationship with Israel, how can we continue to have a special alliance with a country with whom we share more than an economic or political philosophy, but with a broader or moral connection that we have to Israel?

Senator HAGEL. I have said many times, just as I have said regarding the military option on Iran many times, in my book, speeches on the floor, interviews I have given, I am a strong supporter of Israel. I have been. I will continue to be. I have also said specifically, and I believe this is in my book, that we have a special relationship with Israel.

Again, my record is pretty clear. I voted in 12 years in the U.S. Senate for every authorization, every appropriation that I had an opportunity to vote on for Israel. I have been to Israel many times. I have met with their leaders many times.

So again, if you look at my record, I think my record is pretty clear in my strong support for Israel.

Senator UDALL. Senator, I heard you say when you discussed your vote against the resolution applying to the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, that in the end you were protecting Congress' prerogative when it comes to declaring war. Is that correct?

Senator HAGEL. That is exactly right. That is exactly what I was saying, and I did not say it, I guess, that way. But that was the point. Again, I say, like I have in answering some of the other questions, it was not a question of the objective. I shared the objective, and I suspect all 22 members in the Senate who voted against that resolution supported the objective. But as Jim Webb made the case I think pretty effectively, and Senator Webb was an individual who had rather considerable experience in this business. He had been Secretary of Navy under Ronald Reagan. He had been Assistant Secretary of Defense under Ronald Reagan. One of the most decorated veterans of Vietnam, U.S. Senator, celebrated author, lawyer. I thought he made a pretty strong, persuasive case. So did many of us.

Senator UDALL. Let us turn to cyber security. I was pleased that you mentioned cyber security early in your initial remarks. The Pentagon's move to significantly expand its cyber security assets and knowledge. I have to talk about Colorado since I represent Colorado. The Air Force Academy is well positioned to train those new cyber security experts. We are also the home of Space Command and U.S. Northern Command.

Would you talk a little bit more about your take on cyber security, what we ought to be doing, what sorts of resources we need?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, you may know that I have been to those facilities in Colorado a few times, and I do not know as much about them as you do. But I am pretty familiar with them. They are essential to our national security.

Cyber, I believe, represents as big a threat to the security of this country as any one specific threat for all the reasons this committee understands. It is an insidious, quiet kind of a threat that we have never quite seen before. It can paralyze a nation in a second, not just a power grid or a banking system, but it can knock out satellites. It can take down computers on all of our carrier battleships. It can do tremendous damage to our national security apparatus.

That is the larger threat. But when you start defining it down, this body, I know. I watched it, went through a pretty agonizing 3 months at the end of 2012 trying to find a bill that they could agree on cyber. I know, I believe, Congress will come back at it in this new Congress. I think you must, and you know that.

Because we have different intergovernmental authorizations here—Department of Homeland Security, DOD—where is the capacity? Where are the budgets? Where are the authorities? This is law enforcement. This is privacy, business, a lot of complications that we have really never, ever had to face before on other national defense threats to this country.

So cyber will be an area that we will continue to focus on. We must. It is an area that I will put high priority on if I am confirmed to be Secretary of Defense.

Senator UDALL. Senator, in the 2013 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), there is a provision that compels the military to accommodate the conscience moral principles or religious beliefs of all members of the Armed Forces. It does sound reasonable on the surface, but I am especially concerned that this could lead to misguided claims of a right to discriminate against lesbian, gay, and bisexual servicemembers, women, or persons with certain religious beliefs.

The President has said—I want to quote him—that DOD will, "not permit or condone discriminatory actions that compromise good order and discipline or otherwise violate military codes of conduct".

Will you ensure that DOD, in accommodating religious beliefs or matters of conscience, does not tolerate discrimination or harm to others?

Senator HAGEL. Absolutely. I will faithfully, diligently enforce our laws. All men and women deserve the same rights, and I can assure you that will be a high priority, to enforce that and ensure that in every way through the entire line of chain of command and accountability.

Senator UDALL. Thank you, Senator Hagel. I look forward to the second round of questions.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator UDALL. I think it is now afternoon, so good afternoon to you, and thank you for being here.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Udall.

Senator Wicker.

Senator WICKER. Let me just follow up on that. Does that mean, though, a chaplain would have to perform a same-sex marriage, in your view, if he objected based on conscience?

Senator HAGEL. I think the Pentagon regulations show, Senator, that same-sex marriage is legal in the nine States.

Senator WICKER. No, would a chaplain be able to bow out of that procedure based on conscience?

Senator HAGEL. Certainly.

Senator WICKER. Okay.

Senator HAGEL. But what we do not want, Senator Udall's point is someone to be denied to be married in a chapel or a facility and so on, but certainly a matter of conscience, yes. What I am talking about is a strict interpretation of defending the law, which defends rights.

Senator WICKER. Thank you very much for clarifying that, and thank you for calling on me early on. We had our conversation on January 8, and I appreciated that opportunity.

You just said that your statements over time have gotten a lot more attention than you ever dreamed possible. I hope you agree that is entirely appropriate in this context.

Chairman Levin mentioned in his opening statement that in speaking your mind, you said terrible things that caused him concern. He asked you about that. Senator Inhofe mentioned several of your statements involved what some people feel are policy reversals based on expediency, and so those are concerns.

You and I talked about two of these topics during our conversation, and one of them was with regard to sanctions against Iran. You told me in our conversation that you opposed unilateral sanctions because they do not work and they isolate the United States. Indeed you had made that statement to the Omaha paper just the day before. "I have not supported unilateral sanctions because when it is us alone, they do not work and they just isolate the United States," in the Omaha paper.

I will have to say that statement seems to be in direct contradiction to your letter to Senator Boxer 1 week later when you told her, "I agree that with Iran's continued rejection of diplomatic overtures, further effective sanctions, both multilateral and unilateral, may be necessary."

Now, a week before that you said that you have opposed them because they do not work. Senator Levin mentioned in his statement he disagrees that. He believes they do work. You gave him an answer to that statement, and we have it on the record. But let me just suggest to you, Senator, that if words have meaning, there is no two ways about it. The statement that you gave in the Omaha paper and that you gave to me the following day is substantially and substantively different from what you wrote to Senator Boxer a week later.

The Office of Secretary of Defense is one of the most powerful positions in the country, and arguably in the world. This official, whoever he or she is, must lead with clarity and precision, and people around the world need to rely on the clear meaning of the words of the Secretary of Defense.

Now, the other thing we discussed that gave me concern during our conversation on January 8 was your statement about the Jewish lobby. You told me that you have had apologized for using that terminology, and you retracted the use of the term "Jewish lobby". What you said was the Jewish lobby intimidates a lot of people up here. This was in an interview that you gave to Aaron David Miller. You said, "I've always argued against some of the dumb things they do because I don't think it's in the interest of Israel."

Here is my problem with your position at this point. You have corrected the term "Jewish lobby," and I assume now the correct term would be "Israel lobby" or "Israeli lobby". Do you still stand by your statement that they succeed in this town because of intimidation? That it amounts to causing us to do dumb things, because I want to say this, Senator. You are here today as the potential Secretary of Defense, and it would seem to me that however you characterize them, you have suggested that there is an effective lobby out there, whether you call them the Jewish lobby, the Israeli lobby, or the Israel lobby, and that they succeed in doing dumb things through intimidation, and that U.S. policy has been the wrong approach because the intimidation has worked.

So when you talked about the Jewish lobby, were you talking about the American Israel Public Affairs Committee? Were you talking about NORPAC? Were you talking about Christians United or Israel? Do you still believe that their success in this town is because of intimidation and that they are, as you stated, urging upon our Government that we do dumb things?

Senator HAGEL. First, I have never been accused of political expediency. I do not do that. It probably has gotten me in some trouble, Senator.

Second, to address the last comment, and then we will go back sanctions. I have already said I regret referencing the Jewish lobby. I should have said pro-Israel lobby. I think it is the only time on the record that I have ever said that.

Now, you all have done a lot of work with my record, and, yes, it is appropriate, by the way. Any nominee's record, what he or she thinks, says, done, absolutely. I was on your side of dais for 12 years, so I understand that and that responsibility. So I do not have any problem with that. I have already noted that I should have used another term, and I am sorry, and I regret it.

On the use of intimidation. I should have used "influence," I think would have been more appropriate. We were talking about in that book, and you evidently read it, Aaron David Miller's book, by the way, it is a book, "The Much Too Promised Land." He has spoken out directly over the last few weeks, written an op-ed about my position because it has gotten some attention as you have noted, and been quite favorable to me, and said much of that was taken out of context, and he was offended by it. Those were his words.

Those of you who know something about Aaron David Miller know that he is Jewish. He is a highly respected individual who has counseled Presidents and Secretaries of State. He also says in that interview, which is a fairly short interview, he mentioned that I am a strong supporter of Israel. That it is in the interview. So I think that says something.

I should not have said "dumb" or "stupid" because I understand, appreciate, there are different views on these things. We were talking about Israel. We were talking about the Middle East. We were not talking about Armenia, or Turkey, or the banking influence, or chamber of commerce influence. That was what the context of my comments were about.

Your point on the unilateral sanctions conversation and the quote, a couple of points. Let us go back to the ILSA vote, about the original ILSA vote during the Clinton administration and connect that to a comment I made in the World Herald about they do not work. They are ineffective. By the way, I have already noted for the record here that I have supported and voted for some unilateral sanctions, and I think I noted three specific ones that I recall.

But on your specific question about the specific comment. Just to give you an example of partly what I was talking about. You were not in the Senate at the time. Some were. But those who were here in the Senate might recall the EU's reaction to that ILSA Act. I was not in the Senate when that was voted on originally, so I did not have a vote.

But in 1998, the EU passed a resolution against the United States and threatened to take the United States to the World Trade Organization. As a consequence, Secretary Albright had to get into this, and as a consequence of that, President Clinton had to sign a waiver to allow a French oil company not to be part of that U.S. unilateral waiver.

Now I am not suggesting United States action should be hostage to the EU or any other country. But what I am suggesting is many times there are consequences to these actions. Now, every Senator has their own position on these, exercise their own judgment as they should, and cast their own vote. So I don't think necessarily that there was a disconnect from what I said in The World Herald to where I have been on international sanctions.

As to your specific point about supporting unilateral sanctions as well as international sanctions in the letter to Senator Boxer, it is a different situation to start with. We already have very effective international sanctions on Iran.

Senator WICKER. Are you saying that those two statements do not contradict each other, the one to the Omaha paper and the one to Senator Boxer?

Senator HAGEL. There are two points to it. Let me finish if I could, Senator, thank you, my second point.

My second point is this. Where we are with Iran today, the international sanctions that have been placed on Iran, that puts Iran and the United States in a far different place than where we were in 2000, or 1998, or 2001 when I did not support the reimposition. By the way, the Bush administration did not either. They did not want a 5-year reimposition for some of the same reasons that I questioned that reimposition of 5 years on ILSA.

But my point in making where we are today, connecting that to unilateral sanctions, then we have a different situation. Unilateral sanctions, because we have already got strong international sanctions, should be considered. I think the President is right to consider those. I would support that because it is different than it was in 2001 or 1998.

Senator WICKER. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Wicker.

Senator Hagan.

Senator HAGAN. Thank you. Senator Hagel, thank you for being here. Thank you for your service to our country and the military and your service in the U.S. Senate. I also want to thank your wife and your family for standing with you today.

You played an important role in supporting Vietnam veterans impacted by the exposure to Agent Orange. I have been involved in a similar set of issues facing veterans stationed at Camp Lejeune. They continue to search for answers about the effects of water contamination there. As many as a million marines and their families stationed at the base between the early 1950s and the 1980s may have been exposed to harmful chemicals that led to the development of cancer and other ailments.

The quest for answers in looking into this has been long. It has been drawn out, and the recognition that men, women, and children were dying or going broke paying out of pocket for their treatment while they were waiting for these various studies to be completed on the water contamination. We in Congress took action last year. The House and the Senate passed a bill that will provide for the treatment of veterans and their family members through the VA.

I continue to believe that the families of those stationed at Camp Lejeune during this time period, they deserve answers from the U.S. Government about who was exposed to the harmful chemicals, what impact that might have had on their health, and what the Government knew about this exposure.

I have been fighting for answers with a group of other committed Senators on a bipartisan basis. Along the way progress has been held up by endless bureaucratic delays and obstacles.

My question to you is, do you agree that these marines and their families deserve complete answers about the water contamination that occurred at Camp Lejeune? If confirmed, will you pledge to work with us to overcome any bureaucratic hurdles that may halt or delay the pursuit of answers for the affected marines and their family members?

Senator HAGEL. Thank you. You noted that we had a long conversation about this. I committed to you in your office. I will make that commitment in front of this committee. I will do that.

There should never, ever be a question about the health, and the safety, and the environment that we put our men and women and their families in when we ask them to make sacrifices to serve this country. I am committed to that, and we will have further conversations.

Senator HAGAN. Thank you. I know you have answered a number of questions about Israel already today, but I do have one I want to ask you also. There is a special and historic bond between the United States and Israel, and I am personally committed to Israel's security and identity as a Jewish state.

When we met earlier this week, I was pleased to hear you say you agree and that you also support a two-state solution and oppose any unilateral declaration of a Palestinian state.

We also discussed the need for a strong military and intelligence engagement between the United States and Israel. Just last fall I was in Israel, and I have spoken with senior military officials from both countries, and I have continually heard that the ties between our military and our intelligence organizations have never been stronger.

If confirmed, do you intend to maintain this close relationship, and do you have any ideas for how we can further strengthen this coordination?

Senator HAGEL. I would once again reaffirm the commitment that I made to you to this committee. I absolutely support the continuation and the strengthening of our relationship with Israel. As been noted before, in my book, a chapter I have on Israel, I talk about the special and historic relationship between the United States and Israel.

It is critically important that the qualitative military edge that we have assured Israel since 1948 be maintained and be enhanced. The Iron Dome is I think but one example. The latest military exercise we had with the Israelis last fall, Austere Challenge, it was the largest military exercise between our two countries in the history of our two countries. I think our intelligence agencies are working closer, and are stronger and more coordinated than ever before.

I think this President has done as much to support Israel as any president, as I mentioned earlier, since Harry Truman, and I would look forward to continuing to follow those policies and enhance those policies.

Senator HAGAN. Thank you. I wanted to ask a question on sequestration. Stopping sequestration from occurring is very important to me. In North Carolina, we have 7 military installations, and we have over 100,000 Active Duty servicemembers in my State. I believe that these cuts are going to harm our national security, will impair our readiness, will defer necessary maintenance that will help keep our troops safe and delay important investments in research and procurement, as well as stunt our economic recovery at this time.

I do not believe we can allow these cuts to move forward. Congress needs to work on a bipartisan basis on a balanced plan that will help eliminate this threat of sequestration. Also we have to reduce our deficit and protect the critical investments and areas in our national defense.

When we spoke earlier this week, I was pleased to hear you say that you did not support these indiscriminate, unprioritized cuts that sequestration would cause. If allowed to take effect, how will sequestration impact the Department's ability to meet the future threats and challenges?

As I shared with you, I chair the subcommittee of this committee on Emerging Threats and Capabilities, so I am particularly interested in your thoughts. You were commenting earlier to Senator Udall's questions on cyber security issues, which is obviously being considered in the Emerging Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee.

My question is, what impact do you believe that these cuts would have on our servicemembers and their families at home and abroad, and in particular the cuts—the sequestration, how would this impact areas such as cyber security and the other areas?

Senator HAGEL. First, as we have said this morning and you know, the Chiefs have made very clear and Secretary Panetta, there will be consequences, significant consequences to the management of our Defense Department and our ability to have the flexibility to make the decisions not just for the immediate, but for the future.

When you hang that kind of uncertainty over any institution, but especially the institution charged with national security in our country, it is very dangerous. Readiness is obviously the number one priority, and we will continue to do that. The Chiefs have already started to work through this, and I think in some of the public statements they have made, we are preparing for that. They will be prepared. If in the event the sequestration does take effect, we will be ready to deal with it. But this is going to be very difficult.

We talked a little earlier here this morning about how we are going to have to reduce training, steaming time, flying time. But I think the American people do need to be reassured, as I think Secretary Panetta and the Chiefs have, that the security of this country is not going to be in jeopardy. But it is going to be difficult, and it is going to affect longer-term kinds of planning.

But make no mistake, if this happens, this is going to be a severe problem.

Senator HAGAN. My time is up. Thank you for your comments.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Hagan, thank you so much. Now we were going to work right through the vote that is going on now, but we are going to take a 10-minute recess right now and come right back. Then we are going to call on Senator Ayotte and then Senator Manchin. They are next in line, and I urge them to go vote and come right back.

We will now recess for 10 minutes. [Recessed.]

Chairman LEVIN. We will come back to order.

Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank you, Senator Hagel, for your service to our country and for being here today in this important hearing, and I want to thank your family as well.

Senator Hagel, I think we have established, as I understand it from the prior questions you have been asked, in July 2001, you were one of only two Senators to vote against extending the Iran Sanctions Act, the sanctions in that act. That is a vote that you have agreed that you have taken. Correct?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator AYOTTE. Yes or no? Yes. That was when you were only one of two Senators in the entire Senate to vote against that.

Also, in 2008, I believe you were asked you were again one of two Senators within the Senate Banking Committee, though, not the entire Senate, to vote against the Comprehensive Iran Sanctions Accountability Act of 2008. Is that right?

Senator HAGEL. That is right.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Yes. I am sorry. Yes.

Senator AYOTTE. Yes, thank you, Senator.

As I understand it, on October 2, 2008, Majority Leader Harry Reid brought a similar bill to the floor. In fact, it was called the Comprehensive Iran Sanctions Accountability Act of 2008, and he brought it to the floor on October 2, 2008. There have been media reports that you blocked unanimous consent for the consideration of that bill. Are those true or not?

Senator HAGEL. I was one of some Republican Senators who did not want that vote to go forward. I voted against it in the subcommittee, and the reason I did was because the Bush administration did not want that bill to go forward.

The reason that they didn't is because they were involved in negotiations with the Russians in the U.N. and Security Council members to put multilateral sanctions on Iran.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you.

But just to be clear, you did block unanimous consent of that bill in 2008?

Senator HAGEL. I was part of an effort, yes. That is right.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay. Thank you.

Also, would it surprise you that an earlier version of that sanctions bill was actually cosponsored by Secretary Kerry, Secretary Clinton, and President Obama at the time? You were not a cosponsor. Would that surprise you?

Senator HAGEL. Well, no, not necessarily. I didn't ever base my votes, Senator, on what everybody else thought or did. I voted based on what I thought was right.

Senator AYOTTE. Also, we, of course, the sanctions that are in place now, that bill or its next generation passed the U.S. Senate after you left in a vote of 99 to 0, and no one in the Senate, in fact, voted against that. So that has been our clear policy of the bill, really the next generation of the bill that you blocked in the Senate.

I want to ask you also about your position with respect to involvement in the Global Zero report. I know many people have asked you questions about this.

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator AYOTTE. Here is what is troubling me. You have testified before this committee today that you have never been for unilateral nuclear disarmament. In other words, unilateral actions by the United States of America. Yet this report itself, which you call an illustration, its illustration or recommendation or however you want to frame it, is to actually—there are many recommendations in it.

One of them is to eliminate a leg of our triad, which is the land-based ICBMs. You would agree with that? That is the illustration that is contained in this report, or you call it an illustration. Is that right?

Senator HAGEL. I call it an illustration, Senator, because that is the term it used at the front end of the report.

Senator AYOTTE. Well, let us——

Senator HAGEL. Not a recommendation.

Senator AYOTTE. Let me talk about the other terms that this report uses because this report twice, as Senator Sessions asked you, on page 1 and on page 16 says that the illustrations or this example given in this report, one of which is eliminating a leg of our nuclear triad could be implemented unilaterally.

So here is what I am struggling with. Why would you ever put your name on a report that is inherently inconsistent with what you are telling us today is that you have never been for unilateral disarmament as a possibility?

Senator HAGEL. It is not inconsistent, I don't believe, Senator. But you used the term "could". That is a pretty important operative word in the report.

The report does not recommend we do these things. The report says "could," "illustrative," "scenarios," "possibilities". You probably know the four other individuals who were involved in that report, mainly General Cartwright, former strategic commander and——

Senator AYOTTE. Senator Hagel, I know we don't have a lot of time here. I don't dispute the qualifications or the service of the other individuals that are involved in this report. But of all the illustrations and of all the "coulds" you could pick, this report says that the President could implement these unilaterally, although that is inconsistent with what you say is your position. Yet you signed off on this.

This report also says of all the illustrations you could have picked, the illustration is eliminating a leg of our nuclear triad. One thing that troubles me is that of all the things that this group could have picked as what you call an illustration is a significant reduction in our nuclear deterrent.

To me, I view that as troubling and inconsistent. One thing I would hope you wouldn't do as Secretary of Defense is to sign off on a report that would say something like unilateral, like this one does, that could be implemented unilaterally that is different than your philosophy or our policy.

Senator HAGEL. As Secretary of Defense, I won't be signing off on reports in the same way as a private citizen. Obviously, I will have a different kind of responsibility if I am confirmed by the Senate.

But I don't think that there is anything that also changes my position in that report because it was a letter sent, which you may have, to the President of the United States——

Senator AYOTTE. Just so we are clear, and I am not—I don't want to interrupt you, but we just don't have a lot of time. Just so we are clear, you don't view what you are telling us today and the language in this report as inconsistent?

Senator HAGEL. I do not because it wasn't a recommendation. The report also says and the authors of it says, have always said, none of this can be any reductions unilateral, just like any strategic arms reduction treaty that we have signed, both Republican and Democrats have led on that, has to be bilateral, has to be verifiable, has to be negotiated.

I have always been there, and that is where we have been on this report.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay. Thank you.

May I follow up on the discussion about containment, nuclear containment with Iran? The first question I would have, as you said very clearly to Senator Levin, that you believe that a military option should be on the table with respect to Iran. In fact, I think you said, "I do, I have, and I strongly agree" in terms of that being one of the options the President of the United States would have in addressing Iran is the language that you said.

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator AYOTTE. Can you help me understand when you went to Islamabad, Pakistan, in 2006, you said at that time that a military strike against Iran, a military option is not a viable, feasible, or responsible option. It strikes me as what you are saying about the military option now seems inconsistent with that statement.

Why would you make that statement in Pakistan that it is not a viable, feasible, or responsible option in light of your statement today that you do, "I have, and I strongly agree" that a military option should be on the table?

Senator HAGEL. That statement was made in the context of all options regarding Iran, and Pakistan was where I was at the time. The larger context of that was nuclear powers, which certainly Pakistan is part of that club.

Not unlike what Secretary Gates said about a strike on Iran, my point was that this would not be a preferable option. There would be consequences to this option. Things would happen as a result of it.

If we could find a better option, a better way to deal with Iran to assure they do not get nuclear weapons, then we are far better off. That was the context of that statement.

Senator AYOTTE. Senator Hagel, I know that my time is up, and I know we will have an opportunity for a second round of questions. But as I see your quote, it didn't say preferable option. It said it was not a responsible option. I view those words as having a very different meaning.

So I look forward to following up in the subsequent round of questioning. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Manchin.

Senator MANCHIN. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hagel, thank you so much and your family for your service and for putting your services on the line for us. I appreciate it very much.

I would like to say this. You and I have not known each other before. I never had the pleasure of serving with you, which I wish I would have. We had a great conversation. You bring a breath of fresh air, truly a breath of fresh air to this process in a bipartisan way. Having two great Senators sitting by your side—one a Democrat, one a Republican—that basically support you wholeheartedly speaks volumes in the toxic process that we have today.

With that being said, also everyone has been so fixated on your past, what you have said, and I think I have come to learn in the very short time I have been a Senator that this town and this process and this body has become almost a guilt by conversation. With that being said, I respect you being the person being able to say what you thought needed to be said. You voted the way you thought you should be voting for your constituents and your country, and you weren't really driven by your party or by any pressure groups.

I can't tell you how much I wish I would have served with you. Sometimes I feel very lonely.

With all that being said, sir, we are asked to consider you as a part of the Cabinet. Is there anything that would lead us to believe that you wouldn't follow the orders that were given?

Senator HAGEL. No. I understand clearly the responsibilities of the Secretary of Defense. As I said in my opening statement, those responsibilities are very serious. I don't know of many jobs that are more serious, and I would obviously always make every decision for the Defense Department and my advice to the President based on only one thing, and that is the security of this country.

Senator MANCHIN. I looked back at your record. You and I come from the same era. We are very close in age, and I remember the Vietnam era very well. That, I think, shaped all of us to a certain extent of how we looked after, post-Vietnam, of how we would have looked at it if we would have known what we knew before.

I am sure that kind of guided you as you looked at this, Iraq, and I saw the information that we were given. If I had been a Senator, probably I might have voted also, like many people that were misled.

But after having seen 5 or 6 years of that unfortunate scenario play out, the surge, and I know where you are coming from, would you say that your experiences in Vietnam and looking at basically what sometimes our misguided mission had been shaped a lot of your positions today?

Senator HAGEL. There is no question that as I have said this morning, that my experience in Vietnam very much guided the questions. I think I noted a couple of times in my opening statement that it was one fundamental question that I always asked, was the policy worthy of the men and women that we are asking to make the sacrifices?

I know there are differences of opinion. You mentioned Iraq. You mentioned the surge. My positions there were very much guided by, well, what is the political purpose of the surge?

Senator MANCHIN. Right.

Senator HAGEL. Where do we go from here? Yes, you put 35,000 more American troops in an area for a sustained period of time or more on top of more than 100,000 we already had there, you will have a tactical victory. But there will be a cost for that victory.

That is what always guided me. Do we understand the costs? Are we prepared to make those costs in lives? Then where was the bigger answer here? Where were we going with the surge? How was this going to take us, advance us to where we needed to go, and where did we think we needed to go?

So, yes, those experiences did shape my questions.

Senator MANCHIN. I appreciate that. Let me just say that as speaking of now, what we deal with and the concerns that people had with your nomination, the support of Israel, I have no doubt in my mind your support of Israel as our greatest ally and would always be there. I think you have answered that. I think we all feel very comfortable with that.

Also your commitment that Iran should not under any circumstance have the ability to have a nuclear weapon, and I appreciate that position very much.

Where we go with the strength of our Army if we have our military might in DOD, the National Guard, how does the National Guard play in your role of thinking of what they should be doing and what they could be doing?

Senator HAGEL. The National Guard now has a chair at the table with the Joint Chiefs. General Grass represents the National Guard effectively, a new chief. But their role will continue to be important, as will the Reserves.

I think we saw over the last 12 years of war how important our National Guard is and the Reserves. We could not have conducted those two wars without the National Guard and Reserves. I think that has professionalized both Services. They are going to continue to be necessary. They are important.

Their training, their credibility, their leadership, that is obviously why the decision was made to assure their representation with the Joint Chiefs, and I strongly support the National Guard and Reserves.

Senator MANCHIN. Personnel, I think that Senator McCaskill touched on things I am very concerned about. Every time I hear about the sequestering and people tell me that if we do a sequestering it could destroy our ability to defend ourselves and have the military might that we do.

Now I don't see that whatsoever, and I followed the statistics. I followed all the post-war eras from starting with Korea and Vietnam, Cold War, and where we are today. This will be the least amount of money that we have asked to draw down under any post-war time. But yet everyone is hollering that it will be devastating.

I know there is a way to do that, but the contracting. We are having a hard time getting our hands around the contracting, the cost of contracting, the ability for people in the contracting world to be reimbursed by over $700,000, almost twice what the President gets paid. Some of these things, would you embrace working with us and sitting down and looking and embracing an audit?

Myself and Senator Tom Coburn have had legislation asking for a complete audit of DOD. Your thoughts on those two things, sir?

Senator HAGEL. Of course, I will, and as I have noted this morning, I am committed to do that. I will do it.

Accountability is a primary responsibility of any institution or organization. That is clearly in the purview of Congress. We have to do it. We have to improve on the process.

We talked a little bit this morning about the astounding amount of waste, fraud, and abuse the Inspector General, Special Inspectors General both in Iraq and Afghanistan have found. I am committed, as I have said, to assure that we make that deadline of 2017 on the audits, and I will work with you closely on that.

Senator MANCHIN. My time is up, and one thing I want to state that we talked about in my office is the commitment to help our returning veterans get jobs. The Jobs Caucus, "I Hire a Vet," it is so important. I appreciate your support for that. I look forward to working with you that we can put more of our vets back to work when they come home and get them back into mainstream America.

Thank you, sir. I look forward to voting for you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Manchin.

Senator Fischer.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Mr. Inhofe.

Good afternoon, Senator. It is good to see you again.

Senator HAGEL. Thanks.

Senator FISCHER. I want to begin by thanking you for your service to our country and to the State of Nebraska. I do appreciate your continued willingness to serve the United States.

But I need to be honest with you. After our meeting last week, I still have some concerns about your nomination. Many of my colleagues are concerned that you have changed your views, and I share that concern. But I must admit that I am more worried that your views have not changed.

From your meeting with me last week, it was clear that you maintain the views that have led to so much scrutiny of your nomination. Despite these recent claims to the contrary, you continue to hold, I believe, extreme views far to the left of even this administration.

In particular, your clear statement to me during our meeting that if given the opportunity to recast your vote on the Iranian sanctions, you would still oppose those sanctions. I believe that indicates that you hold these concerning views.

Our Nation faces many challenges, perhaps none greater or more immediate than Iran's continued progress towards obtaining nuclear weapons. At the same time, DOD is entering a period of transformation that will likely define its role for many decades to come. The future of our nuclear deterrent could depend on our choices made by the next Secretary of Defense.

I am going to bring up the report that we have heard about quite a bit. You are listed as a coauthor of that May 2012 Global Zero report on our nuclear posture. I believe there is a recommendation in there, and I believe that the recommendation is to drastically reduce the U.S. nuclear forces.

When we spoke last week, you described this report as being authored by General Cartwright. I had the impression, and I believe you implied to me, that you weren't closely affiliated with it. But you are listed as a coauthor of that report, as one of the five coauthors.

Moreover, you told me at that time that this report discussed options. You have reiterated that stance today. But after I have reexamined it once again, the only options that I have found in the report are related to how best achieve those drastic reductions that I believe it advises. There are no alternative views or dissenting opinions that are presented or discussed in the report.

It states many controversial opinions. It states them as facts in support of its conclusion, and I believe it is important to determine whether or not you agree with those positions. As it has been said before, my time here is limited, and so I would like to quickly go through and review some of those more concerning proclamations that it makes with you. I would appreciate if we could kind of go through this quickly.

For example, the U.S. ICBM force has lost its central utility. That is stated in the report. Do you agree with that?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, that report was not a recommendation. That report, as we have said, was a series of scenarios. Again, I use the term "illustrative" because that was the beginning of the report as possible ways we could continue to reduce our warheads. Not unilaterally, but bilaterally.

Every treaty we have ever signed to reduce warheads and the thrust capability with the Russians has been about reduction. So that is not new. That is where it has always been.

But ICMBs, your specific question, it is a 25-page report. I assume you have read it. It talked about one of the reasons ICBMs may well eventually be insignificant because of the overflight over Russia and so on. Now those aren't fictional analyses. Those are facts.

Now no one is recommending in that report—and you probably know General Cartwright. When he was in Omaha, you probably got acquainted with him. These are serious people who understand this business, and no one is recommending that we unilaterally do away with our ICBMs.

What that report was about was looking at where this is all going. Again, the title of the report was "Modernizing Our Nuclear Strategy," not eliminating it.

Senator FISCHER. Correct. But do you agree with the statement made in the report that the ICBMs, that force has lost its central utility?

Senator HAGEL. That is not what the report said.

Senator FISCHER. I have it—I have it cited, Senator. With respect, I can enter that into the record. But it is cited in the report.

Senator HAGEL. The report, in the overall context, ICBMs and all of the parts of that report were about the utilities of our triad, where is this going, and the money that we are investing in it, and we have to look at it. I think those kinds of reports are valuable to assess our needs, to assess our nuclear capability, to assess our nuclear deterrent.

I mean, we do studies all the time. This was not an official report from an official government. Think tanks do this all the time. I think that is valuable.

Now whether policymakers——

Senator FISCHER. Excuse me. I, too, think that reports from various organizations—think tanks, individuals, groups—I think those are all very important in getting information and opinions out there. But when you coauthor a report, I think you should be able to answer if you agree with statements that are made in the report.

Senator HAGEL. I do not agree with any recommendation that would unilaterally take any action to further reduce our nuclear warheads on our capability. But again, that is not what the report said.

But I do not agree with that. Every option that we must look at, every action we must take to reduce warheads or anything should be bilateral. It should be verifiable. It should be negotiated.

Senator FISCHER. Every action that this country takes needs to be bilateral?

Senator HAGEL. I didn't say that. I said in nuclear capabilities in our warheads. When we are talking about reducing warheads, as every treaty we have signed with the Russians has been bilateral. It has been verifiable.

Ronald Reagan said it best, "Trust, but verify". I think that is the key word. He also said, as I said this morning, we should wipe nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth.

I think almost every President has agreed with that, including, by the way, this President, who has seen this report. World leaders do agree with the continued reduction, and this is not a report that is out of the mainstream at all. President Obama has said in his Prague speech in 2009 that that was his goal, as Ronald Reagan did, as many Presidents did.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you.

If I could continue on this vein of questioning, please? Also, as I read the report, it calls for all U.S. tactical nuclear weapons to be eliminated over the next 10 years and asserts that their military utility is practically nil.

Do you agree with that statement?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, I don't believe it calls for that. These are scenarios and schedules and possibilities and options. But none of this could ever, ever happen unless it would be negotiated, bilateral, and verifiable. That was part of a letter that the Global Zero growth group sent to the President in 2009 specifically stating that.

If I might give you a more recent example of that. Senator Feinstein's subcommittee——

Senator FISCHER. Just a quick one, please.

Senator HAGEL.—had a hearing on this last year. In that hearing, and the committee can get the transcript if it doesn't have it, General Cartwright and Ambassador Pickering testified. They went into this, that this is all, everything with any action we would take would have to be negotiated. It would have to be bilateral. No unilateral action.

They made that point again on the record in front of Senator Feinstein's subcommittee. I support that. I agree with that.

Senator FISCHER. I have another statement from the report. The U.S. ICBM rapid reaction posture remains in operation and runs a real risk of accidental or mistaken launch.

I think that statement is pretty clear. Do you agree with that?

Senator HAGEL. Yes. I mean, I think accidental launches and those kinds of things are always to be concerned about. We need to assure, as we have over the years, that that doesn't happen, both on the Russian side——

Senator FISCHER. That we run a real risk of accidental or mistaken launch?

Senator HAGEL. Well, you take "real" out. You could just put risk. But there is always a risk. I mean, when we are talking about nuclear weapons and the consequences, you don't get a lot of second chances. We need to be very sure about these things, and I think that was the whole point.

Chairman LEVIN. I think you need to save any additional questions for the second round, if you would today.

Senator FISCHER. Oh, I am sorry. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. You may not have gotten a card. I am sorry if you didn't.

Senator FISCHER. Oh, thank you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you, Senator.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Fischer.

Senator Gillibrand.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Senator Hagel, for testifying today.

I appreciate that you have brought your family with you. I appreciate the support of your wife.

I am going to submit several questions for the record because they are important to me as the Senator from New York, particularly about New York bases, cybersecurity, and children of military families with disabilities. But today, I want to focus on the most urgent issues from my perspective. I want to talk more about your thoughts on Israel and Israel's security. I want to talk about Afghanistan, and I want to talk about personnel issues.

On Israel. Obviously, our relationship with Israel is tremendously important to Israel, and we are fundamentally tied to them because of being such a strong democracy in the Middle East and having our national securities very much being tied in many ways.

We talked quite a bit about Iran, and you have clarified your position that containment is not an option. I am concerned about a statement you said with regard to Iran. A nuclear Iran is an existential threat to the United States, as well as Israel. The Iranian Government has been responsible for the deaths of U.S. servicemembers, an attempted attack on U.S. soil, and the funding, training of terrorist groups.

Their latest in a long list of direct threats to Israel came just today. I want to make sure that in your statement earlier today with regard to whether Iran is legitimate, I can understand if you meant it is a legal entity that has international relations and has diplomatic relations and is a member of the U.N. But I do not see Iran or the Iranian Government as a legitimate government, and I would like your thoughts on that.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Senator.

What I meant to say, should have said, it is recognizable. It has been recognized, is recognized at the United Nations. Most of our allies have embassies there. That is what I should have said, and thank you.

Senator GILLIBRAND. You are welcome.

With regard to Israel, Israel's security is very important, and I have been one of the strongest advocates for our alliance, fighting for more increases in missile defense cooperation as well as coordination on a number of the technology programs that are fundamental to Israel's security.

Last year, Iron Dome more than proved itself as missiles from Gaza continually headed towards Israel. In December, Ranking Member Inhofe and I successfully pushed for full funding of the U.S.-Israel cooperative missile defense systems.

Will you personally support robust funding for Iron Dome, David's Sling, and other programs? If we have to have a Continuing Resolution, the funding for Iron Dome will be well below the authorized amount for fiscal year 2013. In such a case, will you recommend either reprogramming other funds or sending forth an anomaly budget requesting to fully cover our commitment to this program?

Senator HAGEL. First, I fully support and will continue to fully support Iron Dome and Arrow and David's Sling. As to a commitment to the second part of your question, I would have to better understand what our restrictions are going to be in our budgets before I could make any decisions like that, and I would have to talk with our Chairman of the Joint Chiefs and each of the chiefs and want to better understand, depending on how bad and deep this sequestration might get.

But make no mistake. It is clearly a priority program. I believe we will continue to fund it. We should. I will support the continuing funding.

Senator GILLIBRAND. I hope you will also be a strong advocate because our budget is, even under sequestration, significant. This is a very high priority certainly for me.

Senator HAGEL. If I am confirmed, we will work together, as I will with this committee, on this and other issues.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you.

A number of members were just in Egypt, and we met with President Morsi. Obviously, we are very concerned about the Sinai becoming a route for arms coming straight from Libya going to terrorist groups. We, obviously, are very concerned about we give $1.2 billion to Egypt in aid, and we want to figure out if there is a way to put some of those funds towards more anti-terrorism missions as opposed to the typical technology.

Do you have any thoughts on that and what we can do to really try to assist in cracking down on the weapons trade?

Senator HAGEL. It is a huge challenge and part of obviously what allows terrorists, extremists to advance their cause. Maritime security, piracy issues, I mentioned in my opening statement that is all part of why we need to rebalance resources and why we need the kind of flexible, agile resource base—in particular our Navy—to be able to do this.

It also is going to continue to take cooperation with our allies. We can't do this alone. As good as our intelligence is, the best in the world, best military in the world, we are the largest, wealthiest country in the world. But we have to work with allies, and we have to find that through intelligence before it gets beyond the capacity to be used to do damage against the interests of this country and our allies.

Senator GILLIBRAND. As Israel is one of our most important allies, one of the growing risks we have now is Syria, particularly chemical weapons being not properly locked down. There is concern, and obviously with what happened yesterday, I suspect that there has been very close cooperation between our militaries on contingency plans with respect to Syria's chemical weapons. But will this be something that you can focus your concern on because of your past statements about the Israel-Hezbollah war in 2006?

Is this something that you will also commit to and keeping this alliance strong and making sure we have a strong contingency plan with regard to any chemical weapons coming out of Syria?

Senator HAGEL. Yes. By the way, I have said on the record many times that Hezbollah and Hamas are terrorist groups, and I have said many times on the record that Iran is a state sponsor of terrorism. So, yes, I am committed to do that and will do that.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Okay. For my last minute, with regard to Afghanistan, we have heard your views, and you didn't give a specific statement about how many troops when. But will you, in your capacity as Secretary of Defense, advise the President that we should be drawing down troops sooner rather than later?

Senator HAGEL. I think he has made that pretty clear that he wants to do that. If I am confirmed, I will need to better understand all the dimensions of this. I don't know all those dimensions. I think that there is little question that—and I support completely where the President wants to go in Afghanistan and his commitment to unwind that war.

As we have said, there should be, there will be. He has noted that he will, in fact, enforce a new policy and new relationship based on a limited objective for our troops there, and I support that.

Senator GILLIBRAND. My last question that I will submit more for the record, but you and I talked at length about it. Obviously, the personnel of our military is our most important asset, and when we hear reports that there are upwards of 19,000 sexual assaults in the military against women, it is unacceptable.

We also have finally repealed "Don't Ask, Don't Tell". But it is difficult for a military spouse to even go to the commissary and be on base or be notified if a spouse is killed in action. I will need a strong commitment from you that you will treat our military families and look after them in the way you would look after your own.

I want you to be concerned about every man and woman in the military, that their well-being is being looked after, and see real advocacy and leadership. Not status quo. Not implementing whatever we put forward. But actually fighting for them every single day.

Senator HAGEL. You have my complete commitment on that. I have made that commitment to, I think, all members of the committee that I have spoken to directly and privately.

Again, I mentioned that point in my opening statement, you will recall. I think I have a pretty clear record on that in my life. I will continue to do that, will do that, and I agree it is not good enough just to say zero tolerance. The whole chain of command needs to be accountable for this, all the way down to the bottom. So I will.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Gillibrand.

Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hagel, congratulations on your appointment. You are a good, honest man, and I really appreciate your willingness to serve the country in the past and be willing to do so in the future.

What percentage of the gross domestic product do we spend on defense?

Senator HAGEL. We are, I think, it is probably 5 percent now in that area in our budget, our discretionary budget——

Senator GRAHAM. Is that historically high or low?

Senator HAGEL. I think generally depends on real dollars and wars, but—

Senator GRAHAM. Are we at war?

Senator HAGEL. We are at war in Afghanistan. We are at war around the world with active threat——

Senator GRAHAM. So you agree with me we are at war in Afghanistan? We are at war around the world. So when you look at spending on defense, every Senator should be aware of the fact we are still at war. Do you agree with that?

Senator HAGEL. I am sorry. What is your question?

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree that every Senator, every Member of Congress should be wide-eyed and understanding that when you vote on a defense budget we are at war?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, I do.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Thank you.

Now let us talk a little bit about statements you made. You have explained this a bit. You said, "The Jewish lobby intimidates a lot of people up here. I am not an Israeli senator. I am a U.S. Senator. This pressure makes us do dumb things at times."

You have said the Jewish lobby should not have been—that term shouldn't have been used. It should have been some other term. Name one person, in your opinion, who is intimidated by the Israeli lobby in the U.S. Senate.

Senator HAGEL. Well, first——
Senator GRAHAM. Name one.
Senator HAGEL. I don't know.
Senator GRAHAM. Well, why would you say it?
Senator HAGEL. I didn't have in mind a specific——
Senator GRAHAM. First, do you agree it is a provocative statement? That I can't think of a more provocative thing to say about the relationship between the United States and Israel and the Senate or Congress than what you said.

Name one dumb thing we have been goaded into doing because of the pressure from the Israeli or Jewish lobby.

Senator HAGEL. I have already stated that I regret the terminology I used.

Senator GRAHAM. But you said back then it makes us do dumb things. You can't name one Senator intimidated. Now give me one example of the dumb things that we are pressured to do up here.

Senator HAGEL. We were talking in that interview about the Middle East, about positions, about Israel. That is what I was referring to.

Senator GRAHAM. So give me an example of where we have been intimidated by the Israeli/Jewish lobby to do something dumb regarding the Mideast, Israel, or anywhere else.

Senator HAGEL. Well, I can't give you an example.
Senator GRAHAM. Thank you.

Do you agree with me you shouldn't have said something like that?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, I do. I have already said that.

Senator GRAHAM. Now do you agree with me that Hezbollah is a terrorist organization?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. Now, in 2006, you were 1 of 12 Senators who refused to sign the letter to the EU asking them to designate Hezbollah as a terrorist organization for the purposes of the EU sanctioning Hezbollah. Why were you 1 of 12 who refused to sign that letter?

Senator HAGEL. Because I have generally had a policy during my time in the Senate that I didn't think it was the right approach for the Congress of the United States to be sending leaders any instructions or any documents versus letting our President do that. As I have already stated——

Senator GRAHAM. Why did you sign the letter to Bill Clinton, urging him to deal with the Russians when it comes to their policy against Jewish people?

Senator HAGEL. Because I think that is the appropriate approach because I think it is our President who conducts foreign policy.

Senator GRAHAM. All I could suggest to you is that when a letter is presented to a U.S. Senator about the times in which we live in, you can't write one letter and not write the other and, in my view, be consistent.

The letter was urging the EU to impose sanctions on Hezbollah, and you have been a big believer that we shouldn't go it alone. We shouldn't do it unilaterally. Why in the world wouldn't you take this chance to urge the EU to go ahead and sanction Hezbollah because it may help the world at large deal with this terrorist organization? Your answer is you just don't think we should be writing letters?

Senator HAGEL. That wasn't my answer. My answer was I think the President of the United States is the appropriate official——

Senator GRAHAM. So Congress has no interest at all in whether or not the EU would designate Hezbollah as a terrorist organization? Do you think that is our role up here, that we should just stay out of those things?

Senator HAGEL. Congress has an interest and responsibility in all things. But I——

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. I got you. Apparently not there.

Now let me ask you this about the Iranian Revolutionary Guard. You said just a minute ago you think they are a terrorist organization. Do you agree with that?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. You voted against the amendment designating them a terrorist organization because you thought we would be going down the wrong road by doing that because they are a recognized state. Iran, you wouldn't want to designate the army of a recognized state as a terrorist organization?

Senator HAGEL. I said that Iran is a state sponsor of terrorism. I also just clarified a statement on Iran being a recognized nation by the United Nations, by most world bodies. The reason again, I will explain it again, why I did not vote, as 22 other members did——

Senator GRAHAM. Right.

Senator HAGEL.—because I think Jim Webb's argument was a strong argument, and that was we have never—this is what he said on the floor—designated part of a government as a terrorist organization. Thereby what his concern was, as was mine and other Senators who voted against it, would this be then tantamount to giving the President of the United States authority from Congress to take military action against Iran?

Senator GRAHAM. I got you. Now let me just ask you this. Do you believe that the sum total of all of your votes—refusing to sign a letter to the EU asking Hezbollah to be designated a terrorist organization, being 1 of 22 to not vote to designate the Iranian Revolutionary Guard a terrorist organization, being one of two on two occasions to vote against sanctions that this body was trying to impose on Iran, the statements you have made about Palestinians and about the Jewish lobby—all that together, that the image you have created is one of sending the worst possible signal to our enemies and friends at one of the most critical times in world history?

Senator HAGEL. No, I would not agree with that because I have taken actions and made statements very clear as to what I believed Hezbollah and Hamas are as terrorist organizations. In fact, Senator——

Senator GRAHAM. If you there was a vote on the floor of the Senate this afternoon to label the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, the people who have killed our soldiers in Iraq, some of the most vicious people to the people of Iran themselves, if there were a vote tomorrow or this afternoon or after lunch, would you still vote no?

Senator HAGEL. Well, I would want to know from the President what they were doing, but again——

Senator GRAHAM. I mean, you read the paper. You watch TV. You have any doubt what they are doing? They are expanding terrorism. They are trying to intimidate their own people. They are the instrument of the theocracy to oppress their own people, and they are the biggest supporter of the regime keeping them in power so then they can get a nuclear weapon.

If you had a chance tomorrow, today, after lunch to vote to say that the Iranian Revolutionary Guard was a terrorist organization, would you still vote no?

Senator HAGEL. Well, the reason I voted no to start with began with the same——

Senator GRAHAM. Well, I know why. You told me that. My question is——

Senator HAGEL. That hasn't changed.

Senator GRAHAM.—would you reconsider, and would you vote yes this time, or would you still vote no?

Senator HAGEL. Well, times change. I recognize that, and yes, I would reconsider. But the whole theory——

Senator GRAHAM. Well, thank you. That is encouraging.

My time is up, but we will have another round.

Senator Inhofe said that you were one of four Senators who refused to sign a letter in October. The first paragraph says, "We write to you to express our solidarity with the State of Israel at this moment of crisis and our profound disappointment and frustration with Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority. We are dismayed that they would allow violence by Palestinians to be carried out without restraint or comment."

This was when the Intifada was being raging, and Senator Inhofe, led by Daschle and Lott, wanted a letter from every member of this body to clearly put us on record that we believe Arafat and the Intifada is undercutting the agreements they had reached and that they had resorted to violence to intimidate the Israeli Government and people in a way that was just absolutely unacceptable.

If you had a chance to do it over, would you sign this letter now? I am going to give it to you during whatever break we have and ask you to reconsider. I would ask you, Senator Hagel, to tell the country, the world at large, particularly the State of Israel, you made a mistake by not signing that letter.

Senator HAGEL. Who is the letter to?

Senator GRAHAM. I think it goes to the President. Is that who it was to? It was the President.

Senator HAGEL. I will look at it. I don't recall the letter, and I will look at it and give you an answer.

Senator GRAHAM. All I can say, it was a very big deal at a very important time. The lack of signature by you runs chills up my spine because I can't imagine not signing a letter like that at a time when it really mattered.

We will continue this conversation. Thank you.

United States Senate
October 12, 2000

The President
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Mr. President:

We write to you to express our solidarity with the State of Israel at this moment of crisis and our profound disappointment and frustration with PLO Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority. We are dismayed that they would allow violence by Palestinians to be carried out without restraint or comment.

Resorting to violence constitutes a fundamental violation of the Peace Process. Following the signing of the Declaration of Principles in September 1993, Chairman Arafat wrote Israeli Prime Minister Rabin that:

The PLO commits itself to the Middle East Peace process, and to a peaceful resolution of the conflict between the two sides ad declares that all outstanding issues in relation to permanent status will be resolved through negotiations.

The PLO considers that the signing of the Declaration of Principles constitutes a historic event, inaugurating a new epoch of peaceful coexistence, free from violence and all other acts which endanger peace ad stability. Accordingly, the PLO renounces the use of terrorism and other acts of violence, and will assume responsibility over all PLO elements and personnel in order to assure their compliance, prevent violations and discipline violators.

It was on the basis of these assurances that Prime Minister Rabin, among other things, recognized the PLO.

We are deeply concerned at the continuing, coordinated campaign of Palestinian violence. That campaign leads us to believe that Arafat either seeks to use violence as a negotiating tool to extort even further concessions from the Government of Israel, or that he in fact intends to end the peace process in its entirety as a prelude to a unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood.

This stands in contrast to what the Government of Israel has -sought throughout this crisis. We note, for example, that the Government of Israel proposed unprecedented compromises to achieve a final peace agreement Despite subsequent provocations, despite the violence, despite the wanton destruction of Joseph's Tomb -a revered Jewish holy site-Israel has sought to see the violence stopped so that peace negotiations could be resumed. Yet, Arafat has failed to issue a statement to the Palestinian community that violence is unacceptable, unlike Prime Minister Barak who has said publicly that "I urge our Jewish citizens to refrain from attacking Arabs and their property under any circumstances."

We urge you to express American solidarity with Israel at this crucial moment, to condemn the Palestinian campaign of violence, to do everything possible to secure the return of the three kidnaped Israeli soldiers from Lebanon, and to stand with Israel in international arenas - not only because we should, but because such actions are also the best way to restore the negotiating process. Arafat vast understand that he will achieve none of his political objectives through violence, that a unilateral declaration of statehood will not be recognized by the United States that only through negotiations can the Palestinians' legitimate political aspirations be realized, and that abandoning the negotiating process will have serious repercussions.

This is a very dangerous hour in the Middle East. America's open and abiding commitment to the security of Israel is the surest way to see our way safely through it.

Sincerely yours,

[Signatures of 96 senators beginning with Trent Lott and Tom Daschle]

The four Senators who did not sign this letter are:
Spencer Abraham, R–MI
Robert Byrd, D–WV
Judd Gregg, R–NH
Chuck Hagel, R–NE

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Graham.

We now will go to Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to join, Senator Hagel, in thanking you for your service, thanking your family, and expressing appreciation not only to you for your service in uniform, but also afterward to our veterans, which people may not appreciate as much as they do your military service, but I think is every bit as important to our Nation.

I just want to say about that letter, I wasn't here when the letter was circulated. I would have signed it, but I would certainly join in urging that you reconsider and commit to the statement of support in the letter for the State of Israel. If it is appropriate now and applicable to today's events, I hope you will consider expressing your support for it.

I noted in your opening statement that no single quote and no single vote define you in the entirety, and perhaps not as a whole, but votes and quotes do matter. I think that the questions about what you have said and what you have done in the past are entirely appropriate, and I think also reconsidering or your views evolving is also appropriate.

I am going to be submitting questions on some of the topics that you have heard. You and I have discussed some of these questions. I might say your private meetings with members of this body have been very productive and effective, as you have seen in some of the comments that have been expressed here. So, the more we hear from you, I think the better you do on many of these issues.

I want to begin by talking about one issue that concerns our veterans, and particularly our Vietnam veterans. Many Vietnam veterans in Connecticut and around the country received less than honorable discharge as a result of conduct that was a direct consequence of post-traumatic stress (PTS), at a time PTS was not a term, not diagnosed, not treated.

But they have to live with the consequences of a less than honorable discharge. They have to live with fewer benefits often. I would like a commitment from you that DOD will reevaluate and revisit perhaps some of those individual cases as well as its general policies to take account of the fact that we now know that many of those veterans during the Vietnam era suffered from PTS or related kinds of injuries.

Senator HAGEL. You have my commitment to do everything I can about that. I understand the issue pretty well, been working on this issue long before I actually ever got to the Senate. So I will.

Thank you.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

I would like the same kind of commitment that you have expressed very persuasively on the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" on the issue of sexual assaults. This issue bedevils the military. I don't know whether you have seen an excellent documentary called "The Invisible War"?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I know you are familiar with this issue. I commend you for what you have said to me privately, and I would ask that your commitment not only to the prosecution and holding accountable people who are involved in this criminal conduct, but also to the victims so that they receive the kind of services that in the civilian world many of them do through victim's advocates in the courts and similar kinds of roles played.

So both to prosecution—effective, vigorous, zealous—but also to protection of the victims. Can you commit to that?

Senator HAGEL. Absolutely, I will commit to that, yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. On the strategic issues, I wonder if I could talk to you for a moment about submarines, which you and I discussed privately briefly. DOD, the Joint Chiefs, and the President have all committed to an Ohio-class replacement program that consists of a fleet of 12, starting no later than 2031.

The Global Zero report settled on a lower number, 10. I strongly believe that the cost will increase, the cost per submarine, and that we will be at severe risk, for reasons that you may well understand, although we can't really discuss them in detail here because I think they may be classified. I would like a commitment that you are committed as well to a fleet of 12 Ohio-class replacement submarines.

Senator HAGEL. On that issue, I would want to talk with our Chief of Naval Operations to get a better understanding of our budget. I can tell you this. I am committed completely to modernizing our Navy and everything it includes and will require. I will give you that commitment.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I am sure you know that the Ohio-class replacement program is really the cornerstone of our nuclear deterrence.

Senator HAGEL. I do.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Vital to our national security, but it requires clear leadership and support from the next Secretary of Defense. I hope you will perhaps come back to us on that issue.

Senator HAGEL. I will. You and I will be discussing this, I am sure, many times if I am confirmed. So thank you.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Going to the Virginia-class submarines, the next multiyear purchase, known as Block IV, envisions 10 submarines. There is a threat that it could be reduced to nine. For reasons related to both cost and national security, I think that number should be 10.

The intent and spirit of the last NDAA was that it should be 10, and I would like to ask you, similarly, for your commitment that there will be 2 submarines for 2014 and that the program continues to be viable at the level of 10.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, I will commit to what we have committed to carry out what we need to fund and develop and build in order to maintain the kind of modern Navy we are going to require. Those submarines, as you note, are cornerstones to that security.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. They are absolutely vital cornerstones, essential building blocks to our national security as we move to the Pacific-Asia theater and seek to advance our interests there. They have the intelligence, reconnaissance, and surveillance capability as well as, as you well know, counterterrorism, the importance. I hope that that effort will continue, and I appreciate your commitment.

Let me just finish with a question that I think goes back to the contracting area where you were asked questions before. Senator Ayotte and I, in a trip led by Senator McCain, recently visited Afghanistan and were briefed—and I am going to try to make this question brief—about the continuing corruption in the Afghanistan Government. Deeply troubling and even shocking.

But equally so is the waste of American taxpayer dollars in part because of the procedural roadblock to enforcement of section 841. I am not going to quiz you on 841. So you can take a deep breath there. But 841 is designed to protect American tax dollars from corrupt contracts that, in fact, go to benefit the enemy.

We are working revisions that will make more effective the procedures for terminating those contracts, getting back American dollars, extending those protections to nondefense dollars, and I hope that we can have your commitment as well to work with us on that area.

Senator HAGEL. You have my commitment, and I will enthusiastically work with you on this area.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I appreciate your frank and forthright answers, and I don't know whether I will be here for the second round of questioning, but I want to express my sincere gratitude to you for your willingness to serve and your patience and forthrightness in answering all our questions.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Blumenthal.

Senator Blunt.

Senator BLUNT. Thank you, Chairman.

Senator Hagel, thank you for being here today. Thank you for your service to the country in so many ways and your willingness to serve again. To see your wife and your brothers there behind you is an indication of the family commitment as well as your personal commitment.

There are several things that I may get to in a second round on Iran and sanctions. I was very involved in that unilateral sanctions effort when I was in the House of Representatives. We drafted some of that legislation in my office when I was in the House.

Our relationship with Israel is of great concern to me, and it is a priority to our efforts in the Middle East. I think that is largely exhausted in this first round, at least from my point of view. I may want to come back to some of it later.

I want to talk a little bit about the ongoing structure of the force. The Wall Street Journal in an editorial today said that the current American military was the smallest, least modern, and least battle-ready in recent memory.

I don't think that means we are not maybe more modern than anybody else in the world or more battle ready than anybody else in the world. But I think that is a recognition that our investment and the way we have used those resources has gotten them in a position where we maybe need to be more focused on rebuilding than we do building down.

Secretary Panetta has been very forthcoming in his comments about the sort of across-the-board cutting approach of sequestration. What do we do to get our worn-out equipment and our worn-out personnel in a better position a year from now than they are right now? Your brief strategic view of that because I don't have very much time here.

Senator HAGEL. Yes. Senator, you have just identified one of the priorities of the next few years at DOD. Resetting equipment and essentially reshaping our force structure, but also renewing our force structure.

The fact is we have been at war for 12 years. Every Senator here knows and you have constituents that we keep sending these kids back and back and back to two wars. Of course, there is going to be a consequence. Something is going to break down, not only your equipment, but your manpower. You can't keep doing that.

So that is going to be an overall challenge, Senator, that is going to take as much of my time, if I am confirmed, as anything, as it will our Chiefs. Our Chiefs know this better than anyone, as we structure, rebalance, renew, and re-outfit.

We have, I believe, a force structure that is as capable as ever. I don't accept that our force structure is somehow behind or not modern or not capable. I don't think that is true.

Senator BLUNT. I think the point that the editorial was making was not that we were behind, but we are not at the quite as far on the cutting edge as we may have been. I would hope you and I would both want to see us get there.

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator BLUNT. Let me ask a question about that. Secretary Gates said recently that one of his big concerns was that we repeat the mistakes of what I think he referred to as a "procurement holiday" that we took in the 1970s and then, to some extent, again in the 1990s. We spent a lot of time in the 10 years after that trying to get built back up to where we had hoped to be.

How, in these discussions of cutting, do we keep the lines open, do we keep our effort ongoing? One of the things that I know quite a bit about is the F–18 line because it is in St. Louis, MO, where Boeing Military is. I do know that if you ever close that line down, we are always talking about, well, what other country needs some version of this, and how do we keep our capacity at a time when there is this talk about cutting and not just cutting, but sort of cutting everything a little bit, which means that some of the things that get cut a little bit I think disappear because they can't survive if they are only partly there.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, you have just again identified one of the great challenges that lies ahead, and that is maintaining our industrial base. You use the F–18.

Senator BLUNT. There are lots of other lines. That just happens to be the one I have been on the most times.

Senator HAGEL. No, I understand. But that is a good example of what we are going to have to continue to keep strong.

The reality is, as you say, because we know what we have to deal with, what our budgets are as a result of the Budget Act of 2011. What we don't know brings us back to the uncertainty of sequestration. Some of the examples you are using are good examples of areas that will and can be, could be cut arbitrarily in order to fulfill budget requirements.

I think what you have just noted again is going to be a huge part of keeping our technological superiority, our edge. Senator Blumenthal mentioned submarines. That is another component of this. All the superior technical edge this country has possessed since World War II has kept us, along with other things and for other reasons, the strongest military power in the history of man. That must be maintained.

Threats change. Cyber is a good example. I mean, 10 years ago, nobody had any idea what we were talking about, cyber. Even 5 years ago. We have to adjust to that challenge, that reality.

Senator BLUNT. Let me see if I can——

Senator HAGEL. The core base, though, Senator, is exactly right, and we have to protect that.

Senator BLUNT. We do. We have made efforts with our allies and friends to give them some other version of equipment we had, maybe not quite as good as we had, but something that keeps our defense procurement lines in place so that when we do need them, they are still there. That is critically important.

Before you were designated Secretary of Defense, as the potential nominee for this job, in talking about sequestration, you made a comment about there is lots of bloat—I am sure you have talked about this comment quite a bit and are very familiar with it, more than you were before you made it probably—in the Pentagon. What do you have in mind there?

What is being done at the Pentagon that could maybe better be done somewhere else or is being duplicated somewhere else? I think in some of the follow-up of that, I saw you mentioned things that should be in the State Department have gotten over to the Pentagon. Are there examples of that that we can work on and you will want to lead on?

Senator HAGEL. Two things. First, that comment came in a large, extended interview about budgets about everything, and that interview was done in 2011 prior to the Budget Control Act, just to get the timeframe right on that. I never supported sequestration, by the way.

Now, to your question about what we could do. Obviously, much of the conversation here in the last few hours has been about acquisition, about waste, fraud, and abuse, billions of dollars. Why aren't we auditing these programs? Where is the accountability? That is certainly an area that we are going to have to take a look at.

My reference to State Department programs, some of the general areas, I mentioned this this morning—where we have pushed down on the military the last 12 years to do things that usually are done out of State Department, aid type programs and exchange programs, helping civilian type programs in areas. That was all given to the—not all, but a great deal of it was given to the military at the time we were at war in Iraq and Afghanistan.

So the military has taken on a tremendous volume of assignments and funding that goes with that. That needs to be sorted through, I think. Those are areas where I think we——

Senator BLUNT. One of your commitments will be to help us sort through that?

Senator HAGEL. It has to be, Senator. It has to be.

Senator BLUNT. I am out of time, Senator. I will be here for the second round.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Blunt.

Senator Donnelly.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Mr. Ranking Member. It is an honor to be part of this committee. I look forward to working with my colleagues, and I am proud to serve the people of Indiana.

We are the heartland of America, and Senator Hagel, we have over 14,000 members of the National Guard. In our State, we have the fourth-largest contingent of National Guard members in the entire country. I want to thank you for your service to the country, you along with all Vietnam veterans and other veterans, for what you have done for our Nation. I appreciate your taking the time to meet with me.

We had an extensive discussion, and your understanding of the complex challenges we face in the Middle East and the importance of our alliance with Israel. It is a special and historic relationship. I believe it is a special and historic relationship. The people of my State believe that as well.

I think it was important for you to let everyone know that there can be no nuclear Iran, that there are lines that cannot be crossed, and we will stand up and defend our friends and the entire world in that area.

When we were together, I mentioned to you about my visit to Crane Naval Warfare Systems in Indiana. What they do is they work to create the technologies to control the spectrum, in effect, try to win the battlefield before the battle ever starts on the ground.

We were wondering what can be done in this time of challenging budgets to ensure that in the area of technology, in the area of spectrum, we can maintain our budget so that, as I said, before the war is ever started on the ground, we have won it on the spectrum level? How critical is that in terms of your planning in the Defense Department?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, I think that focus is on as much the core challenge that the Pentagon has in front of it as any one thing. This committee is going to be particularly important to help the leaders of the Pentagon sort through that because, as evidenced in the whole series of questions that have been asked today, Senator Blunt's most recent questions, this is a time of priorities.

Budgets drive that, but missions should always drive everything. What are going to be our missions in the Defense Department over the next few years? How are we going to resource those missions? What are the priorities going to be? It is the entire universe of what the responsibilities are and how do we carry those responsibilities out to secure this Nation?

Your general questions and most of the questions asked here today have been about this. Until I would get over to the Pentagon, if I am confirmed, and understand more of the specifics and work with the Chiefs and get a better grasp of exactly what we have, I won't be in a position to be able to say this or this or we will do this or we won't.

Obviously, that is why I say this committee, the authorizing committees are going to be particularly important.

Senator DONNELLY. My next question probably ties into that as well, which is, as I mentioned, we have over 14,000 members of the Guard in our State, Army Reserves. They have done tour after tour after tour in Iraq and in Afghanistan. As we wind down, I think it is critical to make sure that we have a strategic plan for the Guard in the future so that the Guard we have today, equipment-wise, it is struggling on equipment. We have to upgrade not only our vehicles, but in other areas as well.

I guess the question is, how do you view the mission of the Guard in the years ahead?

Senator HAGEL. During our conversation and a couple of the questions I have had here today on the Guard, I have said I am committed to a strong National Guard. It is an essential part of our force structure going into the future. I think it was proven quite clearly and effectively the last 12 years.

That will be maintained. I think further evidence of that, putting a Chief of the National Guard into the Joint Chiefs. You have my commitment that I will be continually focused on that integration and the upgrading in every way.

Senator DONNELLY. I have had the privilege of working with General Shinseki in recent years on veterans issues, but I think back to when he testified regarding Iraq and talked about how many troops he thought were needed and all the repercussions that came out of that not only for the general, but in so many ways.

I think it is critical that the generals and the people in the Pentagon provide you with the most unvarnished information possible. They tell you exactly what they think. You tell them exactly what you think, and that nobody at any time has their career affected for telling you the truth. I want to make sure that is the way that you are approaching this as well.

Senator HAGEL. That is the way I would approach it. I value that. There is no other way to assure that we are getting the best, the most honest advice from our most capable leaders than to say it like that.

The General Shinseki episode was a very unfortunate episode in this country, what happened to him for telling the truth. I will assure this committee that if I am Secretary of Defense that kind of thing will never happen, for a general officer, a senior commander to be handled and treated that way when he told the truth to the Congress of the United States.

Senator DONNELLY. I will say, and I know you know this, the job he has done for veterans as the VA Secretary has been extraordinary.

Another area in regards to not only our veterans, which we are challenged with right now, but also on Active Duty, is the suicide rate. It has been heartbreaking. In 2012, we lost more Active Duty members to suicide than we did in fighting in Afghanistan.

I know General Chiarelli has at this point basically dedicated his life to trying to solve this problem. I want to make sure that the Defense Department is going to lean all in to try to fix this and provide the care and help and answers so that that number goes to zero in the years ahead.

Senator HAGEL. You have my complete commitment on this issue.

Senator DONNELLY. It is something that our veterans then face as well. It is also a transition issue that as much as you can work with the VA, as our Active Duties transition out and our National Guard when they go home, that they have somebody to talk to, somebody to tell how they feel, and somebody who understands what they are going through because if we can help with that, they have borne the burden of battle, and we owe them. We owe them everything.

Another question I wanted to ask you about is Pakistan. As we know, the incredible challenges we have in Afghanistan, so much of it is caused by Pakistan. We spent about or provided about $2.5 billion in aid. Do you think those were dollars well spent?

Senator HAGEL. Pakistan is a complicated relationship. It is a nuclear power. They cooperate with the United States on some things. We have difficulties with them on others.

As to your question on investment in Pakistan, we condition that assistance. We must continue to condition that assistance. I think Pakistan is too dangerous and that area of the world is so clearly in the national security interest of this country that we just can't walk away from it and not deal with them.

It is complicated. It is imperfect. But this is where all the levers of influence and relationships and diplomacy and economics and power come into play. How we wisely use all of those resources is going to determine some of the outcomes.

We have to be honest as well. We are dealing with factors there that we don't agree with, that we have difficulties with. But again, we have to continue to work at it, and I believe that we will and we should.

Senator DONNELLY. Senator, thank you very much.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Donnelly.

Senator Cruz.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hagel, I want to thank you for being here, and I want to begin by thanking you for your honorable service to our Nation, for your personal sacrifice that you have put into standing and fighting for this country.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator CRUZ. I would like to begin by addressing a question of process. In your prepared statements today, you describe that you have given hundreds of speeches and interviews.

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Senator CRUZ. This committee asked you in this process to submit those speeches in the last 5 years, and in response to that, you handed over a total of four speeches. In my view, that submission was facially insufficient for this committee to assess your record.

Indeed, your financial disclosure revealed you had received paid honoraria in the past year for 12 speeches, and yet you did not even hand over those speeches for which you were paid substantial sums of money. Beyond that, 2 days ago, 6 Senators, including Ranking Member Inhofe, sent you a letter asking for financial disclosure. You have not chosen to respond to that letter.

That letter in particular asked about the private organizations that have paid you over the past 5 years and the degree to which any of those funding sources have come from foreign countries, foreign nationals, foreign sovereign debt funds. You chose not to respond to that letter.

In my view, unless and until you respond to the requests of members of this committee, this committee does not have a proper record on which to assess your confirmation, and I think we need full disclosure and adequate time to assess that.

Now I would like to ask initially a point of clarification. With respect to the International Criminal Court, do you believe the United States should become a party to the International Criminal Court?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, may I quickly respond to your first comment?

Senator CRUZ. I would like you to answer my question. My time is limited.

Senator HAGEL. That question is one that I am most likely not going to be dealing with, as Secretary of Defense.

Senator CRUZ. It is a simple question. Do you think we should be a member of the International Criminal Court? I am asking for your judgment on whether the United States should be a party.

Senator HAGEL. I support where the United States is today.

Senator CRUZ. We are not a party today. You think we should not be a party. Is that a correct statement of your position?

Senator HAGEL. That is correct, yes.

Senator CRUZ. Okay. Thank you.

I would like to draw your attention to an interview you did in 2009 with Al Jazeera. With the chairman's indulgence, if we can play an excerpt of that interview?

Exchange #1:

GUEST HOST: This Marley, from London. Go ahead with your question.

CALLER: Hello, sir. Good evening. It's very good—ah—proposition. But first of all I believe very strongly, I believe the current leadership around the world that there is a moral failure going on. Unless they have a moral capacity to talk and do what they talk. For example, if you look at Palestine there is no war, there is a war crime and they is not dealing with it. But, in Sudan, they are dealing with it and they are really biased justice. And, if you look at Sri Lanka, the Tamars being killed is a genocide of war going on in Sri Lanka. Nothing being done. So there is a total moral failure.

GUEST HOST: So—Marley. What is your question in regards to the issue we're talking about, the reduction of nuclear weapons.

CALLER: Yes, my question is that, leaders, there is a total moral failure unless we bring these leaders to a moral standard, nothing can be done. That's my question. What do you think about it?

HAGEL: Well, I think you're exactly right. And, I said in my opening statement that leadership is critical, because we know in life that nothing is ever accomplished without leadership.

Senator CRUZ. Now in that excerpt, Senator Hagel, the caller suggests that the Nation of Israel has committed war crimes, and your response to that was not to dispute that characterization, but indeed to describe what he said as, "Well, I think that is exactly right."

I would like to ask you, do you think the Nation of Israel has committed war crimes?

Senator HAGEL. No, I do not, Senator. I would want to look at the full context of the interview. But to answer your question, no.

Senator CRUZ. The context of that question, we played the entirety of it, and I wanted to give you that context so you could hear the question and you can hear your response. I would suggest that a suggestion that Israel has committed war crimes is particularly offensive, given that the Jewish people suffered under the most horrific war crimes in the Holocaust.

I would also suggest that for the Secretary of Defense or prospective Secretary of Defense not to take issue with that claim is highly troubling. I would also point out in 2006 your characterization of the Nation of Israel's action, and that was in a speech on the floor of the Senate, you referred to Israel's military campaign against the terrorist group Hezbollah as a "sickening slaughter".

Now I would suggest the characterizations, do you think it is right that Israel was committing a "sickening slaughter," as you said on the floor of the Senate?

Senator HAGEL. Again, I would want to read all of it, what I said. First, I have said many, many times, Senator, every nation has a right to defend itself.

Senator CRUZ. Do you think a "sickening slaughter" would constitute a war crime?

Senator HAGEL. No. Depends on were they attacked, depends on many factors. If Israel was defending itself, there was slaughter going on on both sides.

Senator CRUZ. Does one typically characterize defending yourself against terrorism as a "sickening slaughter"?

Senator HAGEL. No, but again, Senator, I would want to look at everything because——

Senator CRUZ. Okay. Let us look at another excerpt from the same interview, if we can play the second excerpt?

Exchange #2:

GUEST HOST: We've got an email from Wendy Day. She writes to us from Georgia, here in the United States. And, she writes, "Can the rest of the world be persuaded to give up their arsenal when the image of the U.S. is that of the world's bully? Don't we indeed need to change the perception and the reality before asking folks to lay down their arms (nuclear or otherwise)?

HAGEL: Well, her observation is a good one and it's relevant. Yes, to her question.

Senator CRUZ. Senator Hagel, do you think it is appropriate for the chief civilian leader of the U.S. military forces to agree with the statement that both the perception "and the reality" is that the United States is "the world's bully"?

Senator HAGEL. I didn't hear her say that, by the way, of the United States, and I think my comment was it is a relevant and good observation. I don't think I said that I agree with it.

Senator CRUZ. With respect, I think the record speaks for itself. It was in writing that she said the United States is "the world's bully," that it is the reality, and your response, you did say you agree with it. You said, "Her observation is a good one. It is relevant. Uh, yes, to her question."

You explicitly agreed with the characterization of the United States as the world's bully, and I would suggest that is not a characterization. I think the United States has spilled more blood, more treasure standing for freedom, liberating people across the world. To go on Al Jazeera, a foreign network, broadcasting propaganda to nations that are hostile to us and to explicitly agree with the characterization of the United States as the world's bully, I would suggest is not the conduct one would expect of a Secretary of Defense.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, she said that was an observation.

Senator CRUZ. I will point out that her quote was "the perception and the reality". With that, my time is expired. I look forward to a second round of questioning.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Now what we are going to do, given the fact that some of those tapes there are—they need to be transcribed to be made part of the record so that people can judge exactly what was said and what was asked. I heard that first question, by the way, as a response to the need for moral leadership. I didn't hear it the way Senator Cruz did.

But in any event, it is important that the words be transcribed so they can be made part of the record. It is a rather unusual thing. I told Senator Cruz that I preferred that we have a transcript and that you be asked questions from a transcript, but that I didn't want to stop him from offering the tape of it, and he went ahead and did it.

In any event, the fair thing now is that the transcript of each of those segments be made part of the record and that we give also Senator Hagel an opportunity, should he want either on this question or, by the way, on other questions, an opportunity to answer for the record in any way he might proceed as though he were answering questions for the record.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We will be happy to provide a transcript, and we will also be making public a link both to these excerpts and to the entire transcript so that anyone who wants can view it in its entirety and assess it in context.

Chairman LEVIN. That would be very helpful. Thank you, Senator Cruz.

Clip # 1 (time stamp: 6:20)

Host: Well let's go to one of our viewers who's calling in from London, this is Marley from London, go ahead with your question.

Marley: Hello, sir, good evening, it's a very good proposition, but first of all I believe, very strongly I believe, that current leadership around the world, that there is a moral failure going on, unless they have a moral capacity to talk and do what they talk, for example, if you look at Palestine, there is no war, there is a war crime and they're not dealing with it, but in Sudan they are dealing with it, and they are really biased justice and if you look at Sri Lanka, the Tamils being killed, there is a genocidal war going on in Sri Lanka, nothing being done, so there is a certain moral failure…

Host: So Marley, what is your question with regards to the issue we are talking about, the reduction of nuclear weapons?

Marley: Yes, my question is that leaders there's a total moral failure unless we bring these leaders to a moral standard, nothing can be done, that's my question, what do you think about it?

Host: Ok, thank you, let me put that to the Senator.

Hagel: Well I think you're exactly right, and I said in my opening statement, that that leadership is critical, because we know in life, nothing is ever accomplished without leadership. I think it's interesting that the two leaders that we're talking about specifically of Russia and the United States, Mr. Obama and Mr. Medvedev, are both in their 40s. And it represents a new generation of thinking, now again, that's a long leap between that thinking and commitment to getting it done, and again, we're well aware of the difficulties, but we must start somewhere, and that kind of as the caller says, that kind of moral leadership is absolutely critical. Now, the reality is we are going to continue to have unfortunately conflict in the world, but we can't as leaders of the world stand back and just say, well there's nothing we can do about it, we owe the next generation of mankind far more than that and I do believe that if we can commit ourselves, and enough leaders will join this effort, and I believe for example the G20 here that is meeting, as they discuss this issue and other issues, I don't know of one of those leaders that would not commit to some at least moral obligation responsibility to try to rid the earth of nuclear weapons.

Clip # 2 (time stamp: 8:50)

Host: We've got an email from Wendy Day, she writes to us from Georgia, here in the United States and she writes: Can the rest of the world be persuaded to give up their arsenal when the image of the U.S. is that of the world's bully? Don't we indeed need to change the perception and the reality before asking folks to lay down their arms (nuclear or otherwise)?

Hagel: Mmm-hm, well, her observation is a good one, and it's relevant, uh, yes to her question, and again I think that's all part of leadership, that's why this must begin with the United States and Russia. Look for example what President Obama has done in the first two months he's been in office, his Secretary of State, Mrs. Clinton, has met with the Russian foreign minister, she's been in five regions of the world, the President of the United States is out of the United States now, will be in different parts of the world over the next week, I think that is the beginning of, not just symbolism of reaching out, but in fact engaging, in listening, finding common ground to build common interest based on consensus, and we're going to have differences, we will always have differences, but we should define our relationships based not on those differences but on our common interests.

Host: Well, I mean, that brings us to the new administration that is here in Washington, I think that perception of the United States being a bully in the world has come largely from what the previous administration has done.

Hagel: Oh I think that's right, and we are now in our unfortunately 7th and 8th year in two long wars. That's not all America's fault, of course not. But I think this last administration misplayed a lot of the great good will that redounded to this country and the American people after the terrorist attacks on our country on September 11, 2001. The fact is, the past is the past, we now move forward, let's try to get to high ground and fix some of these great problems and challenges for mankind, working together, I believe we can do that.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Hirono.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Ranking Member Inhofe.

I join my colleagues in welcoming you, Senator Hagel.

We live in a complex world, and any Secretary of Defense should ask tough questions, maybe not particularly politically popular questions. I see you, Senator Hagel, as that kind of person, based on your service to our country, your conduct and responses to the questions asked of you today, and the conversation that you and I had.

Turning to your statement this morning, you talked about looking at our future threats and challenges and why DOD is rebalancing its resources toward the Asia-Pacific region. Of course, this kind of rebalance is critically important to Hawaii in our forward position in the Pacific.

Would you expand as to why and what particular economic or national security factors come into play as we rebalance to the Asia-Pacific region?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, you know better than most your region and its importance and why it will continue to be important to the world, but certainly to the United States. As I noted in my opening statement and you know, we have always been a Pacific power. We have been a Pacific power because we have clear economic interests there. We have diplomatic security interests there. We have strong allies there. I mentioned some of them in my opening statement.

When we look at the growth of economies, we look at trade growth, we look at population growth, the rise of China. But not just China, but that entire Asia-Pacific region, we need to stay relevant to opportunities as well as challenges in all areas, but in particular the areas that we see as emerging as to the largest, most significant economic security issues and challenges and opportunities.

It is appropriate that any nation rebalance assets. You have to be relevant to the times, to the shifts, the changes. Our world today is totally different than it was 12 years ago. Our force structure is being refit, and we are looking at a far more agile, flexible force structure as our economies are becoming more agile and flexible.

For all those reasons and more, that is why we are doing what I think is exactly the right thing to do. Doesn't mean, as I said in my opening statement, that we are abandoning anybody or any part of the world. We can't.

Senator HIRONO. Senator, as we live in times of budget constraints, will you commit to keeping me and this committee informed as you develop the strategies and contemplate force posture adjustments that go along with this kind of rebalancing?

Senator HAGEL. Yes. I look forward to it.

Senator HIRONO. I am very heartened by your perspective, turning to another question, that you always ask the question, is the policy working—worthy of the men and women that we send into battle and possibly to their deaths? I am very heartened by that kind of a perspective from someone who served our country.

What will be your top priorities as you look to care for the men and women in uniform and their families?

Senator HAGEL. As I said in my opening statement, the welfare, the safety, the success of our men and women in uniform is my top priority, has been and will continue to be, and their families.

Senator HIRONO. Do you have any specific programmatic ways that you will reflect that?

Senator HAGEL. First, to implement the law. We have a number of new laws, policies that are in the process of being implemented. We have spoken about some here today. I will assure, if confirmed, that we do that.

As I said in my opening statement, we will assure that every military man and woman and their families are given exactly the same opportunities and rights as each other and all members of the Armed Forces.

Senator HIRONO. I also take to heart your belief in the importance of the core nation and the work between DOD and the VA, and I understand that you have a strong relationship with Secretary Shinseki. With your experience as a veteran and having been a senior leader in the Veterans Administration, what will be your primary challenges and goals as you look to collaborate with Secretary Shinseki and the VA?

Senator HAGEL. It will be the same that Secretary Panetta and, before him, Secretary Gates initiated in closer collaboration between the two agencies, and that means the integration of our systems. As our men and women transition out from Active Duty into civilian life or retired life and are going to require the assistance of some veterans assistance programs, a closer integration.

We know that the backlogs now are still far, far too long to get evaluations of whether it is post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) or whatever the health issue is. I think continuing to work with Secretary Shinseki, as Secretaries Panetta and Gates did, but strengthening that integration of those systems, of leadership, of our people understanding each other better, and maximizing the resources that each agency has and making those resources more value-added and count more.

Senator HIRONO. I had an opportunity to meet with Secretary Shinseki recently, and those kinds of collaborative efforts are not happening as expeditiously as we would like. I certainly hope that you will have a renewed sense of urgency about the outcomes of these collaborative efforts because, of course, the bottom line is it is to help our men and women who are transitioning out of uniform into civilian life.

I hope that we have that kind of commitment, strong commitment from you for outcomes.

Senator HAGEL. You have my strong commitment.

Senator HIRONO. DOD is the United States' largest consumer of energy, and we talked about that briefly when you came to see me. It is clear that the military will benefit greatly from cheaper, more stable fuel costs over the long term. Promising work is being done in this area to commercialize alternative fuels that can be produced abundantly in the United States.

Of course, this kind of collaboration is very important for Hawaii as being the most oil-dependent State in the entire country. If confirmed, will you continue to emphasize and prioritize research, development, and, where possible, deployment of renewable fuels as well as enhanced energy efficiency efforts to reduce DOD's energy costs over the long term?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, as you have noted, DOD is the largest user of certainly liquid fuels. But I think our energy budget, I don't know the exact number, but it's probably around $18 billion a year.

Anything we can do to make any aspect of securing our country more cost effective fuel, we need to look at, and I would make that a high priority, if I am confirmed and go over to the Defense Department, to see if we could—how we do that, how we can continue to do that, because in the end, for all the reasons you know, it is just clearly in the interest of our country, our resources, and our people.

Senator HIRONO. Certainly, continuing to fund research and development efforts in these areas will accrue to us in the long term in terms of huge, huge cost savings for DOD.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you. My time is up.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Hirono.

Now here is the situation we have. This first vote is a 10-minute vote apparently, and all the subsequent votes are 10 minutes.

Senator Lee, I am happy to call upon you now, but you would have to kind of keep track of this yourself and have your staff keep track of it. If you want to take the risk, there may be some risk if you took your full 8 minutes.

I would be happy to recess now instead of after your questions. We are going to recess for the five votes. It will be about an hour.

Would you like to start now and then take a chance that you might not finish? Or would you rather start at the beginning after an hour recess?

Senator LEE. Thank you for that offer, Mr. Chairman.

I better not risk the possibility of missing a vote. I would prefer that you recess now.

Chairman LEVIN. We are now going to recess for about an hour. But I want you all to follow this.

At the last vote—and it may not be the fifth vote. There may be four votes. We don't know. It is up to five votes. The final vote, though, we know will be called final passage of the debt limit bill. We will start, we will begin about 5 minutes after the beginning of that vote.

We will stand in recess. [Recessed.]

Chairman LEVIN. The committee will come back to order.

Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Senator Hagel, for joining us today and for answering the questions that have been asked to you so far. I'd like to talk to you for a few minutes about Israel. Israel is, I believe, America's most important ally, certainly in the Middle East and in many respects in the entire world. A lot of people in this body are concerned, quite appropriately, about making sure that alliance remains strong, about making sure that our interests as Americans are protected abroad. A lot of us feel like one of the best ways of protecting American national security is through that alliance in the Middle East.

On April 12, 2002, there was a Palestinian terrorist who detonated a bomb in downtown Jerusalem, killing 6 Israelis and wounding I believe about 100 others. On that day, while you were still serving in the U.S. Senate, you gave a speech on the Senate floor. You made a couple of comments that I'd like to discuss with you and ask you a little bit about.

In one segment of the speech you said: "We understand Israel's right to defend itself. We're committed to that. We've helped Israel defend that right. We will continue to do so. But it should not be at the expense of the Palestinian people, innocent Palestinian people, and innocent Israelis who are paying a high price."

Some who have read that have reacted with concern that this may be indicative of a feeling on your part that there might be some moral equivalency between on the one hand Israel's exercise of its right to defend itself and on the other hand Palestinian terrorism. Do you believe that there is a moral equivalency between these two things?

Senator HAGEL. Oh, absolutely not, Senator.

Senator LEE. Do you understand how others might read this statement in such a way that could leave them with that impression?

Senator HAGEL. I do.

Senator LEE. How do you respond to it? In other words, do Palestinians, let's say those Palestinians who have engaged in acts of terrorism, perhaps in retaliation against Israel for Israel defending itself, do they have a legitimate gripe?

Senator HAGEL. Terrorism can never be justified under any circumstances.

Senator LEE. Is their grievance legitimate?

Senator HAGEL. The Palestinians?

Senator LEE. Yes, the Palestinians who decide to strap a bomb onto themselves and detonate it or otherwise engage in acts of terror; do they have a legitimate grievance that they're expressing?

Senator HAGEL. They have grievances. A lot of people have grievances——

Senator LEE. Are those grievances legitimate?

Senator HAGEL.—but not a justification for terrorism and killing innocent people, never.

Senator LEE. Are they on par with the grievances that innocent Israelis have when they become the victims of violent acts?

Senator HAGEL. I don't think you can judge whether it's Israelis or Palestinians or anybody in the world in separating innocent victims of terrorism.

Senator LEE. I think you can in some circumstances, can't you? I mean——

Senator HAGEL. Not victims.

Senator LEE. For heaven's sakes, though—oh, okay, maybe not victims. Can you, and indeed must you not, judge when it comes to one group of people who may at least be willing to recognize the other group of people's right to exist?

Senator HAGEL. Absolutely. In fact, I'm clearly on the record on that point. In fact, in 2006 there was the Anti-Palestinian Terrorist Act that I voted for, and there are a number of other resolutions, acts, votes, speeches I've made. In my book I have said unequivocally Hezbollah, Hamas specifically, they must renounce terrorism, and first they must accept Israel's right to exist as a Jewish homeland, respect the borders, protect the borders. Absolutely, I've made that very clear.

Senator LEE. Okay. Now, later on in the same speech you asked a question. You referred to the fact, that we really need to develop peace in the Middle East, and you asked the question: "Who guarantees this peace?" You then continue by asking another question: "If in fact we expect Israel to pull back to their pre-1967 borders, who guarantees that peace?"

Does this, Senator Hagel, reflect sentiment on your part that that is a legitimate way of solving the peace process, of bringing about peace in Israel, in the Middle East, is by asking Israel to withdraw to its pre-1967 borders?

Senator HAGEL. No, not at all. What I said was, as you just quoted me, who guarantees the security of Israel's borders? Israel's borders must be secure. That's part of the fundamentals of the Quartet Principles of 2006, in fact, the U.N. Resolutions 242 and 337 and other resolutions. That's paramount, the guarantee of the security of Israel and its borders.

Senator LEE. I understand that part of the question related to how we bring about that peace, and I want to get back to that in a minute. But another part of the question started from the premise that Israel would be withdrawing to its pre-1967 borders. Do you view that as a tenable solution? Do you believe such borders are militarily defensible?

Senator HAGEL. I think that's all negotiable. The Quartet Principles of 2006, which President Bush laid down, and a two-state solution, all those issues have to be resolved. Land for peace, trading land, all those issues are final status issues that are absolutely key to the future of Israel or before Israel can agree to anything.

Senator LEE. So you're saying that you might describe a resolution of this crisis involving withdrawal to the pre-1967 borders as perhaps one among several tenable solutions?

Senator HAGEL. It's part of what's been talked about and defined in, as I said, the 2006 Quartet Principles and U.N. resolutions that that is part of a final status set of issues that have to be resolved. The United States and no other country can impose that on Israel. That is a negotiable issue, but it's been out there, and that remains to be dealt with in negotiations.

Senator LEE. Is it one that you think the United States should encourage?

Senator HAGEL. I would encourage peace and a secure, safe Israel. That's what I think most of us would want to see.

Senator LEE. Okay. Now, in 2009 you made a statement suggesting that U.S. ground troops should be sent to that part of the world and installed as U.N. peacekeepers in a "non-militarized Palestinian state". Is this something you stand behind today? Is this an approach that you think is appropriate?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, I don't have the facts behind me, in front of me, but I don't think that was a recommendation I was making. If I recall, my comments—and you may be able to give me exactly the comments—were in the context of how do you secure Israel's border, who secures Israel's border? For example, General Brent Scowcroft has suggested at times maybe this is a peacekeeping role for NATO. That was what that was all about.

Senator LEE. Senator, my time has expired. I need to ask you one more question. I understand that you have made a statement indicating that there is no justification for Palestinian suicide bombers, but that there is also no justification for Israel to "keep Palestinians caged up like animals". Did you say that, and if so do you stand by that statement today?

Senator HAGEL. I said it, and I don't remember the context or when I said it. But——

Senator LEE. Do you believe today that Israel keeps Palestinians caged up like animals?

Senator HAGEL. No. If I had an opportunity to edit that, like many things I've said, I would like to go back and change the words and the meaning. No, it was I think in a larger context. I've said many, many things over many years. It was a larger context of the frustration and what's happening, which is not in Israel's interest, to find ways that we can help bring peace and security to Israel.

If I had a chance to go back and edit it, I would. I regret that I used those words.

Senator LEE. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Lee.

Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member.

Welcome, Senator Hagel. It was good to see you with my dear friend Senator Warner, decorated Navy and Marine Corps veteran from World War II and the Korean War, Secretary of the Navy, long-time member of this committee. You couldn't have a better ally than Senator Warner and it was good to see him here.

He exemplifies—and forgive my Virginia-centrism for a minute. He exemplifies something that's very important about our Commonwealth. Our map is a map of the military history of this country: Yorktown, Appomattox, the Pentagon, where Setptember 11 occurred. There's a ceremony in Arlington tonight for the commissioning of a new amphib, the USS Arlington, that will be commissioned in Norfolk in April.

We care very deeply about these events. One in nine Virginians is a veteran. Not one in nine voters, not one in nine adults, but birth to death, one in nine is a veteran. When you add in Active Duty, Guard, Reserve, DOD civilian, DOD contractor, and their families, now you're talking about probably one in three of us. We care very, very deeply about all that's within DOD.

Virginians talk all the time about national security concerns and threats. Let me be plain, the threat and the concern that Virginians are now talking about more than any other is the inability of Congress to find a way forward on reasonable budget compromise. That's what's in the newspapers, that's what's in the headlines.

At the direction of Deputy Secretary Ash Carter, DOD is now cutting expenditures and planning for future cuts. We have a looming sequester on March 1 and then a CR expiration on March 27. I'm very worried at the macro level about DOD's ability to pursue and execute appropriate national security objectives in this time of congressional inability to find budget compromise.

The current CR limits flexibility, for example, of the military to appropriately tailor resources to the appropriate ends under a CR. The Navy has no flexibility to meet a $3.7 billion operations and maintenance shortfall.

I'm new here. To me it seems like funding the military through CR is poor business, poor budgeting, poor governance. I'm worried about its effect upon the morale of all of our men and women in service.

My first question is a really simple one: Do you agree that we, Congress, must finish an fiscal year 2013 appropriations process as soon as possible to allow DOD to move forward with this year's funding decisions, rather than continuing to be bound by an fiscal year 2012 CR?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, I do. I think I've been very clear on that point all day today. You have described it accurately.

Senator KAINE. My second question is related, is about sequestration. To me, again the new guy, allowing budget sequestration—the cavalier discussions I've seen in some newspapers recently by Members of Congress about the fact that it's reality and we probably can't change it makes absolutely no sense.

I'm kind of curious and interested to see whether it might be more sensible to sort of even realign the deadlines, the sequester deadline. We are now, based on the vote we just had on the floor of the Senate, in a budgetary process where there's a strong likelihood that we'll be able to produce budgets together with the House. Why would we be making short-term one-off decisions that are holdovers from a previous Congress that couldn't get it right when we are embarking upon a budget process? To my way of thinking, that's the way you ought to make revenue and spending decisions, in accord with a budget, rather than through gimmicks like sequester.

I think we're going to get out of this budget uncertainty, but when we do you will have the task, if confirmed, of being the Secretary of Defense in a resource-constrained environment and you're going to have to deal, hopefully in a more thoughtful budgetary process with Congress, on how to make priorities about spending. I'd like to have you talk a little bit about how you would approach that administrative task in a resource-constrained world, how you're going to approach that task of dealing with these fiscal realities.

Senator HAGEL. First, as I noted this morning in my opening statement, if I am confirmed I would intend to make this relationship between the Secretary of Defense and Congress a partnership, much as Secretary Panetta has done. I think it's critically important for many reasons. Let's start with the budget. You authorize, you appropriate. The Federal Government is captive to that authorization and appropriation, and each Department must work within the budgetary framework of those resources.

I have said that, like all of these big issues, it is a matter of, first of all, clearly defining the mission in its entirety as to what is the mission of DOD, then what are our priorities as they fit into our strategic interests around the world, and the how do you do it? How do you manage it? How do you lead?

That includes working closely with the Chiefs. That includes working with all the leadership within DOD. It's about teams, it's about people, and it's about building consensus in Congress as well as within the military.

Each Military Chief has a responsibility for his or her areas and Service, and that's as it should be. Obviously, Goldwater-Nichols integrated our Services, which was the right thing. I think most people agree with that. But also, the Commandant of the Marine Corps and each Chief has a responsibility to look out for the interests of their Service. The coordination of those efforts and the understanding the bigger picture are critically important. Those are all different elements, not unlike you as a governor at one time, would bring to the job.

Senator KAINE. Senator, switching gears for a minute, it is still kind of hard to contemplate that if confirmed you would be the first enlisted person to hold the position of Secretary of Defense, and I want to ask a question about especially our enlisteds. Senator Manchin touched upon it earlier, the unacceptably high rate of unemployment of folks exiting military service. I think officers have a little bit easier time, but when we see an unemployment rate among enlisteds that is higher than the national average, when they've sacrificed, when they've given, and when they have leadership and technical skills that could benefit a civilian workforce, we know something is wrong.

There have been some pilot projects through the NDAAs in 2012 and 2013 to focus on an issue that matters a lot to me, and we talked about it, how to credential Active Duty military while they are in their military occupational specialties, while they are gaining technical skills, with credentials that mean something in the civilian workforce, so that when they leave they're not just an E–5 or a gunny sergeant, which people in the civilian workforce may not understand, but they actually have the credentials that the civilian-hiring workforce does understand.

Are you committed to pushing forward on those pilot programs and expanding them so that we can get at this unemployment issue?

Senator HAGEL. Absolutely. Again, I noted that in my opening statement, Senator. I think I have some experience in that area over the years. I'm committed to that. As I said, nothing is more important than our men and women and their families. That doesn't mean just throughout their time in our service to our country, but afterward. What this country commits to them, we must fulfill that commitment.

Senator KAINE. One last comment, Senator Hagel, not a question. As the topics have come up today, when we talked about Iran and the threat of a nuclear Iran, we've often talked about it as linked with Israel's security, which it is. They're Holocaust deniers and they've threatened the security of the State of Israel. But I want to make sure that everybody in this chamber understands it's not just about the security of Israel.

The Iranian nuclear threat is a much bigger one. It is very clear that if Iran gets nuclear weapons that other nations will start to do the same thing, and that would cut completely counter to I know principles that you hold, principles the President holds. It's not just on Israel's shoulders to be worried about a nuclear Iran. It is a threat that we all need to worry about.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you. I agree. I think, just to add one point on that, you all know, of course, and many have been involved in this over the years, the current P5 Plus 1 engagement to get all five members of the U.N. Security Council together on this one issue. Now, we have variations of exactly what should be done. But I think that gives the world some indication of how Russia, China, the United States, and essentially all nations of the world view the threat of a nuclear Iran.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Kaine.

Senator Vitter.

Senator VITTER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Senator, for being here, and thank you very much for your military service.

My single biggest concern, Senator, about the nomination is the dramatic flip-flops between your past statements and record and what you're saying as the nominee. They're about key core issues, and we've discussed some of those today. I wanted to focus on that, and I apologize if I go over some of the things that have come up before. I couldn't be here for most of the hearing.

In 2006, when Israel was responding to attacks by Hezbollah from Lebanon, you called that response a "sickening slaughter" and you accused Israel of "the systematic destruction of an American friend, the country and people of Lebanon". What do you say about those quotes today?

Senator HAGEL. Well, first, I said them. I've been asked about them. I have said I regret saying that. It was in the larger context of a speech I made about what was going on, the 30-some days of war going on. I also included in that speech the responsibility of Hezbollah, who started the war. So it wasn't exactly the way you just noted it. The language is exact, what you just said, but it was a larger context.

Yes, I regret that language. But I think the bigger point is, Senator—and I have noted this all morning—my unequivocal support of Israel over the years. There's been no flip-flop on that. How I've voted, I've never voted against anything but Israel's interests in every vote I've cast in the U.S. Senate. I've said it in my book. They're a special, historic ally. We will always support them and defend them. I've said it in my speeches.

There's no flip-flop on my support for Israel.

Senator VITTER. Is there a flip-flop on your calling their response to Hezbollah "the systematic destruction of an American friend, the country and people of Lebanon"? Do you stand by that today?

Senator HAGEL. I just said I said that, and I said that I regretted saying that. But that's not——

Senator VITTER. Do you stand by those words, or is that a flip-flop?

Senator HAGEL. No. If I had a chance to edit those words out, I would.

Senator VITTER. That's what I'm talking about in terms of flip-flop.

Senator HAGEL. I suppose if I had a chance to edit a lot of things in my life, Senator, I'd probably be fairly busy.

Senator VITTER. Let me move on because I have a number of these concerns. In 1998, in a Senate hearing, you said that Secretary of State Madeleine Albright had "tilted way too far toward Israel in the Middle East peace process". Do you still think that of that peace process in 1998?

Senator HAGEL. I don't recall the event. I don't recall the words. I don't know where it comes from. I don't know the context. Again, Senator, I go back for years and years and years on different things I've said, but I don't recall that or what the context was, so I don't know.

Secretary Albright has endorsed me, by the way, to be the next Secretary of Defense. I worked very closely with Secretary Albright, as I did with President Clinton and his administration, in support of Israel.

Senator VITTER. In general, at that time under the Clinton administration, do you think that they were going "way too far toward Israel in the Middle East peace process"?

Senator HAGEL. No, I don't, because I was very supportive of what the President did at the end of his term in December-January, December 2000, January 2001. As a matter of fact, I recount that episode in my book, when I was in Israel.

Senator VITTER. Just to clarify, that's the sort of flip-flop I'm talking about, because that's what you said then and you're changing your mind now.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, that's not a flip-flop. I don't recall everything I've said in the last 20 years or 25 years. If I could go back and change some of it, I would. But that still doesn't discount the support that I've always given Israel and continue to give Israel.

Senator VITTER. Let me go to a third thing, is actually what you said today, talking about Iran as a "legitimate elected government". Do you think the election that had to do with this Iranian Government coming to power was free and fair and legitimate?

Senator HAGEL. I noted that the term "legitimate" was not the term I should have used. I should have used "recognized". That's the more appropriate term. I was referring to the fact that it's a nation that is a member of the United Nations, it has embassies from all our allies.

Senator VITTER. What about the——

Senator HAGEL. It's a recognized nation.

Senator VITTER. What about the word "elected," because you said "legitimate elected government"?

Senator HAGEL. There was an election in Iran.

Senator VITTER. So my question specifically was, you apparently think that was a free and fair and legitimate election?

Senator HAGEL. That's not what I said.

Senator VITTER. That's why I'm asking what you meant, because you said "legitimate elected government".

Senator HAGEL. I just explained I should have said "recognized" instead of "legitimate," which I did earlier today. There was an election. There will be another presidential election in June of this year for President of Iran. Whether it's free and fair, I don't know.

Senator VITTER. Do you expect it to be free and fair and legitimate?

Senator HAGEL. I don't know.

Senator VITTER. Okay. You have no expectations one way or the other about that?

Senator HAGEL. I do know that Iran is not exactly a model democracy and it has not been. I don't have any expectations for a free, fair election.

Senator VITTER. Okay. In 2008, you wrote that a nuclear Iran might be tolerable because "sovereign nation states possessing nuclear weapons capability, as opposed to stateless terrorist groups, will often respond with some degree of responsible, or at least sane, behavior". Is that still your hope or expectation about this Government of Iran?

Senator HAGEL. Again, I'm not sure where the reference came from or the context. But what I obviously was referring to were different options that people will look at in regard to Iran getting nuclear weapons. I've always said that Iran must not get weapons of mass destruction. I've always said it's a sponsor of terrorists, of terrorism, and I've always said the military option should remain on the table to assure that Iran does not get nuclear weapons.

Senator VITTER. Again, this quote, you suggest that Iran would maybe or hopefully respond in a "responsible, or at least sane," way. Those were the words. Is that still your expectation or hope?

Senator HAGEL. I always have hope that people respond in a sane way. But that doesn't at all change the facts that it is a dangerous, dangerous country that's a threat to the United States, Israel, and the entire world.

Senator VITTER. Okay. After your nomination, the Iranian Government press noted with satisfaction that the "anti-Israel" Hagel—obviously, that's not your quote; that's theirs—is known for "his criticism of Washington's anti-Iran policies," and that he "has consistently opposed any plan to launch a military strike against Iran". Why do you think they have that impression?

Senator HAGEL. First of all, it's not an accurate quote. I've never opposed military action against Iran.

Senator VITTER. Let me just clarify. It's an accurate quote of the Iranian Government press. Why do you think they have that impression?

Senator HAGEL. It's not an accurate statement about my position.

Senator VITTER. Right. But why do you think they have that impression?

Senator HAGEL. As I said in answer to that question earlier, I have enough difficulty understanding American politics, Senator. I surely don't understand Iranian politics.

Senator VITTER. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. But if I might add, I also said that there have been some rather significant Israeli Government leaders recently that have said some pretty nice things about me, current Israeli leaders.

Senator VITTER. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Vitter.

Senator King.

Senator KING. Like all the other inquisitors today, Senator, I want to thank you for your service, and particularly for your willingness to put yourself through this process to serve your country once again. It's one of my life principles never to take a job where I would have to be confirmed by a legislative body, and you're doing it.

I also want to comment, I read one commentator that said the fact that this guy was an enlisted man in Vietnam is nice, but not really significant. I think it's very significant. I'm a bit of a student of the Cuban missile crisis, the most dangerous moment this country has ever experienced, and anybody that studies that period, it's hard to escape the conclusion that President Kennedy's service on the front lines of World War II and Chairman Khrushchev's service in his army during World War II was a significant influence on their willingness to back away from the nuclear precipice. I think it's very important to have people with your experience in this position.

Most of the questions, probably 90 percent, today have been about policy. But the reality is, as I think you would concede, that the policy comes from the President of the United States. You're certainly going to advise, but that's where the policy comes from.

I'd like to ask your thoughts about management, because you're about to take on the world's most cumbersome bureaucracy, with a lot of problems and headaches and budgetary challenges.

Just share with me some thoughts about how you're going to approach the management of DOD?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, thank you. I note you were sitting there during the exchange I had with Senator Kaine about some of this, and I would, in answering your question, pick up on a couple of those observations.

First—and you too, I know, you were a Governor. So you both understand a lot of the pieces of this. No matter how big an organization is, there are still some fundamentals to leadership and management. Now, as you have noted, DOD is the largest institution certainly in this country, maybe the world. How then do you try to manage it? Well, it's not about me. The Secretary of Defense, he leads, he advises the President. But it's really about the people who have the accountability and the responsibility to manage every aspect of our defense apparatus. That includes all the officers. I think there are over 50 presidential appointees in DOD. You have obviously the military, uniformed military, 1.3 million there. So all of these people are required to manage the Department.

I think a fundamental to me in answering your question is accountability. We've had some discussions today about audits. All institutions must be accountable. Elected officials are accountable. We're all accountable. The emphasis on accountability I don't think can ever be overstated. You give managers flexibility, you give them resources, but you give them direction and expectations, and they have to be very clear, very direct, and very defined, but not to the point where you don't want their input and their ability to be flexible with their management. I think that's, in my opinion, Senator, is the key to anything, but surely it is the key to something as large as DOD.

A number of questions were asked of me today about specific programs, submarine programs, different areas of technology and acquisitions, and our superior technology. I've said I don't know enough about it. I don't. There are a lot of things I don't know about. I, if confirmed, intend to know a lot more than I do. I will have to.

But at the same time, I would never think that this, as I said earlier, is about me or I will be running anything. I will be the leader, I'll be responsible, I'll be accountable. But I have to rely on the right teams, the right people, bring those people together. Again, it's accountability and responsibility.

I would stop there, if that gives you some sense of how I would intend to do this business.

Senator KING. My theory of leadership is hire good people and take credit for what they do. That's my best advice.

You're a guy from Nebraska. You were in the Army. I'm imaging that every morning you don't get up and think about the Navy. I hope to correct that over the next few years. Particularly of concern to us right now in Maine and in other parts of the country is the multi-year procurement program which is in jeopardy because of the budget situation.

Your feelings about multi-year procurement and maintaining the industrial base, which we just have to do if we're going to be able to maintain our force?

Senator HAGEL. Governor, you probably know, and Governor Kaine does as well, that there is such a thing as a Nebraska navy. Our governors make these distinguished appointments throughout their career. Our fleet is small but mighty. But that has been my initial, early on experience with the Navy.

Industrial base, I referenced that in a couple of comments I made earlier today in responding to questions. Absolutely essential to our future that we maintain a strong, growing, credible military industrial base, for all the reasons you understand. Certainly Senator Kaine does, being from Virginia, and other Senators here who have in their States these facilities and, more importantly, private companies that represent our industrial base.

How we then prioritize our needs, how we account for and audit contracts, forward procurements, cost overruns, waste, fraud, and abuse, all part of it. This is going to be more and more essential as we are dealing with, as you have noted, a restricted budget. It may be a very restricted budget, depending on how things happen on sequestration.

The Navy is an indispensable part of our security apparatus. First, it is the one visible projection of power that we have in the world. Obviously, our rebalancing of resources in the Asia-Pacific region are some indication of that. The Persian Gulf; we have been talking all day about Iran, about Israel, but specifically Iran in the Persian Gulf. You know we have our Fifth Fleet there in Bahrain. We have two carrier battle groups in and out of that small little area. The flexibility, agility, missile defense, nuclear, all those capabilities are within the Navy.

I am a strong supporter of advancing our Navy technology and our efforts, and I will continue to do that if confirmed.

Senator KING. Thank you, Senator. I'll have some more questions at a later time. I appreciate it.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator King.

Senator Shaheen.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hagel, thank you very much for the tremendous service that you've already provided to this country and for your willingness to consider taking on this challenge as Secretary of Defense and for your stamina at this hearing all day. You will certainly need it as Secretary of Defense.

I want to follow up on Senator King's question about the Navy, because the Navy is obviously very important to us in New Hampshire as well. Our four public shipyards are the backbone of our naval power, but according to the Navy there's a huge backlog of the restoration and modernization projects at our shipyards. According to last year's numbers, that backlog was around $3 billion.

At Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, which Senator King, Senator Ayotte, and I are all very concerned about, that number was $513 million. This backlog not only potentially affects our readiness, but it's also not cost effective. For example, a 2010 Government Accountability Office report pointed out that a pier project at Norfolk, which I'm sure Senator Kaine is familiar with, if it had been addressed early it would have cost $15 million. Because that didn't happen, the pier now is going to cost about $85 million.

In fiscal year 2012, Senators Collins, Ayotte, and I included an amendment in the NDAA bill that requires the Pentagon to produce a shipyard modernization plan to address these shortfalls. That report's late, but it was promised in the upcoming budget submission for fiscal year 2014. Will you commit to ensuring that this modernization plan is produced and will you commit to pressing the Navy, within the fiscal constraints that I appreciate, but to fully fund the investments that are needed to save money in the long term and ensure that we continue to be very effective and efficient at our shipyards?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, I will make that commitment to do everything I can to first understand the specifics, which I don't know all the details. But your request is preliminary to effective, efficient use of our resources and planning and our national security. So I will make that commitment. If I am confirmed, I will get the details. I will assure that the Navy responds.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you. I'm sure Senators King and Ayotte join me in inviting you to come and visit the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard. We hope that you will do that as soon as you're confirmed.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator SHAHEEN. I know there's been a fair amount of discussion earlier today about your involvement with the organization Global Zero and what your position is on nuclear weapons. I think it's worth requoting what Senator Reed said about Ronald Reagan, who said that: "We seek the total elimination one day of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth." I think every President since Ronald Reagan has supported that aspirational goal, recognizing that at this point in time it is a goal.

Certainly that's what President Obama has said he supports, is that some day, probably not in this lifetime, but some day, we should hope for a world that would be free of nuclear weapons.

I know I've heard you say that you agree with those two statements, but do you also agree that as long as nuclear weapons exist that we have to maintain a safe, secure, and effective nuclear arsenal to deter any adversaries?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, completely, absolutely. I have never had any other position but that, as I have indicated this morning and this afternoon, and will continue to take that position. As I said in my opening statement and in answer to other questions, our nuclear deterrent has probably been the core of keeping world peace and avoiding a World War III, that nuclear deterrent.

As long as there is the threat of nuclear weapons—and like you noted and President Obama noted in his Prague speech in 2009—it probably will not happen in our lifetime. But, just as you noted and Senator Reed's comments about what President Reagan laid on the table in 1986, we need to keep working on it. We need to keep moving forward, attempting to do it.

Quite frankly, if you look at the START agreements and you look at the different treaties we've had, we have brought those warheads down, under both Republican and Democratic administrations, bipartisan. What Sam Nunn said this morning, he and his former colleagues Secretary Kissinger, Secretary Shultz, Secretary Perry, hundreds of national leaders in Republican and Democratic administrations over the years have supported the reduction of weapons of nuclear destruction—not unilateral, but bilateral, negotiated and verifiable.

As I said this morning, as Ronald Reagan said, "Trust but verify". Nothing unilateral.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you very much.

Again, I know there's been a lot of discussion about your comments relative to sanctions on Iran and various options that we might pursue with respect to Iran and nuclear weapons. But I wonder again if you would confirm what your position is on the President's current strategy of strong diplomacy, tough international sanctions, and keeping all the options on the table?

Senator HAGEL. You have just defined President Obama's strategy on Iran, which I firmly support, strongly support. It is the wise way to do it. I don't know if I mentioned this to you in our meeting, but I wrote a book in 2008 and I have a chapter on Iran, and I lay all that out in the chapter. As I've said, I don't think President Obama went to my chapter and developed his strategy based on my chapter, but there's nothing in that chapter that I wrote in that book in 2008 or anything I've ever said that deviates from where the President is.

The military option is always on the table, must be on the table, always should be the last option, always the last option. But aren't we wiser and smarter if we can figure this out, accomplish our objectives, without having to go to war, for everybody?

Senator SHAHEEN. I hope so.

You referenced the meeting that we had last week and I very much appreciated your taking time to come in and sit down and talk about some of the statements that have been represented that you have addressed today. One of those had to do with Israel's security. Again, I know this has been discussed at length during the day today, but I wonder if again you could reconfirm what your commitment is on Israel and the security of Israel in the Middle East?

Senator HAGEL. My support of Israel's security is and always has been very clear. I strongly support Israel. The security of Israel is a commitment that we made to Israel in 1948 when Israel was born under American leadership, President Harry Truman. That commitment is a bond that is more than just an ally to ally. It is special, it's historical, it's values-driven.

I've never equivocated from that line. My votes in the Senate have shown that. What I've said publicly has shown that. I've said this in my book. Absolutely, and we'll continue to do that.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Shaheen.

Okay, we're going to have a 5-minute second round, and if we need a third round we will have a third round. I'm going to try to take less than 5 minutes so I can yield a couple minutes, if I still have them, to Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Earlier today, Senator Hagel, one of my colleagues made a statement that you had not responded to requests for copies of all your speeches and to requests about contributions to certain organizations I believe that you either served or had spoken to, and that you didn't have the opportunity at that time to respond to that statement. I want to give you the opportunity now, if you wish to, or if you prefer to respond for the record.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will respond for the record. But I will take this opportunity to respond. First, as far as I know—and I asked again at the break of our counsel, Ethics Office lawyers, have we responded to all requests or are we in the process of responding to every single request? The answer is yes. Some of these requests didn't come in until yesterday, specifically the financial documentation request. Copies of my speeches came in late.

We have given the committee every copy of every speech that I have that's out there, every video that I have that's out there. On paid speeches, most every one of those paid speeches, in the contract it says that they are private and not videotaped. That wasn't my decision; that was the contract of the group I spoke to. I believe every paid speech I gave I didn't have a prepared text. I gave it extemporaneously, which is something I've been doing for long before I left the Senate.

We are fulfilling every legal commitment I said and I am obligated to, and I've complied with every ethical request. I always have. I did when I was in the Senate. I'll continue to do it now. We are doing it now.

Chairman LEVIN. There was one or two other times when you did not have the opportunity to reply to a question and, in order not to use up all my time, you should feel free to do that for the record. We're going to keep this record open until close of business tomorrow for questions and for your answers until close of business Monday, which means 5 p.m. tomorrow for questions for the record, 5 p.m. on Monday for your responses to questions for the record.

At that time, would you give us the update on any additional documents, speeches, or information that you have been requested to provide which you have not yet been able to, but is in the works, so you can give us an update?

Senator HAGEL. I will. Again, I have committed and will continue to commit to complying with every legal document, legal requirement.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

I hope I have a minute or 2 that I can then yield to Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that courtesy very, very much. I'm going to have to hurry this up a little bit because it's less time than I thought we had, I say to my good friend.

It was mentioned that one of the members up here thought I was being disrespectful during the time that I was questioning you. It was at a time when I made the statement that you have been endorsed by the ministry of Iran for your nomination to be Secretary of Defense. Do you consider that to be a disrespectful notion on my part?

Senator HAGEL. No, it's a legitimate question.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you very much.

I have kind of been the leader on postponing any further Abrams tanks or F–16s to Egypt until such time as that government is under control. This is my own statement, only representing my own thoughts. I think Morsi's an enemy. I think their military is a friend.

There was a vote just a little while ago to do away permanently with the sending of any of this equipment to Egypt. I don't think that's a good idea. What I think is a good idea is to continue to use that as leverage. If you do that, you lose the leverage. I believe that right now, Morsi has already distanced himself from the military. To me that's a first good step, and I would like to think that we could reinstate a friend in that area.

I would only ask you, would you agree with my statement that I came out with a long time ago or my bill that I introduced, I should say, and I re-introduced in a stronger way today, saying that we would withhold sending this equipment to Egypt until such time as these conditions are met? I mentioned the conditions of keeping the accords from Camp David and that type of thing. Would you consider that?

Senator HAGEL. First, that's a policy decision that the President of the United States would make. If he asks for my advice I would certainly give it to him. But to the bigger question, I think it is important that our assistance to Egypt be conditional. They play an absolutely critical role in fulfilling the commitments of Camp David for the security of Israel and elsewhere.

Senator INHOFE. I'm sorry to interrupt you, but we're almost out of time right now. I appreciate that answer.

You made one statement that I strongly disagreed with. You said that President Obama has been the strongest Israeli supporter since 1948. I have a hard time with that. I know that he's not up for confirmation; you are. But when you see statements coming out of the administration like, "The United States believes that negotiations should result in two states with permanent Palestinian borders with Israel and Jordan and Egypt," and they come out with the statements like, "We believe the borders of Israel and Palestine should be based on the 1967 borderlines," these are statements I think are very damaging, and I can assure you that the leadership over in Israel feel that those statements are damaging.

Do you still feel that President Obama has been the strongest supporter of Israel since 1948?

Senator HAGEL. I do, and I will tell you very quickly why. First of all, the 2006 Quartet Principles that President Bush laid down I think cover most of the points that you've made, and I supported President Bush then and still do, what he did in developing those principles.

But when you look at the assistance this administration has given to Israel, the most significant and largest military-to-military exercise, Austere Challenge, Israeli-U.S. forces last fall, the additional moneys that we put into Iron Dome, the President's position, we have your back——

Senator INHOFE. I've answered the question. That's fine. I appreciate it.

Senator HAGEL. I think it's hard to——

Senator INHOFE. But one other subject before we run out of time here, and it's one that I know you're very interested in. You actually were a co-sponsor of the Missile Defense Act of 1999 and I was, too. So we agreed. Times have changed since that time. At that time people thought having the capabilities was confined to the Soviet Union at that time, or Russia, and the United States. A lot has happened since then.

I often say that one of the things I disagreed with most in the first budget that this President had was when he did away with the ground-based interceptor site in Poland. I think most people are aware that was built for protection of Western Europe and the Eastern United States. I'm satisfied that we have, even with the reduction of ground-based interceptors on the west coast, which I disagreed with, but I still think we have adequate protection on the west coast. It's from the east coast, and right now our intelligence still says today that Iran will have the weapon capability and the delivery capability by 2015. That's why it was supposed to be there.

Now there's a discussion saying to cover that void we need to have a third site. Do you support a third site of ground-based interceptor? It would be on the east coast somewhere.

Senator HAGEL. I'm aware of the NDAA authorization and instruction for a third site and an environmental impact statement. I don't know enough of the details. If I am confirmed and go over there, I will get into it. But to respond to that, which I will for the record, I just don't know enough about it.

Senator INHOFE. Okay, if you'd respond for the record. I think it's very significant and I think that most people are looking at this with this void. You have a period of time between 2015—nobody disputes the capability that Iran will have at that time. It's not even classified. But there is still a void of about 6 years between that and when we would have the capability to knock down what has to be knocked down unless we have a third site in place. I am hoping that maybe for the record you'll come back and say that you support the third site.

If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the analysis Congress requested in section 221 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 to evaluate additional missile defense locations in the United States, including on the east coast, will be delivered on a timely basis, and that Congress remains informed about the Department's analysis about how to best protect the U.S. Homeland.

Senator INHOFE. The last thing I'll mention, if you'll forgive me, Mr. Chairman, when Senator Hirono talked to you she talked about your efforts and her expectations on your being involved in using DOD for all these environmental things. I would suggest to you that's why we have a Department of Energy. When I asked you the question, will you refrain from doing some of the things that have been done in the past in this administration, such as forcing the Navy to pay $26 a gallon for 450,000 gallons of fuel that you could buy for $3 and other things, it's billions of dollars that we're paying which we could be using for warfighting. I see an inconsistency in your answer to me and your answer to the Senator from Hawaii.

Senator HAGEL. My answer to the Senator from Hawaii was, I believe—they can read it back—that I am committed to all efficiencies that we can find in DOD which are in the interest of our country. I didn't commit to any one program.

Senator INHOFE. Or any program that would be a costly program on experimentation, such as the programs that I've just mentioned, clearly are in the jurisdiction of the Department of Energy and they're the ones supposed to be doing it. Don't you agree that we should be confining ourselves to enhancing our warfighter capabilities?

Senator HAGEL. Well, of course. But I think within that realm certainly the kind of money that we spend, as you've noted, on fuel, that should include some not only sense of that, but are there things that we can be doing with our research and technology in DOD, why wouldn't we? It just seems to make sense.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, we should as a government, but that's what the Department of Energy is supposed to be doing. When you said, as you suggest, the high cost of fuel, yes, it's a high cost because we're paying 10 times as much as we would have to pay, money that we could be putting toward our warfighting efforts. That's my point.

Senator HAGEL. Yes, I agree, but why wouldn't we be looking at all options if we have the kind of sophisticated research and technology that DOD does and has possession of? Why wouldn't we be enlarging that? I don't know anything more specific to or central to our security than energy.

Senator INHOFE. I know my time has expired. We're spending literally millions, actually some billions of dollars, on some of these experimentations that again are not in the purview of this. Right now we're stalling 179 F–35s that we just recently are putting off. I always say that if they put them off indefinitely, that's just a cut; it's not a put-off. Those are things that we should be doing right now.

We're looking at the Ohio-class sub. We should be doing that right now, but we've postponed it. If we were to spend the money that we're spending on the environmental causes on warfighting, I think it would do us better good. Apparently you don't agree with that.

Senator HAGEL. I've said what I said, but I will commit this to you, Senator, that, as I said to the Senator from Hawaii, I will, if I'm confirmed, will obviously look at all these programs. I'll have to.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Manchin.

Senator MANCHIN. Thank you.

Sir, I feel like I want to apologize for some of the tone and demeanor today.

With that being said, if I could ask you this, since we're so again talking about things you have done, things you have said over the years. How did you get to Vietnam? I want to go back there. Were you ordered to go to Vietnam? Were you sent there? Or how was your orders?

Senator HAGEL. Actually I got to Vietnam through kind of an interesting route. I volunteered for the draft, as my brother did a month after me. During that time in 1967 the draft was coming down with pretty heavy levies. You recall.

Senator MANCHIN. I was there.

Senator HAGEL. I know your story. They wouldn't take you, not because you weren't smart enough, of course, but they wouldn't take you because of your knees. I know you tried to bribe your way in, but they still wouldn't let you. I admire you for that effort and I know your story.

I went to basic training, advanced infantry training. My brother followed me everywhere a month after me. After advanced infantry training, I was selected to be one of nine first class then-Top Secret shoulder-fired heat-seeking missile called the Redeye gun. At the time it was classified, and it was built to bring down low-flying Soviet MiGs coming over Germany, eastern Germany, down the Fulda Gap.

We went to White Sands Missile Range and spent 2 months training. It was all classified, couldn't get calls in or out. We were then quietly, all nine of us, ordered to go to Germany and be integrated into NATO units without any fanfare or anybody knowing about it.

I got my orders to go to Germany. I went to Fort Dix, NJ, in November 1967. My eight fellow soldiers and I were getting packed up to get the bus to go out to the airport to take a flight to Germany, and I just decided if I was going to be in the military it didn't make much sense to go to Germany. I'd never been to Germany. My great-grandparents were from Germany. Probably a pretty good place, I thought, but I had to go where there was a war.

So I took my orders down to the orderly, told him I was Private Hagel, I had orders to go to Germany, here are my orders, and I wanted to volunteer to go to Vietnam. The office was a bit quiet. They put me in a holding room. They brought priests, rabbis, ministers, psychiatrists. All came in to examine me, thinking that something was wrong, I was running away from something or I had killed somebody.

After 2 days of testing me to see if it was okay, they held me, which—I scrubbed barracks for 5 days before they could cut new orders. So they gave me new orders to go to Vietnam, sent me home for 5 days, and then on to Travis Air Force Base in San Francisco, and I got to Vietnam December 1967, got back to the United States December——

Senator MANCHIN. There is no reason any one of us should ever be concerned about your willing to do anything that you possibly can to defend this country and making sure that we defend against all foreign enemies, wherever they may be?

Senator HAGEL. I hope not, Senator. I mean, we can disagree on policies, but I think my life and my commitment to this country is pretty clear, and I'm proud of it.

Senator MANCHIN. On that, sir, I would say that Israel, the spokespeople for Israel, support you. They've come to me and they tell me they support you. Have you gotten that?

Senator HAGEL. There are a lot of pro-Israeli groups that have formally come out and endorsed me, support me, which I'm grateful for.

Senator MANCHIN. From what I've heard today, it sounds like Iran has wishful thinking.

Senator HAGEL. Evidently Iran supports me.

Senator MANCHIN. The President has asked you to serve at this level, so he has confidence in you.

Senator HAGEL. The President did ask me to serve. I said in my opening statement I am grateful and honored by that trust and confidence, and I will do everything in my power never to do anything that would disabuse that confidence and trust for this country.

Senator MANCHIN. One final question very quickly, if I may. As you see the role of Secretary of Defense—and I know we've talked about and you've been questioned on policy, and I know you're not going to be in a policy position. You're going to be basically following policy, not making policy. But if you could just wrap it up, what we should expect from your position as Secretary of Defense?

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Senator. If I am confirmed, as I noted in my opening comments, I would see this relationship, Senator, as a partnership. I'm going to need your help. I'm going to need your advice. I'm going to need your collaboration.

Many people on this authorization committee have a great deal of experience in this business, many far more than I do, as is the case in Congress, both the Senate and the House. I will need that. I will call upon that.

I won't be in a policymaking position, as you note. I also committed to all of you—and those of you who served with me know this—I'll always be honest with you. You'll never have to worry about that. I'll listen to you. I'm sure we won't always agree, but I'll say it straight, and I'll give you and the President my honest, most informed advice always.

Senator MANCHIN. Thank you. I'll say one more thing. Where I come from there's an old saying: If you can't change your mind, you can't change anything.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Manchin.

Senator Sessions.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Senator Hagel. You're holding up well. But it's an important office and you're asked to lead our Defense Department. I know you know the seriousness of that and it's exceedingly important.

You have to know, and particularly in recent years, there has been tension in Congress between the executive branch and Congress over a number of issues. One of them is national missile defense, and that's a subcommittee I'm a member of and we've wrestled with that over the years, and had pretty consistently a bipartisan congressional vote on those issues. We voted again this year a unanimous Armed Services Defense Authorization Bill, unanimous out of committee, under Chairman Levin's leadership and Senator McCain.

But I'm looking today, I believe in the National Journal, the Obama administration is moving to begin new U.S.-Russian talks on further drawdowns of the Nation's nuclear arsenal. That's also been an issue of concern, but I believe we've been staying fairly bipartisan and unified on that.

But your report is what causes a great deal of concern, this study of the Global Zero group. But I just note that Vice President Biden is set to meet with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov this weekend during the Munich security conference. National Security Advisor Tom Donilon will then head to Moscow in February. President Obama and then-President Medvedev signed the bilateral New START Treaty in 2010 calling for deployment of strategic nuclear arsenals involving 700 delivery systems.

Now, as I read the Global Zero report that you co-authored just last year, less than a year ago, you call for the elimination of all ICBMs, all tactical nuclear weapons, most of the bombers, I think 76 B–52s eliminated, leaving only 18 bombers and 10 submarines. So instead of 700 delivery systems that was part of the New START, it looks like you're down to about 28 delivery systems. So this introduced dramatic concern.

There are worries on Capitol Hill, the National Journal reports, that the administration could revise its missile shield strategy or go ahead with cutbacks to the U.S. stockpile as a means of drawing Russia into new negotiations. Foreign Policy Magazine reported ahead of your unannounced discussions with Lavrov, House committee chairman, subcommittee chairman, Mike Rogers asked that they have assurance as to what's going on there, essentially.

I would note that the last year's defense authorization bill calls for briefings on these discussions to Congress, to the Armed Services Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee. It says "Not later than 60 days after the date of the enactment of this act and not less than twice each year thereafter, the President or the President's designee shall brief the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate on the dialogue between the United States and the Russian Federation on issues related to limits or controls on nuclear arms, missile defense systems, and long-range conventional strike systems." The deadline I believe for that briefing would be March 2 this year.

So a first question to you: If you're confirmed in this position, will you honor that request as part of the NDAA?

Senator HAGEL. The request for the briefing?

Senator SESSIONS. Briefings, yes, the requirements for the briefings. Will you keep Congress advised on any discussions dealing with national missile defense and dialogue with Russia on national missile defense and nuclear arms and long-range conventional strike systems?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, I commit to do that.

Senator SESSIONS. Also, there's a Sense of Congress on certain agreements: "It is the Sense of Congress that any agreement between the United States and the Russian Federation related to nuclear arms or missile defense systems or long-range conventional strike systems, obligating the United States to reduce or limit Armed Forces or armaments of the United States in any militarily significant manner may be made only pursuant to the treat-making power of the President as set forth in Article II, Section 2, Clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States."

That is a Sense of our Congress that any significant alteration of those deeply important relation between our two nations, the two most powerful nuclear nations in the world, would be done by treaty. Will you support that concept and before making significant changes present those changes to Congress pursuant to a treaty, and not as a either secret or open bilateral agreement?

Senator HAGEL. Your question is will I commit to a briefing on all this?

Senator SESSIONS. No. Whether or not that any significant changes that would occur in our relationship on those issues, significant—"in any militarily significant manner may be made only pursuant to the treaty-making power of the President". We would ask that that be presented to this Congress because we have treaties already that impact so much of this and Congress believes that any changes should also be made by treaty.

Senator HAGEL. Without getting into specifics of it, let me just commit to obviously consultation with Congress, with the authorizing committee, yes.

Senator SESSIONS. It seems like we've not been consulted on the Biden trip and the Donilon trip. We expect that to be done. What's been going on is disturbing to us. The President said to Mr. Medvedev that we'll have more flexibility after the election, and he was clearly responding to these issues, missile defense I think in particular and maybe nuclear issues also. He wasn't consulting with the American people, wasn't telling us or Congress what he planned to do, but he was apparently willing to discuss it with the Russian leaders.

I guess I'm asking you, will you comply with the treaty-making matters? If these agreements are significant militarily, I believe they should be done by treaty and not by personal agreements between our two leaders.

Senator HAGEL. I would commit to fulfilling any treaty obligations and any commitments to Congress and any consultations that Congress needs to be part of, absolutely.

Senator SESSIONS. I'm not sure that answered the question, because Congress is concerned about these kind of negotiations that are going on. We do not have—the President also has made it clear he believes in zero nuclear weapons. That is his policy for America. I think it's utterly unrealistic. It's just amazing to me, and that could lead us into unwise decisionmaking.

Congress has a responsibility to the American people to ensure the national defense. We need to know and have you share those negotiations with us, and changes that impact our security relationships between us and Russia should be done by treaty, as they've been done in the past.

Senator HAGEL. I've never discussed any of the specifics of this with the President. I know he knows and believes and is committed to treaties. That's the purview of the U.S. Senate, as the Senate passed the New START treaty. All that goes into that negotiation with, in this particular case, Russia certainly Congress has to be involved in that.

Senator SESSIONS. That's very important, Senator Hagel, I just have to tell you, because there's unease here that may not be in the works. There's been some discussion for some time about private unilateral or bilateral negotiations in which Congress is not involved, that impacts the national security of our country. That's why this was passed, just passed. So we expect you to comply with that, and I take your testimony that you would comply with that.

Senator HAGEL. I will comply with all requirements and laws, absolutely.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Sessions.

Senator King.

Senator KING. Senator Hagel, one of the first meetings I had after I began running for this office last summer was with a group of veterans, going all the way from World War II right up through Iraq and Afghanistan. I want to share with you one of the ideas that came out of that meeting because it's been touched upon today, and that is the issue of employability and employment of particularly recent veterans. The suggestion was made that the Army and the military has recruiters, people who help to bring people in, and perhaps it might make some sense for them to have the reciprocal of recruiters, outplacement people to deal with soldiers who are, men and women, who are about to leave, because there's an information gap, is what the veterans told me, between leaving the military Active Duty and then going into the Veterans Administration jurisdiction. There's a gap there.

You don't really need to respond, but that's a suggestion I might make, where it would be tremendously helpful to provide that kind of information—what the programs are, what's available, what the scholarships are, how the GI Bill works, all those things, to people. I'm sure it's done to some extent now, but to really regularize that and increase it, to be comparable to the effort that's put into recruiting.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Senator. I will think about that. I had not thought exactly about that potential, but I would say that as we think through how do we accommodate and fulfill commitments and assist our veterans, I think we have to open up all vistas of new thinking and that is one that would deserve some exploration and if I'm confirmed I look forward to pursuing the idea with you.

Senator KING. Thank you.

I'm also serving on the Intelligence Committee and one of the issues—and you talked about this in your statement and it's been touched upon some today—is the whole issue of counterterrorism. Counterterrorism involves the actions of a number of agencies and bodies of the U.S. Government. I would commend to you that I think it deserves some real thought as to where DOD ends, stops, and the CIA begins in terms of action and counterterrorism action.

I think it would be worthwhile for you, if you are confirmed, to meet with Mr. Brennan, if he's confirmed, to talk about the coordination between the two agencies, so we don't end up with similar, if not identical, functions in different regions of the world with whole different command structures, rules of engagement, and all of those kinds of things.

I think counterterrorism sort of spans, covers the gap or the relationship between traditional defense and the Intelligence Community.

Senator HAGEL. That is an area that is becoming more and more relevant, complicated, title 10 versus title 50 and all those dynamics. If confirmed, yes, if Mr. Brennan is confirmed, we'll be spending some time together.

Senator KING. A final thought, and I know you've touched upon this. I don't think we can adequately emphasize the importance of the cyber threat. That may well be the war of the future. My sense is that we're all talking about it, but I'm not sure we have the sense of urgency. I know Secretary Panetta has increased or proposed the increase of that capacity. But people can die and our society could be brought to a standstill without a rocket ever taking off or an airplane penetrating our air space, and I hope that will be a point of emphasis because, as I say, I think that may be the next war.

Senator HAGEL. I agree. I noted it in my opening statement. I agree with everything you've said. This is a huge issue that continues to loom large over our future and our security, and it will have, if confirmed, a lot of my attention.

Senator KING. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you.

Senator KING [presiding]. In the absence of the chairman, Senator Ayotte, I believe it's your opportunity.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KING. Wow, that was fast.

Senator AYOTTE. You've been promoted very quickly.

Senator KING. Really, that's astounding. [Laughter.]

Senator AYOTTE. First of all, we've all expressed our deep respect for your service to our country, but also let me thank you for your endurance. We appreciate it.

I wanted to ask you about a speech that you made in 2007. It was at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and it was a speech titled "The United States and Iran at Dangerous Crossroads". In that speech you, in referring to Iran, you said that "the strategy of containment remains relevant today".

I wanted to ask you about that statement that you made in 2007 about "the strategy of containment remains relevant" with regard to Iran today. Now, that was in 2007, but why would you say that, first of all? Then, isn't that inconsistent with what you've been saying today with regard to containment?

Senator HAGEL. I don't have the speech in front of me and I think there was more to it than just that few words that you quoted. If I recall, the entire speech was about how do we deal with Iran. If I recall, what I was inventorying in specific reference to containment was within that inventory what are the options. I don't think that speech says that I support it.

Senator AYOTTE. No, but you said that it was relevant to the discussion with Iran, and I guess I would ask you to say why do you think that that was a strategy that we should have considered? It was obviously one of the things you mentioned.

Senator HAGEL. I didn't say it was a strategy, I don't think. As I said, in the context of how do we deal with——

Senator AYOTTE. I don't want to be unfair, but I think, just to be clear, the quote that you said was "The strategy of containment remains relevant." So why is it relevant with regard to Iran?

Senator HAGEL. The bigger point is what I was saying, I think—I haven't looked at that speech since I gave it, probably, but I do recall some of it. The point was, what is the range of options that we would have to look at, the world would look at. Again, I didn't advocate it, I didn't recommend it, I didn't support it.

Senator AYOTTE. Was it that containment was one of the options?

Senator HAGEL. Yes. I mean, of course. When you look at the whole range of what your options are, that certainly would be one of them.

Senator AYOTTE. Do you think containment's one of the options now?

Senator HAGEL. No, I don't know. But it doesn't make any difference what I think. It's when you look at range, it's like the Global Zero report. That was not a recommendation report. That was a range of goals, aspirations, possibilities. That report never said we recommend the following. If I recall that speech, I think that was the same kind of what's the range of options.

Senator AYOTTE. Senator, I want to be clear: It does matter what you think, and obviously your understanding and thought process on these issues is very important to us. So as a follow-up, I know that Senator Vitter had asked you about a portion of the book that you wrote, "America, Our Next Chapter," and it was in that book you had said that "The genie of nuclear armaments is already out of the bottle no matter what Iran does." Obviously, North Korea, other powers. "In this imperfect world, sovereign nation states possession nuclear weapons capability, as opposed to stateless terrorist groups, will often respond with some degree of responsible, or at least sane, behavior."

Do you believe that Iran responds or will respond with some degree of responsible or sane behavior?

Senator HAGEL. First of all, it's not what I suggested in that quote.

Senator AYOTTE. Well, it's in the context of Iran, but I'm asking you just straightforwardly: Do you think that the Iranian regime responds—you talked about the difference between nation states versus, for example, stateless terrorist organizations. Do you believe, in the context of Iran, do you believe that the Iranian regime responds with some degree of responsible, or at least sane, behavior, or will respond like that?

Senator HAGEL. So far they have not, and I have said and I've said in that same book that you're quoting from, that Iran is a state sponsor of terrorism. I've said that many times. So no is the answer to your question.

Senator AYOTTE. If they haven't been responding with a level of, with a degree of responsible or sane behavior and, as you say in your book, that it's a state sponsor of terrorism, I'm also struggling with the question of why you would have thought that it was appropriate for us to have direct, unconditional talks with Iran, because here we have a regime that doesn't respond in a responsible or sane behavior, is a state sponsor of terrorism, and what we thought we could—why that would be an appropriate manner for us to address them?

Senator HAGEL. Well, first, I said "engagement". I think we should talk. We actually are indirectly in the P5 Plus 1. We have been. I think that's responsible. I think it's always responsible to try to talk first.

North Korea, I don't consider North Korea a responsible, sane administration, but we are talking to North Korea. We've been talking bilaterally to North Korea. We're talking with the Party of 6 to North Korea. I think that's wise. I think it's always wise to try to talk to people before you get into war.

Senator AYOTTE. But I think that you were beyond the P5. You refer to direct discussions with our two countries, and also for establishing diplomatic ties with our country.

Senator HAGEL. Again, when I talked about the possibility of diplomatic ties or even I said, I think, in 2002 encouraging Iran to join the World Trade Organization, I've always thought that that's smarter more wiser, if you can push, help push, institutions like China into world bodies, because when they go into world bodies they have to comply with some semblance of international behavior. It doesn't mean they always will. They won't. They cheat. But I think we're smarter to do that.

Senator, I've never thought engagement is weakness. I never thought it was surrender. I never thought it was appeasement. I think it's clearly in our interest. If that doesn't work, then I think the President's position and his strategy has been exactly right: Get the United Nations behind you, get the international sanctions behind you, keep military options on the table. If the military option is the only option, it's the only option.

Senator AYOTTE. Just to be clear, I don't think that all engagement is weakness, either. But I think there's a huge distinction when we're dealing with a regime that is the largest state sponsor of terrorism, and given the fact that they have a long history, including in Iraq, with assisting the militias to murder our troops, including what they've done with Hezbollah and Hamas, what they're doing now in Syria. I think there's always a distinction in how we deal with different players around the world, is my point.

I know that my time has expired and I will submit for the record questions that I think are very important about the Virginia-class submarine. I share the important work done at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard with my colleagues Senator Jeanne Shaheen and also I know Senator King is very focused on that, and maintaining our submarine fleet. I know that Senator Blumenthal asked you about that as well.

I do have concerns that part of the Global Zero report does recommend that the Ohio-class submarine would actually be diminished down to 10. I'll follow up with those questions and the record. I have to go now. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. I'd be glad to respond. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN [presiding]. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Donnelly?

Senator DONNELLY. No.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. Senator Fischer.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Senator Hagel. It's been a long day and I do appreciate your answers to these important questions.

When we spoke last week, we talked somewhat about the sequester, also budget concerns, the modernization of our nuclear forces. Especially being from Nebraska, you understand the importance of STRATCOM and its mission as it deals with deterrence that we use in this country and that we've used for many, many years and I believe has been very, very successful and it's a good point for us.

Today you also in your opening discussed the need to modernize our defensive forces. You spoke to Senator Blunt, also Senator Blumenthal, about the need to modernize our Navy.

I guess I would like to hear your thought process about how we're going to do this. Where's the money coming from? How are you going to advise the President in making these decisions? Because we're looking at sequester, we're looking at budget constraints. How is this all going to tie together, and what would be your advice to the President on how the Pentagon is going to address all of those budget constraints?

Senator HAGEL. Let's start with where we are. The Pentagon is adjusting, and I think responsibly, to our future based on the Budget Control Act of 2011. You know the details of that. The Chiefs have submitted plans. I think as we rebalance and refit and unwind the second war and all the other dynamics that are changing since the last decade, it gives us some new opportunities: audits, all the acquisition focus, accountability. We are being forced, DOD, to take a hard look at its priorities.

But as I've said before, it begins with mission and then the resources to fulfill that mission, and then what are the priorities within that mission.

To your specific question, how do you finance it all, well, if sequestration would take effect then all of this is going to be affected. That's exactly right. We've deferred some decisions. We've set back some of the schedules on some of our ships, planes, decisions on a number of things.

It isn't just the dollars that affect this, but it's the planning, it's the flexibility. It's the ability to bring all this together and then project and plan.

So in no way—I hope I did not give any indication that we were going to be able to continue to do everything for everybody everywhere. That's just not a reality.

Senator FISCHER. We can't.

Senator HAGEL. We can't.

Senator FISCHER. How do you decide, though? You've made commitments to members here today on philosophy, on working with this committee. Do we have a commitment to build up the Navy? Do we have a commitment to STRATCOM so that they can continue their mission of deterrence? Do we have those commitments?

How do you decide what's going to be the priority? What will your advice be? Is STRATCOM important? Should that be a priority? Would it be a priority in your advice to the President?

Senator HAGEL. The Pentagon is working off the Defense Authorization Act of 2013, which this committee passed. That is the directive that frames the budgetary restraints, except if sequestration takes effect. That prioritizes, to your point, being what's important, what do you budget for, what do you finance. We have to manage that.

If I am confirmed, then I'll be working closely with our Chiefs and all of our managers and decisionmakers on how we do this. On STRATCOM, I think STRATCOM is vitally important to the future of this country. It's been my position when I was in the Senate. It was my position long before I was in the Senate. Of the nine combatant commands—STRATCOM is one of them—that's a key command.

We have to continue to fund our commands and find ways to do that. But that's going to require some tough choices and hard decisions.

Senator FISCHER. Right. Also, I believe we need to make sure we don't have hollow forces out there as well.

My time's up. Once again, I thank you. I thank you for your service. I thank you for being here today. I thank you for your willingness to continue to serve the people of this country.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, thank you.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Fischer.

Senator Blunt.

Senator BLUNT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Again, I join everybody else, Senator Hagel, in thanking you for staying today and the answers you've given.

One of the things we were frustrated about was the difficulty of getting information on the groups you've spoken to in the last year, and of course the hundreds of groups you've spoken to in the course of your career would be too much to ask. I do have three comments from groups that I'm going to enter into the record, two comments you made before groups, one the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee conference in 2002; another Arab-American audience in 2007; and then in 2006, the one I'll put in the record right now and just enter the others, the Council on American-Islamic Relations Forum. "University of Chicago Professor John Mearsheimer praised Hagel for not being pro-Israel. He said 'Potential presidential candidates for 2008, like Hillary Clinton, John McCain, Joe Biden, and Newt Gingrich, were falling all over themselves to express their support for Israel. The only exception to that rule was Senator Chuck Hagel.'" Unfortunately, I don't have anything to go with that of what you might have said.

But some of the concerns of being—I used to say when I was the Whip in the House that you could count on the House and the Senate to be, among other things, always pro-Israel, and I think that's been the mainstream of our views. I've seen a number of times, in fairness to you, where you've said you're pro-Israel, but that doesn't mean you have to be reflexively for everything that Israel is for.

These statements are what they are. They're the things that were reported from comments you made that are out of the context of the other comments. But I'm going to put those all in the record.

AAI's Gibran Awards Gala an Event To Remember

HUNDREDS OF ARAB Americans, elected officials, community activists and leaders gathered to celebrate the humanitarian achievements of Global Impact, Search for Common Ground, and Cardinal Theodore McCarrick at the ninth annual Kahlil Gibran "Spirit of Humanity" Awards gala on April 25 at the J.W. Marriott Hotel in Washington, DC. Teresa Isaac received the fourth annual Najeeb Halaby Award for Public Service in recognition of her dedicated service as a community leader and then as mayor of Lexington, KY at the Arab American Institute's annual dinner.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-NE) (Photo D. Hanley).

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-CA) received applause when she pledged to continue to push for a ban on cluster bombs, and when she called for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-NE), who is considering a run for the presidency, said he believes Israel and the United States have a "special relationship." He recounted a conversation with an activist who said the senator wasn't a friend of Israel because he couldn't be relied on as an "automatic vote." Hagel resented being told that if he wants backing from the pro-Israel community, his support for Israel should be automatic. "First, I am an American senator," Hagel said to wild applause.

Hagel also said he would not sacrifice his friendships in the Arab and Muslim world to please pro-Israel groups. "No relationship should be founded on holding hostage other relationships," he insisted. "Why must it be a choice? It is not a choice."

Governor of New Mexico Bill Richardson, a Democrat, told Arab Americans that, as president, he would close the Guantanamo Bay prison. The prisons at Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib, he said, had made Americans "very, very ashamed."

Richardson, who served as U.S. ambassador to the U.N. in 1997 and '98, promised that in his first week in the White House he would name a Middle East peace envoy to try to get the peace process between Israel and Palestine moving again. "You have to be pushing very strongly for a two-state solution," he maintained. "The cornerstone of American foreign policy is diplomacy and dialogue."

Richardson also said he would remove U.S. troops from Iraq and talk to Syria and Iran about Iraq's security.

Dr. James J. Zogby, founder and president of AAI, presented an award to Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick, the recently retired Catholic archbishop of Washington, DC who has spent his life serving the powerless. McCarrick's support for interfaith understanding and human rights kept the issue of Mideast peace on the agenda of the U.S. Conference of Bishops.

Assistant Secretary of State for Educational and Cultural Affairs Dina Powell, the highest-ranking Arab American in the Bush administration, described emigrating from Egypt with her parents as a 5-year-old who couldn't speak English. When she grew up her parents told her to do whatever she wanted—as long as she became an engineer, lawyer or doctor. She bewildered them but made them proud, she said, when she ended up serving the president of their adopted country. (Powell subsequently resigned to join the Goldman Sachs Group.) "In America everything is possible," she concluded.

Another beloved Arab American, Pulitzer Prize winner and Washington Post Middle East correspondent Anthony Shadid, gave a stirring speech about the need to build a bridge for peace between the U.S. and Arab world. Once an Arab-American gets that hyphen he or she can never go back, Shadid said, but "you can serve as a bridge. And in this age of walls and borders that divide, a few more bridges might actually help."

Hagel: Support for Israel not 'automatic

By · April 26, 2007

U.S. Sen. Chuck Hagel told an Arab-American audience that his support for Israel was not "automatic." Hagel (R-Neb.), who is considering a run for the presidency, told the Arab American Institute's annual dinner that he believes Israel and the United States have a "special relationship," but resented being told by a pro-Israel activist that if he wants backing from the pro-Israel community, his support for Israel should be "automatic." "First, I am an American senator," Hagel told the AAI audience in Washington on Wednesday, to applause. He also said he would not sacrifice his friendships in the Arab world to please pro-Israel groups. "No relationship should be founded on holding hostage other relationships," Hagel said. "Why can't I have that relationship" with Israel and its allies "not at the expense of my friends in the Arab world, in the Muslim world? Why must it be a choice? It is not a choice."

Senator BLUNT. Also, earlier today I asked you about the comment about the bloated Pentagon. I want to get this straight. You said that that, those comments, were before the sequestration bill passed, and they were after. Sequestration passed on August 2. The Financial Times interview was on August 29. What you said on August 29 in that Financial Times interview was you said "I think"—August 29, 2011. The quote out of the article was:

"The Defense Department I think"—this was your quote. "The Defense Department I think in many ways has been bloated. Let's look at the reality here. The Defense Department's gotten everything it wanted the last 10 years and more. We've taken priorities, we've taken dollars, we've taken programs, we've taken policies out of the State Department, out of a number of other Departments, and put them over in Defense."

So that "bloated" comment was after sequestration. Of course, this is the Department you now, 18 months later, if this nomination is approved, would be running. Again, where do we find that, those bloated things in the Defense Department, and what are you prioritizing? Another way to ask what Ms. Fischer was asking maybe is, are we going to let money drive strategy here or strategy drive the money? As Secretary of Defense, which of those positions are you going to take and how are you going to advocate, here's the money we need for the strategy we must have until we get to the reality of here's the money you have, now do the best you can with it? I hope you're an advocate for strategic-driven spending in the Pentagon, rather than just the caretaker of the money that winds up there.

Senator HAGEL. Senator, thank you. There are a lot of pieces and I know we have time issues, but let me start this way. First, on the comments I made in the Financial Times interview, again as I addressed that today, that was an extensive interview about a lot of things. So I was 3 weeks off.

Senator BLUNT. Well, you were after the sequestration bill had passed, though. So you were talking——

Senator HAGEL. Not sequestration; the Budget Control Act.

Senator BLUNT. But that's what included—they were talking here about what would happen if you took these cuts.

Senator HAGEL. That's what I was talking about. But the Budget Control Act that was passed was implemented a few months later, which I agreed with, and obviously the majority of Congress did as well, to try to find $1 trillion overall in our Government in savings and $490 billion is coming out of DOD for the next 10 years.

But to your bigger point, you start there with the reality of what Congress has passed, what Congress has decided to appropriate for each Federal agency. In this current fiscal year that we're living in, it's a $525 billion operating budget and $88 billion for overseas contingencies. DOD works within the framework of those numbers.

I've said a number of times here that I agree with you that budget alone should not drive our national security, of course not. What is the mission, as I've said? What are the priorities, which you just brought up about different projects that Senator Fischer and others have asked me about? How are going to fund everything? Should you fund everything?

Do times change? Are there different threats? Ten years ago, we put a lot of money in the Defense Department budget; there was no such thing as a cyber warfare threat. Do we need to do more there?

Do we need to change our force presence in Asia? We've decided we're going to do that. That changes things. We're moving marines around in the Pacific. That wasn't the case 10 years ago.

So things change. You manage and you direct your efforts and you lead based on the security interests of your country first. If I am confirmed, Senator, I will be a strong, have to be a strong advocate for the Defense Department. That will be part of my job. But that doesn't mean that I don't have some responsibilities for efficient use of the taxpayers' dollars and effective use of the taxpayers' dollars.

Senator BLUNT. Just the opposite, you do have that responsibility.

Senator HAGEL. I do, that's right.

Senator BLUNT. But I think the point is we want to be sure that you're advocating for the money you think you need to strategically accomplish what we can. Then obviously at the end of the day you have to deal with the will of the process to provide the money you have. But we ought to let the money as much as possible be defined by the strategy rather than the other way around, Senator.

Senator HAGEL. I agree with that.

Senator BLUNT. I'm once again out of time.

Senator HAGEL. I agree with that, Senator. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Blunt.

Senator Reed.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hagel, we have listened all afternoon to a series of questions about what you said in 2002, in 2006, in 2007. I expect, though, if you're confirmed as the Secretary of Defense the President of the United States will not turn to you and ask you about your floor speeches, as elegant as they were. He will ask you if you're prepared to advise him on matters of literally life and death, that you have prepared DOD to address every contingency in a thoughtful way, knowing the costs and the benefits; that he assumes, as I do and as you've stated repeatedly, your staunch commitment to our allies, in particular in the context today of the State of Israel; and that you are fundamentally committed to the welfare of our troops and families because you have seen as a soldier that ultimately they are the difference in our military.

Looking not backwards to a series of individual quotes and footnotes, but looking ahead, if you are there and the President turns to you, can you give us—and I think you can; I'm convinced of that—the confidence that you will be prepared to give him the advice he needs to make life and death decisions which he as Commander in Chief must make?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, when the President asked me to consider this job I didn't want another job. I was not looking for another job. Lilibet and I had a pretty good life since I left the Senate, nothing personal. But the friendships that we've maintained here and valued here and the experiences we had here we will treasure for always. Highest privilege of my life, serving in this body.

I say that because I wasn't looking for another job. The President asked me to come see him and we had a long conversation one night, just the two of us, over an hour. We talked about the job, the world, security, the future. Within the context of that conversation, we got down into what about this job.

I didn't try to sell him on the job, that I could do it. In fact, when he asked me about why am I qualified or why would I be uniquely qualified, I said I'm not. There are a lot of very qualified Americans who could do this job. I don't think a lot of them in the sense that they're out there everywhere. I think there are some qualifications for this job. But I'm not the only one.

I said: "Mr. President, I'm not going to sit here and try to convince you that I'm the right person. You know me, you know my record, you know what I believe." I've had the opportunity to work with him pretty closely over the last 4 years as I served as co-chairman with you and Senator Levin's former colleague, Senator Dave Boren from Oklahoma, on the President's Intelligence Advisory Board. That's allowed me to stay pretty current with intelligence and make a contribution maybe a little bit there. In the last 4 years I've served on Secretary Gates', Secretary Panetta's Policy Advisory Boards.

I do have some understanding, as I told him, of this. But why I think when Lilibet and I talked about it I agreed to go forward with this is because of the tremendous opportunities and the important time that we are living in and the opportunities we now have to help make a better world. I think the next few years are going to be as defining and as important in this country truly as any few years post-World War II.

I told the President he was here at a very defining time, and if I can help him do that, if I can help this country, I want to do it. The experiences I'll bring to the job, Senator, I think I have a pretty varied background on a lot of things. I think always in the end, like any job, judgment is the ultimate determinant of everything. I think experience is a factor, varied experience, responsible experience. But that all adds up to judgment. I hope, if I'm confirmed, I can do those things to give the President and this country wise, informed, honest advice, and I will do everything within my power to do that.

Senator REED. Thank you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Reed.

Senator Cruz.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hagel, thank you for remaining through what has been a very long hearing.

I'd like to ask some additional questions to further explore your positions and your record, and begin with asking: Are you familiar with an individual named Chas Freeman?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, yes.

Senator CRUZ. He was, if I understand correctly, a vice chairman at the Atlantic Council; is that correct?

Senator HAGEL. When I became Chairman of the Atlantic Council after I left the Senate to replace General Jim Jones, he was one of many board members and I think was a vice chairman. But I never really worked with him in the Atlantic Council, but I know him, yes.

Senator CRUZ. You and he were part of a group that traveled last year to China together; is that correct as well?

Senator HAGEL. No, that's not correct.

Senator CRUZ. Okay. There have been press reports to that effect.

Senator HAGEL. Those press reports are incorrect. I have never been on any trip with Chas Freeman.

Senator CRUZ. There have also been press reports that has described Mr. Freeman as helping coordinate efforts to defend your nomination. Is that an accurate characterization?

Senator HAGEL. I haven't spoken with Chas Freeman in years. I don't know of any activity that he's involved in to endorse me. There are a lot of people I appreciate are endorsing me and supporting me, but I haven't talked to Chas Freeman in years.

Senator CRUZ. Is he someone whose judgment you respect?

Senator HAGEL. I think Chas Freeman has been an important public servant for this country. There are a lot of different opinions that people have on different issues. I don't agree with everybody and it's pretty clear everybody doesn't agree with me. So that's okay.

Senator CRUZ. Do you consider his views well within the mainstream?

Senator HAGEL. What views are you speaking about, Senator?

Senator CRUZ. His views on the Middle East and on the Nation of Israel?

Senator HAGEL. I'm not actually that familiar with all of his views. I can't speak for Chas Freeman.

Senator CRUZ. All right. Let's move on to your record then. You stated in your prepared remarks: "My overall world view has never changed." I have to admit I find that difficult to reconcile with statements and positions you've taken for over a decade and what seems to me a fairly significant shift since you've been nominated for Secretary of Defense.

What I'd like to do is go through some past statements, past positions of yours and just clarify if you agree with them or not, beginning with number one. In 2001, you voted against legislation sanctioning Iran. Now, am I correct you no longer agree with that position; you think sanctions against Iran are a good policy today?

In 2001, Senator Hagel voted against legislation sanctioning Iran for its pursuit of weapons of mass destruction and support for international terrorism.

Senator HAGEL. I have said on the record multilateral international sanctions——

Senator CRUZ. Do you agree with sanctions against Iran?

Senator HAGEL. I'm sorry?

Senator CRUZ. Do you think sanctions against Iran are a good idea today?

Senator HAGEL. Yes, yes. Yes, I always have.

Senator CRUZ. So it's fair—I'm trying to characterize your—I'm trying to understand your views and characterize them fairly. It's fair to say you no longer agree with the position in 2001 that we should not be sanctioning Iran?

Senator HAGEL. That was a unilateral sanction and the Bush administration—

Senator CRUZ. Today do you think unilateral sanctions are a bad idea?

Senator HAGEL. It's a different time now because we now have international sanctions on. I've supported the President's position——

Senator CRUZ. Senator Hagel, please answer the question I asked. Today do you think unilateral sanctions would be a bad idea?

Senator HAGEL. Not today, 12 years later.

Senator CRUZ. So that is not a view you'd agree with today?

Senator HAGEL. Because times have changed. We now have international sanctions on them.

Senator CRUZ. The second slide: In 2007, you voted against legislation designating the Iranian Revolutionary Guard as a terrorist group.

Senator HAGEL. That's correct.

In 2007, Senator Hagel voted against legislation designating the Iranian Revolutionary Guard as a terrorist group.

Senator CRUZ. You no longer agree with that policy. Today your position is the Iranian Revolutionary Guard is a terrorist group; is that correct?

Senator HAGEL. The Revolutionary Guard is part of the Iranian Government. The reason I voted against——

Senator CRUZ. Sir, I'm not asking the reason. I'm asking for your views today. Do you believe the Iranian Revolutionary Guard is a terrorist group, yes or no?

Senator HAGEL. It is part of a state sponsor of terrorism, so it's part of Iran, which I've said is a sponsor of state terrorism.

Senator CRUZ. Is that a yes?

Senator HAGEL. That vote wasn't that question. That vote gave——

Senator CRUZ. I'm asking your views today. Do you believe the Iranian Revolutionary National Guard is a terrorist group?

Senator HAGEL. It is part of a terrorist—it is part of a government that supports terrorism.

Senator CRUZ. Is that a yes or a no?

Senator HAGEL. It's the answer I just gave you.

Senator CRUZ. All right, we'll move on to the next one. In 2008, you also voted against comprehensive Iran sanctions. We've already discussed that today you agree with sanctions, so that is another position——

In 2008, Senator Hagel voted against the Comprehensive Iran Sanctions, Accountability and Divestment Act in the Senate Banking Committee.

Senator HAGEL. That again was a unilateral sanction that the Bush administration was opposed to, and the Secretary of State of this country, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, wrote that.

Senator CRUZ. Sir, my time is limited. I understand that you want to give reasons for the past positions. We've discussed the reasons. I'm simply trying to clarify your positions today.

If you look at number four, in 2010 you stated you're not sure it's necessary to keep all options on the table with regard to Iran's nuclear program. Do you agree with that position today or is that no longer your position?

In 2010, Senator Hagel told the Atlantic Council he was "not so sure it is necessary to continue to say all options are on the table" regarding Iran's nuclear program.

Senator HAGEL. I don't recall that. I have always said that all options remain on the table. I don't recall that speech.

Senator CRUZ. So this is not your position today? I'm just trying to understand.

Senator HAGEL. No, it's not. I have said that all options must remain on the table, including—in fact, in an op-ed I wrote with two former CENTCOM commanders last year——

Senator CRUZ. The final one I'm going to ask you: In a 1998 Senate hearing, you stated that the United States has "tilted too far towards Israel in the Middle East peace process". Do you continue to agree with this position or is that no longer your position today?

In a 1998 Senate hearing, Senator Hagel said that the United States has "tilted too far toward Israel in the Middle East peace process."

Senator HAGEL. I don't remember that, the context of the hearing or the speech or all the things I said in it. No, I don't think the United States has tilted too far to Israel. I support the President's position on Israel. I've said in my book and other speeches that I strongly support Israel.

Senator CRUZ. So you do not agree with this policy? I will point out that I have a list of 10 other statements in the past which I'm pretty confident if I asked you you would say you do not agree with, and they're all statements and quotes from you.

In my judgment, your record as a U.S. Senator—and you and I don't know each other. We do not have a personal relationship. But I think your record and your past statements as a U.S. Senator demonstrate greater antagonism for the Nation of Israel than any member of this body, and also demonstrate a greater willingness to stand against sanctions, stand against military action, stand against any strong position against Iran, Hamas, Hezbollah, terrorists.

That ultimately is why the Washington Post described your foreign policy views as "near the fringe of the Senate". That raises, I think, very serious questions about your suitability to serve as the Secretary of Defense. In my view, having a Secretary of Defense who is not viewed as supporting credible, strong military action makes it more likely the United States will be drawn into military conflict, and I think that would be a very unfortunate outcome.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Cruz.

That ends the second round. If you want an opportunity to comment on that. If not, I will ask you some other questions.

By the way, Senator Ayotte, in reaction to one of the things you said about it doesn't matter what I believe, I think what you were—first of all, I think it does matter. We all would agree it very much matters what you believe. But I think what you were pointing out is that ultimately what matters is what the President believes. I think that's what you were aiming at.

Senator HAGEL. That's exactly what I was aiming at, and that's what I meant to say, that's right. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. I'm now going to ask you the standard questions that I've delayed, and these are just the questions we ask of every nominee.

Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

Senator HAGEL. I'm sorry? I didn't hear.

Chairman LEVIN. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

Senator HAGEL. No.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you ensure that your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. If you are confirmed, will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or their briefings?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree that you will provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Senator HAGEL. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Now, we've completed our second round and that means that if there's other questions remaining, we can take a few minutes for them. Is there anybody that wants to? Yes, Senator King.

Senator KING. One very brief question. In watching television over the last week or so, I've seen an ad questioning your nomination, a television ad. I just wondered if you or any of the people that have worked on preparing you for this has any idea who's sponsoring that ad, because it's not apparent from the ad itself? Have you gotten to the bottom of that?

Senator HAGEL. Senator, first, I have not seen any of those ads. I know they're there. I long ago figured out the better way to live life is not get drug down in the underbrush of these kinds of things. So I don't pay attention to it. My focus is on what's important about this assignment, this job, if I am confirmed, and in particular this committee and this body, and preparing myself hopefully for what matters with the possibility that the U.S. Senate confirms me for this job.

I have not asked anybody that question. I don't know, have never seen the ads.

Senator KING. Thank you very much, and thank you for your testimony today. You've been forthright and strong, and again I appreciate your commitment to this country.

Senator HAGEL. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. Another question?

Senator CRUZ. Very briefly, I wanted to thank you for your commitment to this committee, number one, to provide a complete accounting and copies of the speeches you've given; and number two, to respond to the letter that you received 2 days ago requesting specific financial information. I appreciate your commitment to do that.

I also would ask you—in our discussion about Chas Freeman you said you were not particularly close with him, but that your understanding was his views were within the mainstream, if that's a fair characterization.

Senator HAGEL. No, I didn't say in the mainstream. I said I don't know.

Senator CRUZ. Okay. What I would ask you to do also as a follow-up is to review in particular a speech that Mr. Freeman gave on March 4, 2011, at the Palestine Center in Washington, DC, and give me your judgment in terms of whether you agree with the views on the Middle East and the views of the Nation of Israel that are expressed in that speech. In particular, I would be interested in your views on the fifth paragraph of that speech.

In my view, the views expressed in that speech are not accurate and not within the mainstream, and I would be interested if you concur in that assessment or if you have a different assessment.

Chairman LEVIN. That's a question you're asking for the record?

Senator CRUZ. For the record, yes.

Question: What I would ask you to do also as a follow up is to review in particular a speech that Mr. Freeman gave on March 4, 2011 at the Palestine Center in Washington, D.C. and give me your judgment in terms of whether you agree with the views on the Middle East and the views on the nation of Israel that are expressed in that speech, and in particular, I would be interested in your views on the fifth paragraph of that speech. In my view, the views expressed in that speech are not accurate and not within the mainstream. And I would be interested if you concur in the assessment or have a different assessment?

Chas Freeman, May 4, 2011 – Speech at the Palestine Center in Washington, DC. Paragraph 5: "Similarly, the cruelties of Israelis to their Arab captives and neighbors, especially in the ongoing siege of Gaza and repeated attacks on the people of Lebanon, have cost the Jewish state much of the global sympathy that the Holocaust previously conferred on it. The racist tyranny of Jewish settlers over West Bank Arabs and the progressive emergence of a version of apartheid in Israel itself are deeply troubling to a growing number of people abroad who have traditionally identified with Israel. Many – perhaps most of the most disaffected – are Jews. They are in the process of dissociating themselves from Israel. They know that, to the extent that Judaism comes to be conflated with racist arrogance (as terrorism is now conflated with Islam), Israeli behavior threatens a rebirth of anti-Semitism in the West. Ironically, Israel – conceived as a refuge and guarantee against European anti-Semitism – has become the sole conceivable stimulus to its revival and globalization. Demonstrably, Israel has been bad for the Palestinians. It is turning out also to be bad for the Jews."

Answer: As I told you at the hearing, I have not even spoken with Chas Freeman in several years and do not support his comments. The views expressed in the speech by Mr. Freeman that you reference are his own, and, in my opinion, wrong. As a supporter of Israel, I do not agree with these views and I find them to be both inaccurate and deeply concerning. As I have said consistently throughout my career, Israel has a right to defend itself. Israeli efforts to protect its citizens against the actions of terrorist organizations, including Hamas and Hezbollah, are part of Israel's right to self-defense. Palestinians will not achieve peace or prosperity if Hamas insists on a path of terror and rejection, and Palestinians will never realize their independence through unilateral actions. I continue to believe, as I did when I cosponsored and voted for the Palestininian Anti-Terrorism Act of 2006, that any partner for peace must renounce violence, abide by previous agreements, and recognize Israel's right to exist. Negotiations between the parties are the only viable path to peace and the two-state solution, with two states living side by side in peace and security: the Jewish State of Israel and an independent Palestinian State.

I am pleased that Israeli and U.S. leaders agree that the U.S.-Israel Defense relationship is stronger than ever. I intend to work to continue to strengthen the relationship and I am looking forward, if confirmed, to working closely with my Israeli counterparts.

Amb Chas Freeman:

I am honored to have been asked to give the annual [Hisham B.] Sharabi [Memorial] Lecture here at the Palestine Center. As all of you know, Dr. Hisham Sharabi helped found this Center, as well as the Center for Contemporary Arab Studies at Georgetown University. He was a great figure in the study of Arab politics and society. He was also an indefatigable advocate of Palestinian rights. I never met him, but I feel privileged to speak to you today in his memory. My topic is the tragic consequences of the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians for them, for their region, for their backers and for the world as a whole.

The saga of the Holy Land, ancient and modern, reminds someone with no personal connection to it of nothing so much as the Book of Job in the Hebrew Bible. There seems to be something about Palestine that afflicts the innocent, tests the righteous and causes incomprehensible suffering to past and present inhabitants. Israeli Jews and Palestinians both claim descent from the ancient peoples of the lands they now contest. Their competing narratives are at the heart of the perverse drama there. In this drama, the spiritual descendants of Jews who left Palestine assert a religious duty to dispossess the biological descendants of those who chose to remain.

Over the course of centuries, the Jews of the diaspora were grievously persecuted by Christians. This experience helped to inspire Zionism. It culminated in the horrors of the Nazi Holocaust. Meanwhile, under Byzantium and the Caliphate, all but a few of the Jews of Palestine sought refuge in conversion to Judaism's successor faiths: Christianity and Islam. As an ironic result, the homegrown descendants of Palestine's original Jewish population – the Palestinians –now suffer because newcomers proclaim them to be interlopers in lands they have inhabited from time immemorial. And yet another Jewish-descended diaspora – this time, Christian and Muslim – has been ejected from Palestine to suffer in exile. Not even the most imaginative writer of fiction could have composed an account of traumatic suffering and human tragedy comparable to that which Zionists and Palestinians have undergone and continue to inflict on each other.

The moral harm that these distant cousins continue to do to each other is huge. So is the damage they are doing to their sympathizers and supporters abroad. The resort to terrorist acts by Palestinians, especially suicide bombings in crowded public places, has caused them to forfeit much of the international sympathy their cause would otherwise enjoy. The massacre of civilians in the West by Arabs enraged by western support for Israeli mistreatment of the Palestinians and other affronts has generated intense European and American suspicion of all Arabs. The diffusion of Arab rage to non-Arab regions of the realm of Islam has aroused global antipathy to Islam even as it has inspired acts of terrorism among Muslims.

Similarly, the cruelties of Israelis to their Arab captives and neighbors, especially in the ongoing siege of Gaza and repeated attacks on the people of Lebanon, have cost the Jewish state much of the global sympathy that the Holocaust previously conferred on it. The racist tyranny of Jewish settlers over West Bank Arabs and the progressive emergence of a version of apartheid in Israel itself are deeply troubling to a growing number of people abroad who have traditionally identified with Israel. Many – perhaps most of the most disaffected – are Jews. They are in the process of dissociating themselves from Israel. They know that, to the extent that Judaism comes to be conflated with racist arrogance (as terrorism is now conflated with Islam), Israeli behavior threatens a rebirth of anti-Semitism in the West. Ironically, Israel – conceived as a refuge and guarantee against European anti-Semitism – has become the sole conceivable stimulus to its revival and globalization. Demonstrably, Israel has been bad for the Palestinians. It is turning out also to be bad for the Jews.

The early Zionists were mostly secular in orientation. So was the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). But, as the struggle between Jewish settlers and Palestinians proceeded, it became increasingly infused with religious fervor. On both sides, parties espousing sectarian extremism displaced secular nationalist movements. Religious dogmatism transformed what was at first a secular struggle between competing local nationalisms into a Jewish and Muslim holy war for land in Palestine. In holy wars, compromise is equated with heresy. This tragic mutation of the conflict is now reflected in increasing global animosity between Muslims, Jews and their Christian Zionist supporters. (Christian Zionists perversely support the Jewish state in order to hasten the arrival of Judgment Day, when they expect Israel to be devastated and the world to be purged of its Jews. Such people, however Rube Goldberg-like the theology by which they propose to annihilate the Jews, are strange allies for Zionists to embrace!)

The ongoing conflict between Israelis and Palestinians has killed and wounded many people. It has done even graver damage to the humane principles at the heart of both Judaism and Islam. Among Jews and Muslims in Israel and Palestine the golden rule has been largely forgotten. The principle that one should not do to others what one would not wish done to oneself had been integral to both faiths. In the Holy Land, God's love has been replaced with murderous indifference to the rights of others in a sickeningly bloody bilateral contest to terrorize civilian populations. Ethical voices on both sides exist but they are less and less audible. Amoral and unscrupulous zealots have the podium. Their right to speak in their religious community is seldom challenged. Their utterances blacken the reputations of both religions.

Obfuscatory euphemisms are, unfortunately, the norm in the Holy Land. But rhetorical tricks can no longer conceal the protracted moral zero-sum game that is in progress there. A people without rights confronts a settler movement without scruples. A predatory state with cutting-edge military technology battles kids with stones and resistance fighters with belts of nails and explosives. Israel's Cabinet openly directs the murder of Palestinian political leaders. There have been about 850 such extrajudicial executions over the past decade. Israel is vigorously engaged in the collective punishment and systematic ethnic cleansing of its captive Arab populations. It rails against terrorism while carrying out policies explicitly described as intended to terrorize the peoples of the territories it is attacking or into which it is illegally expanding. Meanwhile, the elected authorities in Palestine – indeed, most Palestinians – associate themselves suicide bombers and unguided missiles that indiscriminately murder Israeli civilians. Each side has suspended moral constraints in order to cause the other to suffer in the hope that it will capitulate to such coercion. To a distressing extent, moreover, each side has also been able to enlist unreasoning support for its cause and the indiscriminate condemnation of the other by powerful supporters abroad.

As always in such mayhem, truth and the law have been the first to go missing. Israel regularly attributes to others the very things it itself is doing. It has become notorious for its refusal to accept objective scrutiny or criticism. It routinely rebuffs international investigators' examination of allegations against it, even when mandated by the U.N. [United Nations] Security Council. Instead, it stages self-indulgent acts of self-investigation calculated to produce exculpatory propaganda. As a result, Israeli government spokesmen – who once were presumed to represent the intellectual integrity for which Jewish scholars have always been renowned – now have no credibility at all except among those committed to the Zionist cause. Meanwhile, regional and international respect for the rule of law, especially humanitarian law, has been greatly degraded. This is a special irony.

Humanitarian law and the law of war are arguably the supreme moral artifacts of Atlantic civilization. Jewish lawyers made a disproportionate contribution to the crafting of both. The resulting legal principles were intended to deter the kinds of injuries and injustices that European Jews and other minorities had long suffered and to protect occupied populations from persecution by their occupiers. Both objectives are very relevant to contemporary Palestine. It is, however, hard to find any principle of due process, the several Geneva Conventions, or the Nuremberg trials that has not been systematically violated in the Holy Land. Examples of criminal conduct include mass murder, extra-judicial killing, torture, detention without charge, the denial of medical care, the annexation and colonization of occupied territory, the illegal expropriation of land, ethnic cleansing and the collective punishment of civilians, including the demolition of their homes, the systematic reduction of their infrastructure and the de-development and impoverishment of entire regions. These crimes have been linked to a concerted effort to rewrite international law to permit actions that it traditionally prohibited, in effect enshrining the principle that might makes right.

As the former head of the Israeli Defense Forces' (IDF) Legal Department has argued:

> "If you do something for long enough the world will accept it. The whole of international law is now based on the notion that an act that is forbidden today becomes permissible if executed by enough countries . . . . International law progresses through violations."

A colleague of his has extended this notion by pointing out that:

> "The more often Western states apply principles that originated in Israel to their own non-traditional conflicts in places like Afghanistan and Iraq, then the greater the chance these principles have of becoming a valuable part of international law."

These references to Iraq and Afghanistan underscore the extent to which the United States, once the principal champion of a rule-bound international order, has followed Israel in replacing legal principles with expediency as the central regulator of its interaction with foreign peoples. The expediently amoral doctrine of preemptive war is such an Israeli transplant in the American neo-conservative psyche. Neither it nor other deliberate assaults on the rule of law have been met with concerted resistance from Palestinians, Arabs, or anyone else, including the American Bar Association. The steady displacement of traditional American values – indeed, the core doctrines of western civilization – with ideas designed to free the state of inconvenient moral constraints has debased the honor and prestige of our country as well as Israel.

American determination to protect Israel from the political and legal consequences of any and all of its actions has also taken its toll, not just on the willingness of others to credit and follow the United States, but also on the authority of international organizations and the integrity of international law. The United Nations Security Council was conceived as the ultimate arbiter and enforcer of an international order in which law could protect the weak and vulnerable from the depredations of the strong. The world has occasionally allowed its sympathy for Palestinians, as underdogs, to override its legal judgment, but the U.S. has routinely exercised its veto to prevent the application of well-established principles of international law to Israel. The Security Council has been transformed from the champion of the global rule of law into the enemy of legality as the standard of global governance. Repeated American vetoes on behalf of Israel have reduced the United Nations and other international fora to impotence on fundamental questions of justice and human dignity. Confidence in these institutions has largely disappeared. Thus, the Israel-Palestine dispute has shaped a world in which both the rule of law and the means by which it might be realized have been deliberately degraded. We are all the worse off for this.

Israel's strength and prosperity depend on American government and private subsidies as well as Washington's political and legal protection. For Israelis, the moral hazard created by such irresponsible indulgence and unsparing American support has been a tragedy. It has enabled Israel to follow its most self-destructive inclinations by relieving it from the requirement to weigh their consequences. It has bred hubris that encourages the Jewish state to pursue short-term advantage without consideration of the resulting risks to its long-term viability. For the Palestinians, America's slavish support of Israel has meant an unending nightmare, trapping them in a limbo in which the protections of both law and human decency are at best capriciously applied. For the United States, deference to Israel's counterproductive policies and actions has become a debilitating drain on American power to shape events by measures short of war. The United States is now so closely identified with the Jewish state that Americans cannot escape perceived complicity with any and all of its actions, whether we agree or disagree with them. In the eyes of the world, Israel's behavior is a reproach to the American reputation as well as its own.

Perceived American double standards and hypocrisy on matters related to the Israel-Palestine conflict account for much of the recent decline in international admiration and deference to U.S. leadership in the Middle East and elsewhere. In 2006, when free and fair elections in Palestine produced a government that Israel detested and feared, the United States joined Israel in seeking to isolate and overthrow that government, thus setting aside and discrediting America's long-professed dedication to the spread of democracy in the Middle East and elsewhere. In 2006 and 2008, the United States encouraged Israeli military actions against Lebanese and Palestinian civilians that were both more brutal and sustained than those that Col. [Muammar] Gaddafi has recently carried out against his fellow Libyans. Far from calling for no-fly zones over Lebanon and Gaza, however, the U.S. government continued to supply Israel with gifts of ammunition, including cluster bombs and white phosphorus, as the IDF [Israel Defense Forces] expended its stocks of them on Lebanese and Palestinian civilian population centers, facilities and infrastructure.

U.S. sponsorship of the late, lamented "peace process" began as a demonstration of American diplomatic power, the indispensable role of the United States in Middle Eastern affairs, and the necessity of all interested in peace to defer to America. The "peace process" has ended by discrediting American power and diplomacy. It has failed to deliver either the self-determination for Palestinians or the acceptance of Israel by its neighbors envisaged in the Camp David Accords. Instead, Israel's deepening commitment to "settler Zionism" has uprooted ever greater numbers of Palestinians while alarming and affronting other Arabs and Muslims. Four decades of American diplomacy is now seen in the region as having been an elaborate diplomatic deception, yielding nothing but the continual enlargement of the Jewish state at Palestinian expense.

This failure of the American-led "peace process" is all the more telling because it occurred despite the existence of a compelling, existential interest in the achievement of a formula for cohabitation on the part of both Israelis and Palestinians. This interest is clearly reflected in the eagerness of Palestinian officials to negotiate a basis for peaceful coexistence with Israel that is revealed in the official record of the Israel-Palestine negotiations recently leaked to and by Al-Jazeera. The abject pleading of Palestine's negotiators for peace, to which these documents attest, contrasts with the callous determination of their Israeli counterparts not to take yes for an answer. Yet the security and prosperity of Israelis and Palestinians alike is dependent on each accepting the other. Without Palestinian agreement, Israel cannot define its borders or enjoy acceptance by any of its neighbors. Without Israel's agreement, Palestinians cannot achieve self-determination within a defined territory. Without mutual respect and tolerance, neither Israel nor Palestine can hope to live in peace for long. Animosity breeds threats, and no military hegemony is forever.

The inability of the United States to build on the obvious shared interests of Palestinians and Israelis is, at best, damning testimony to the incompetence of those Americans who have made a career of processing peace without ever delivering it. At worst, it is compelling evidence of the extent to which they have functioned as "Israel's lawyers," rather than as mediators sincerely attempting to produce a mutually respectful and therefore durable modus vivendi between Israelis, Palestinians and other Arabs. As such, it is a reflection of the inordinate influence of right-wing Israelis on American policies and the people chosen to implement them. I have had personal experience of this on more than one occasion.

In late November 1988, shortly after the election of George H. W. Bush as [United States] president, I was invited to lunch by a senior Israeli official with whom, in pursuance of U.S. policy, I had worked closely to expand Israel's diplomatic and military presence in Africa. I had come to like and respect this official. He wished to thank me, he said, for what I had done for his country. I was pleased. Over lunch, however, he asked me what I planned to do in the new administration, adding, "Tell me what job you want. We can get it for you." The casual arrogance with which this representative of a foreign power claimed to be able to manipulate the staffing of national security positions in the U.S. government was a stunning belittlement of American patriotism. Twenty years later, I was to be reminded that agents of foreign influence who can make appointments to national security positions in the United States can also unmake them.

Under the circumstances, the consistent pro-Israel bias of American officials charged with the management of the Israel-Palestine conundrum and their lack of empathy for the Palestinians are in no way a surprise. A passionate attachment to one side is inconsistent with mediation of its disputes with another. The absence of empathy is fatal to the craft of diplomacy. Such disabilities account, at least in part, for the failure of the decades-long labors of American officials to produce anything but political cover for the ongoing displacement of Palestinians from their homes. The ultimate achievement of American peace processors has been to bring great discredit upon themselves and the United States. American diplomacy on the Israel-Palestine issue is becoming less and less relevant to events in the region and increasingly unacceptable to the world as a whole.

A new milestone in this journey to diplomatic ignominy was reached on February 18 this year, when the United States vetoed a resolution in the U.N. Security Council that had been cobbled together from earlier official American statements. The resolution condemned the expansion of Israeli settlements and called for it to end. In doing so, it echoed numerous previous Security Council resolutions as well as the "Road Map." All fourteen other members of the Council, including America's closest allies, spoke vigorously in favor of the resolution, which had been sponsored by 130 member states. The debate and the vote on that resolution were an unambiguous vote of no confidence in American as well as Israeli policy.

This repudiation of U.S. leadership and Israeli expansionism seems certain to be reiterated even more unmistakably when the [U.N.] General Assembly convenes in September. The international community will then take up the question of whether to underscore its near-unanimous rejection of Israel's claim to any territory beyond its pre-1967 borders by recognizing an independent Palestinian state there and admitting that state to the United Nations. The United States no longer has the political credibility necessary to control the diplomatic context in which Israel operates.

The displacement of the United States from its previously unchallenged primacy in Middle Eastern diplomacy comes amidst other momentous changes in the strategic landscape in the region. The U.S. government's failure to stand by its longtime protégé, [former Egyptian President] Hosni Mubarak, convinced leaders elsewhere who, like Mubarak, had linked their fate to America that Washington is a faithless friend and impotent protector. The decades-long inclination of conservative Arab rulers to curry favor with Washington by acquiescing in American policies has been gravely impaired, perhaps irreparably. But the deep disenchantment with America of the dissidents who overthrew Mubarak was not overcome by the Obama administration's belated abandonment of him. A majority of Egyptians want to annul the Camp David Accords. Whether Egypt does so or not, a much larger majority of Egyptians want their country generally to decouple its foreign policy from that of the United States. As goes Egypt, so very likely goes Jordan. Arab deference to American – and hence to Israeli – interests and dictates will manifestly be much less in future than in the past.

There is a great deal of apprehension in Israel over these developments and not a little consternation in Washington's think tanks and belief tanks about them. The storm warnings are up, and for good reason. Had Israel and the United States planned it, we could hardly have contrived a status quo less likely to be accepted as legitimate by a democratized Middle East. If contemporary Israel represents the future, it is certainly problematic. But as is so often the case with clouded situations, there may be a bright side to the changes in progress.

Given the protracted failure of U.S. diplomacy in the Israel-Palestine arena, Palestinians and others may be forgiven for believing that it is time to entrust peacemaking to other parties who are more objective, less politically constrained and less emotionally biased. Others in Europe and elsewhere have taken alarmed note of the adverse effects of the unending conflict on Israel, on the Palestinians, on Arab politics, on regional stability, on inter-religious relations, on the moral standing of global Jewry and Islam, on Arab and Islamic relations with the West, on international law and organizations and on world order. Media outside the United States have taken progressively more balanced and nuanced note of the human suffering in the Holy Land. Europeans and others now evidence a considerably greater sense of urgency about these problems than Americans have done. The notion that only Americans have the capacity to manage conflict resolution in the Middle East will no longer withstand scrutiny. One recalls the role of Norway in crafting the Oslo Accords. Perhaps, now that the United States has struck out, it's someone else's turn at bat.

A new game is clearly beginning. A self-confident, religiously tolerant but secular Turkey has emerged as a major influence on regional affairs and as an inspiration to its democrats. Arab diplomacy is being invigorated by the aftereffects of the revolutions in Egypt and elsewhere. There is mounting pressure on all Arab governments to accord greater deference to popular opinion in both domestic and foreign policy. The Middle East will no longer allow itself to be the diplomatic playground of great powers outside it. There will, however, be new opportunities for interested outside parties to forge diplomatic partnerships with those in the region. Most are looking for new beginnings, new relationships and new ideas. All see an urgent need to end the racist oppression and humiliation of Arabs in the Holy Land. These injustices are at the root of regional instability. They empower extremist and terrorist movements in the Middle East and beyond. They threaten the future of the Jewish state.

Diplomatic partnerships between outside powers and Arab governments for the purpose of crafting a durable peace in Palestine – as opposed to stabilizing the iniquitous status quo – have long been conspicuous by their absence. In 2002, the Arab League announced a revolutionary peace proposal in Beirut. Israel and the United States shelved it with minimal acknowledgment. Its potential remains unexplored. It has a limited shelf life but there may still be an opportunity to make use of it.

The Arabs are thinking anew. It is time for Israel to engage in new thinking of its own. Israel has shown great skill at deflecting the peace proposals of others and subjecting them to campaigns of diplomatic attrition. It has never made its own specific proposal of peace to the Palestinians. It has demanded respect for the dignified autonomy of its Jewish identity but has offered no reciprocal recognition of Palestinian identity. Perhaps it is time for Israel to do these things. Its changed strategic environment, the diminished capacity of the United States to protect it from the political and legal consequences of its conduct and changing attitudes toward it in the Jewish diaspora foretell an end to the moral hazard from which the Jewish state has suffered. For the first time in decades, Israel will have to take into account the risks to its future as it contemplates actions in the present. In the interest of its own survival and prosperity, it may begin to make wiser and more farsighted decisions. We must hope so.

There can, of course, be no peace between Israelis and Palestinians unless there are governments that can commit both sides to terms. Part of the Israeli strategy of deferring peace so as to seize more land for settler Zionists has been a multifaceted effort to ensure that no one has the authority to speak for all Palestinians. The United States has effectively colluded in this strategy of divide and rule, especially since the 2006 elections brought Hamas to power. If Israel is to have peace, however, rather than perpetual rejection by both Palestinians and other Arab and Muslim neighbors, it needs a unified Palestinian leadership with which to strike a deal. Thanks to the skill of Egyptian diplomacy, such a Palestinian government of national unity is now a real prospect. In the interest of peace, the region and the world should welcome and encourage Palestinian unity rather than succumb to Pavlovian impulses to condemn it.

However distasteful they may find it to do so after all that they have suffered at Israeli hands, Palestinians, including Gazans, must collaborate with Israel to achieve peace. But it is equally true that there can and will be no peace for Israel until there is peace for the Palestinians, including those in diaspora. The United States has proven incapable of creating strategic circumstances conducive to serious, as opposed to make-believe negotiations between the warring parties in the Holy Land. Perhaps, however, such circumstances are nonetheless finally emerging, allowing Palestinians and Israelis to attempt a fresh start at achieving peaceful coexistence. They must look to themselves, to others in the region, and to new, non-American mediators to accomplish this.

That Palestinians and Israelis find a mutually agreeable basis for peaceful coexistence is essential not only to their own well-being but to that of the wider world. Only they can make the decisions necessary to achieve this. But, in our own interest, the rest of us must help them as best we can. The adverse consequences of the Israel-Palestine conflict have penetrated and extended far beyond the two parties to the holy war now raging in Palestine. The benefits of peace there would be equally deep and wide.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. Any other questions for the record need to be submitted, as I said before, by tomorrow at 5 p.m.

I assume, Senator Cruz, that when you said that he's agreed to provide all of the speeches, it would be all the speeches that he has access to; is that fair?

Senator CRUZ. That he has or that he can get copies of. I would certainly hope and expect that he would engage in reasonable efforts to get copies of speeches if he doesn't have them in his immediate files.

Chairman LEVIN. We'll say that if you have easy access or reasonable access to speeches you've given, even though you don't have them, that we would expect that you could provide this as well, as well as the other information you indicated you're perfectly happy to submit, you just haven't had the time to get it ready.

Senator HAGEL. Mr. Chairman, I will commit to that and every request, as we have. As I said, some of this I didn't see until yesterday. But everything that is out there that we can find, we'll make every effort to get it and provide it.

Chairman LEVIN. We very much appreciate that, and your openness in your responses today.

Again, the record will be open until tomorrow, as I said, at 5 p.m. But your answers we would hope and expect would be in by Monday at 5 p.m., because we would very much like to move this nomination forward to a resolution, first on this committee, and that timetable would help us move in an expeditious way.

We thank you. We thank your family and your friends.

Unless there are other questions, we will now stand adjourned. Thank you.

[Whereupon, at 5:50 p.m., the committee adjourned.]

[Prepared questions submitted to the Hon. Chuck Hagel by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. I believe that the success of our Armed Forces since the enactment of the Goldwater-Nichols Act amply demonstrates that the act has enhanced the ability of our Armed Forces to defend our Nation and to operate successfully as joint forces under our combatant commanders. If confirmed, I will evaluate the implementation of the act, and will make recommendations for modifications if necessary. At present, I am aware of no need to make changes to the act.

DUTIES OF THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Question. Section 113 of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the Secretary of Defense is the principal assistant to the President in all matters relating to the Department of Defense (DOD). Subject to the direction of the President, the Secretary of Defense, under section 113, has authority, direction, and control over DOD.

Do you believe there are actions you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of the Secretary of Defense?

Answer. I believe title 10 provides the Secretary of Defense appropriate, sufficient, and clear authority to lead DOD and to serve as the principal assistant to the President on all matters relating to the Department. I do not foresee needing to take any actions to enhance the ability of the Secretary of Defense to execute assigned duties.

Question. What changes to section 113, if any, would you recommend?

Answer. At present, I believe that section 113 provides sufficient legal authority to the Secretary of Defense to allow him to perform his two primary functions. I do not foresee needing to recommend changes to section 113.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. I volunteered for the draft and then volunteered to go to Vietnam after I received orders to go to Germany. I served a 12-month tour which included the Tet Offensive in 1968. I rose to the rank of infantry sergeant. For 10 of those months, I served alongside my younger brother Tom. I understand what it is like to be a soldier in war. I also understand what happens when there is poor morale and discipline among the troops and a lack of clear objectives, intelligence, and command and control from Washington. I believe that experience will help me as Secretary of Defense to ensure we maintain the best fighting force in the world, protect our men and women in uniform, and ensure that we are cautious and certain when contemplating the use of force.

When I returned from Vietnam, I graduated from the University of Nebraska, using the G.I. Bill. Because of that benefit, I co-authored with fellow Vietnam veteran Senator Jim Webb, the new G.I. Bill which became law in 2008. I know the importance of providing our military personnel and their families with the benefits they need, not only while in the military, but once they return to civilian life, and I will not forget that if I am confirmed as Secretary of Defense.

I was wounded twice during my tour in Vietnam. In 1981, I was appointed by President Reagan and confirmed by the Senate to be Deputy Administrator of the Veterans Administration. I later resigned because of inadequate support for Vietnam veterans suffering from Agent Orange and other Vietnam veterans programs that were being eliminated. I have worked with, and on behalf of veterans' organizations my entire life. I know when the system is working, and when it is failing. The past decade of war has produced tens of thousands of wounded warriors. Many are still on Active Duty. Others have or are transitioning to civilian life. All need the best care we they can give them. Because of my own experiences, I will honor that commitment to veterans and their families if I become Secretary of Defense.

While I do not believe anyone can be fully prepared to manage an organization as large and complex as DOD, I believe that I have significant management experience that gives me a strong sense of what needs to be done. Most important is building and working with teams. This is always an essential foundational element of management and leadership. In the 1970s, I was the Chief of Staff to a U.S. Congressman and then later Manager of Government Affairs for Firestone Tire and Rubber Company. In the early 1980s, I co-founded Vanguard Cellular Systems, Inc., a publicly traded company, which became one of the largest independent cellular systems in the country. I also served as President and Chief Executive Officer of the World USO; the Chief Operating Officer of the 1990 Economic Summit of Industrialized Nations (G–7 Summit) in Houston, TX; Deputy Commissioner General of the United States for the 1982 World's Fair; President of the Private Sector Council and president of an investment bank. I have also served on boards of some of the world's largest companies.

Finally as a U.S. Senator from Nebraska for 12 years, I have a legislative record of continuing and unwavering support for our military and our national security. I have voted to authorize the use of military force and I have questioned the military and foreign policy decisions of our leaders. I believe this experience has prepared me to make the tough decisionsand to know that I am accountable for those decisions.

PRIORITIES

Question. If confirmed, you will confront a range of critical issues relating to threats to national security and ensuring that the Armed Forces are prepared to deal with these threats.

In your view, what are the major challenges confronting the next Secretary of Defense?

Answer. The next Secretary of Defense will be confronted with a myriad of challenges stemming from an ever more complex global environment. Some of the challenges we know today, but many will continue to unfold as we conclude over 10 years at war and look to the future of our military posture. In an ever changing world with both state and non-state actors developing nontraditional tools of war, the United States will be challenged by technological advancements that bring the battlefield to both space and cyberspace. Terrorist organizations continue to proliferate throughout the world and have a significant presence in places such as Yemen, Somalia and North Africa, areas that pose great risk for regional stability. With the ever present threat of Iran, the next Secretary of Defense must be vigilant in pursuing the goal of preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, and must maintain our unshakeable commitment to Israel's security. As the United States begins to rebalance to the Asia-Pacific region, the Department will be faced by new challenges in this vital part of the world. Piracy, maritime security, disaster relief efforts, and, of course, continued vigilance to terrorism and proliferation of nuclear weapons name just a few known challenges. All of these things come while the United States is fighting its own battles at home to take care of its service men and women returning from over ten decades of war with rising medical costs and advanced medical conditions. Keeping the faith with our military men and women must remain a high priority to ensure the military itself stays as strong and faithful as its parts. While these are some of the few challenges we know, there are far too many that are not yet apparent. We must be prepared for any contingency we may face in the coming years all while doing so in the confines of this austere budget environment.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to work with the President, Congress, and with senior civilian and military leaders of DOD to come up with comprehensive plans to address each issue. No single issue will have a single simple answer. This will be an iterative process that will employ the full force of Government. It will necessitate strong relationships I plan to maintain and strengthen with our allies and partners throughout the globe. We will define our post-2014 presence in Afghanistan and create a new relationship and partnership with Afghanistan. To counter terrorism, we will look into how we use our special operations forces and the development of new technologies and surveillance techniques. As long as nuclear weapons exist, we must maintain a safe, secure, and effective nuclear arsenal to deter any adversary. I am committed to considering all options to counter Iran and its aggression, and to maintain U.S. support for missile defense systems in Israel. With the rebalance to the Asia Pacific, our training and specializations will change as the battlefield and necessary skills of our servicemembers change. As our troops transition out of over 10 years of war, I will look at the services available for our men and women, both those that continue to serve and those that transition to civilian life. If confirmed, I plan to continue the work of Secretary Panetta to address issues of the force, such as the unthinkable problem of sexual assault within our ranks. I will continue the implementation of the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" and the opening of positions to women. I will give great attention to all issues that confront our country and our military to ensure the reputation and strength of the United States.

Question. If confirmed, what broad priorities would you establish in terms of issues which must be addressed by the Secretary of Defense?

Answer. If confirmed, it would be a priority to ensure the stable transition out of Afghanistan in the next few years, to maintain U.S. military and technological superiority against enemies both known and unknown, and to keep the faith with our men and women in the military standing guard to protect this great and vibrant country.

CHAIN OF COMMAND

Question. Section 162(b) of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense and from the Secretary of Defense to the combatant commands. Section 163(a) of title 10 further provides that the President may direct communications to combatant commanders be transmitted through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and may assign duties to the Chairman to assist the President and the Secretary of Defense in performing their command function.

Do you believe that these provisions facilitate a clear and effective chain of command?

Answer. I believe that having a clear and effective chain of command is essential to successful military operations, and that these provisions of law lay the foundation for such a chain of command.

Question. In your view, do these provisions enhance or degrade civilian control of the military?

Answer. In my view, these provisions significantly enhance civilian control by codifying the placement of the President, as Commander in Chief, and his principal assistant for military matters, the Secretary of Defense, where they can best exercise civilian control of the military: in the top two positions of the military chain of command.

Question. Are there circumstances in which you believe it is appropriate for U.S. military forces to be under the operational command or control of an authority outside the chain of command established under title 10, U.S.C.?

Answer. I believe that all military forces normally should operate under the chain of command established under section 162 of title 10, U.S.C. However, in certain sensitive operations a temporary exception to that chain of command may be appropriate. I understand that only the President may approve such an exception and the President retains overall command responsibility, as also recognized in section 162. Any military personnel supporting such sensitive operations remain accountable to the military chain of command, including the Uniform Code of Military Justice. If confirmed, I will provide the President with my best advice regarding any operation where an exception to the established chain of command may be appropriate.

ADVICE OF THE SERVICE CHIEFS AND THE COMBATANT COMMANDERS

Question. Section 151 of title 10, U.S.C., provides, in part, that the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is the principal military adviser to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense and that if any member of the Joint Chiefs submits to the Chairman advice or an opinion, in disagreement with, or advice or an opinion in addition to, the advice presented by the Chairman, the Chairman shall present that advice or opinion at the same time he provides his own advice to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense. Section 163 of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff serves as the spokesman for the combatant commanders, especially on the operational requirements of their commands.

What changes in law, if any, do you think may be necessary to ensure that the views of the individual Service Chiefs and of the combatant commanders are presented and considered?

Answer. If confirmed, I will welcome and carefully consider the advice of the individual members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the combatant commanders. I believe that the current law provides ample authority for such a close, advisory process. If I find in the future that changes may enhance this process, I will work with the Department and Congress to implement those changes.

Question. What is your view on the appropriate role of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Answer. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau brings an important perspective to the Joint Chiefs and to the Department on matters affecting the National Guard. In my view, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau should fulfill his duty as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in a manner consistent with the laws governing the role of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau and the role of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

USE OF MILITARY FORCE

Question. The question as to whether and when U.S. forces should participate in potentially dangerous situations is one of the most important and difficult decisions that the national command authorities have to make. Prior Secretaries of Defense and Chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have proposed criteria to guide decision-making for such situations.

What factors would you consider in making recommendations to the President on the use of force?

Answer. Committing our troops to any military operation is a grave decision, and one I, if confirmed, would make carefully and cautiously. In making a recommendation to the President on the use of military force, I would consider all the factors previous Secretaries of Defense have identified. These would include: national interest and strategic objectives; domestic and international legal basis for action; our ability to achieve our objectives and achieve a successful outcome through use of force; the unique need for military force and alternative means, particularly non-military, for achieving our interests; the risks to our other interests and our force; and the sufficiency of sustained public support for use of force.

Question. What circumstances should pertain for you to recommend that the President employ preemptive force?

Answer. The United States must reserve the right, consistent with longstanding principles of self-defense, to use military force if intelligence or other information clearly demonstrates that force is necessary to prevent or blunt an imminent attack on the United States or an ally. If confirmed, in advising the President regarding the use of force to preempt an attack, I would consider such factors as: the nature and immediacy of the threat; the probability of an attack; whether a pattern of activity demonstrates the intent of an actor to carry out an attack; the likely scale of the attack and the injury, loss, or damage likely to result absent preemptive action; and the likelihood that there will be other opportunities to undertake effective action in self-defense. I would also ensure that, if force is determined to be necessary, we adhere to standards that govern the use of force and work to strengthen our legitimacy in taking action, including seeking broader international support.

Question. What degree of certainty do you believe is necessary before the United States would use preemptive force?

Answer. Any decision to use preemptive force must be informed by the best available intelligence regarding the threat that is to be countered. There should always be a sound factual basis for concluding that force is necessary to protect the United States or an ally from attack. If confirmed, I would examine the underlying intelligence critically as such a decision must not be taken lightly. I do not believe, however, that it is necessary that we know the precise timing, location, or nature of the hostile attack as a prerequisite to using force to counter or stop an attack on the United States or an ally.

NATIONAL SECURITY BUDGET REDUCTIONS

Question. Part 1 of the Budget Control Act (BCA) enacted on August 2, 2011 established budget caps designed to realize $917 billion in budget savings in Federal discretionary spending over the period from fiscal year 2012 to fiscal year 2021. As a result, the administration's DOD current budget plan for fiscal years 2012 to 2021 is $487 billion lower than the $6.14 trillion it had projected a year earlier for the same 10-year period. This reduction amounts to nearly 8 percent compared to the previous plan.

Do you believe that defense spending reductions of this magnitude (absent a sequester) can be accomplished without significant adverse impact on our national security?

Answer. Based on my review to date, my answer is yes. I believe the Department's strategy can be accomplished within the constraints of the BCA. But only if the Department has to retain the flexibility to adjust the size of its forces and infrastructure, and take steps to control its costs, in accordance with the administration's present strategy and budget.

Question. How would you assess the national military strategy to deal with the changed budget environment?

Answer. I believe the Department has taken a hard look at the new security environment and developed a strategy that appropriately allocates reduced defense resources to the highest priority needs and ensures our national security objectives are met. If confirmed, I will further assess the strategy according to changes in the security environment and continued fiscal pressure.

Question. What are the standards by which you will measure the adequacy of DOD funding, if confirmed?

Answer. If confirmed, I would measure the adequacy of DOD funding by its ability to ensure that the Department is able to meet the country's security challenges and preserve the strongest military in the world.

Question. If confirmed, in this era of budget austerity, how will you prioritize the objectives of completing the mission in Afghanistan, resetting of the force, investing in the future force, and meeting ongoing operational commitments around the world?

Answer. Right now, I believe the Department can implement the administration's present strategy, which carefully balances the above objectives. I understand that the immediate needs of completing the mission in Afghanistan and ongoing operational commitments cannot jeopardize resetting the force and investing in our future. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that budget decisions are made carefully so that we maintain a healthy balance among those near-term and longer-term objectives. I will continue to refine the Department's spending in line with the priorities of the President's strategic objectives. However, if multi-year reductions in funding take place (such as those required by sequestration), the Department would need to significantly revise the defense strategy and, in all probability, would need to make some hard choices about which of our current national defense capabilities we could afford to retain.

READINESS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Question. The Joint Chiefs recently stated that "the readiness of our Armed Forces is at a tipping point. We are on the brink of creating a hollow force due to an unprecedented convergence of budget conditions and legislation that could require the Department to retain more forces than requested while underfunding that force's readiness."

How do you currently assess the readiness of the Armed Forces?

Answer. I am deeply impressed by the caliber and capabilities of our military forces. It is vitally important that they be ready to respond to the Nation's needs, and I am concerned that further budget cuts will negatively affect readiness. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the readiness of the force.

Question. Do you agree with the Joint Chiefs that readiness is at tipping point?

Answer. Maintaining ready forces is a priority, and I am concerned by the Joint Chiefs' assessment. If confirmed, I will work with the Joint Chiefs to better understand the basis of their assessment and how we can most effectively address the readiness challenges our military faces.

Question. If confirmed, how would you assess the impact of budget conditions on the issue expressed by the Joint Chiefs of a hollow force?

Answer. My sense is that the concerns the Joint Chiefs have expressed about readiness come from a variety of factors, including the challenges of recovering from 10 years of operational stress, of transitioning to a broader range of operations, and of doing all of this in the face of fiscal austerity and budget uncertainty. If confirmed, I will carefully monitor how all of these factors are posing risks to readiness and will work closely with the military and civilian leadership of the Department to mitigate those risks to the greatest extent possible.

Question. How would you define a hollow force?

Answer. A hollow force is one that has been rendered incapable of performing the mission that we expect it to conduct. With a hollow force, units do not have the resources, personnel, equipment, and training necessary to make them capable or ready to execute the defense strategies that secure our country.

BUDGET UNCERTAINLY AND SEQUESTRATION

Question. DOD is currently facing budget uncertainty due to the fact that it is operating under a Continuing Resolution (CR) through at least March 27, 2013 and due to the possibility that, absent a budget deal, the BCA will require a sequester of security funding totaling more than $40 billion starting on March 1, 2013. DOD officials have noted that, if CR is extended through the end of the current fiscal year, in its current form, readiness would suffer. They have also noted that a sequester could seriously threaten our ability to implement our current defense strategy. Secretary Panetta has stated that a sequester would have a "devastating" impact on DOD.

What is your understanding of the impact a full-year Continuing Resolution would have on DOD?

Answer. A year-long CR reduces the Department's funding flexibility by putting it into a straightjacket, spending money on last year's priorities not this year's. Continuing Resolutions force the Department to operate inefficiently because it does not know what projects will be funded or at what level of funding. The money provided in the Continuing Resolution does not provide sufficient funding in the right places, particularly critical operating accounts which could harm military readiness. In addition, Continuing Resolutions generally push the Department to use month-to-month contracts and prohibits doing "new starts" in military construction or acquisition programs, which leads to inefficiency and backlogs in contracting.

Question. What do you believe would be the impact on DOD of a full sequester in fiscal year 2013?

Answer. As Secretary Panetta has repeatedly stated, sequestration—both the size and the arbitrary manner of these cuts—would be devastating to the Department. It would harm military readiness and disrupt each and every investment program. Based on my assessment to date, I share his concerns. I urge Congress to eliminate the sequester threat permanently and pass a balanced deficit-reduction plan. Impacts of sequester could include the need to revise the defense strategy, fewer day-to-day global activities reducing our presence and partnerships, less training including cuts to flying and steaming hours which would reduce readiness, near universal disruption of investment including 2,500 procurement programs, research projects, and military construction; reduced and delayed weapons system buys with resulting price increases, furloughs and hiring freezes for civilian workers resulting in reduced maintenance of weapons systems, oversight of contracts and financial systems; negative effects on morale and welfare of the force including recruiting and retention problems.

Question. What is your understanding of the impact that the combination of a full-year Continuing Resolution and a sequester would have on the readiness of the Armed Forces?

Answer. It is my understanding that under this scenario, the Department would be forced to cut over $40 billion from our budget in a little over half a year, using a mechanistic formula to do it. It would result in 20 percent cuts in the Department's operating budgets. As the Joint Chiefs have warned, such cuts, if allowed to occur, would damage our readiness, our people, and our military families. It would result in the grounding of aircraft and returning ships to port, reducing the Department's global presence and ability to rapidly respond to contingencies. Vital training would be reduced by half of current plans and the Department would be unable to reset equipment from Afghanistan in a timely manner. The Department would reduce training and maintenance for nondeploying units and would be forced to reduce procurement of vital weapons systems and suffer the subsequent schedule delays and price increases. Civilian employees would be furloughed for up to 22 days. All of these effects also negatively impact long-term readiness. It would send a terrible signal to our military and civilian workforce, to those we hope to recruit, and to both our allies and adversaries around the world.

Question. If confirmed what role would you play toward enacting a fiscal year 2013 Defense Appropriations Bill and avoiding a sequester?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue to urge Congress to pass a full-year appropriations bill for DOD and for other Federal agencies so that the Department and other Federal agencies may be run efficiently, with the ability to adapt to changing circumstances, as the taxpayers expect and deserve.

FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT AND BUSINESS TRANSFORMATION

Question. DOD spends billions of dollars every year to acquire, operate, and upgrade business systems needed to support the warfighter, including systems related to the management of contracts, finances, the supply chain, and support infrastructure. Despite these expenditures, the Department's business systems are stovepiped, duplicative and non-integrated. Also, the Department's ability to leverage these systems to transform how it conducts its business missions has been frustrated by its resistance to re-engineering its business processes effectively. As a result, the Department remains unable to produce timely, accurate and complete information to support management decisions. For this reason, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) has identified defense financial management and business transformation as exposing taxpayer dollars to a "high risk" of waste, fraud, and abuse.

If confirmed, how would you ensure that the financial management and business transformation problems of DOD receive priority attention at the senior management level and throughout the defense enterprise?

Answer. Improving financial management capability is very important, especially in light of the fiscal challenges facing the Department and the country. I understand plans exist to continue the improvement of the Department's business processes and, if confirmed, I will ensure that senior leadership—including the Chief Financial Officer, the Deputy Chief Management Officer, and the Chief Information Officer—focus appropriate attention on this effort by holding them accountable for progress against these plans.

Question. Do you support the objective of having the Department achieve an auditable financial statement by the end of fiscal year 2017?

Answer. Yes. I support the effort and will maintain the Department's commitment to producing audit-ready financial statements by the congressional deadline of September 2017, with an audit beginning by the end of calendar year 2017.

Question. What steps would you take if the Department fails to reach this goal?

Answer. I would want to evaluate the nature of the problem, the reasons the goal was not met, and the remediation options available to get the Department back on track before determining the actions to be taken.

Question. Do you support the objective of having the Department achieve an auditable statement of budgetary resources by the end of fiscal year 2014?

Answer. Yes, I agree with current priorities that focus first on the budgetary information most useful in managing the Department. I understand there is a plan to ensure the budgetary statement is ready to be audited by September 2014.

Question. What steps would you take if the Department fails to reach this goal?

Answer. I understand the plan to meet that deadline has received a very high priority at all levels of the Department, and if confirmed, I would sustain this as a high priority and hold senior leadership accountable for reaching this goal. If problems are encountered that would put this goal at risk, I would evaluate the nature of the problem, the reasons the goal was not met, and the remediation options available to get the Department back on track. I would also ensure that Congress is kept apprise of the Department's progress.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AND DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS COLLABORATION

Question. The Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs (VA) have in recent years increased collaboration between the respective departments to support servicemembers as they transition to veteran status. This support includes access to health and mental health care, improved disability evaluation, and coordination of compensation and other benefits.

If confirmed, what role would you expect to play in ensuring that the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs achieve the administration's objectives in DOD and VA collaboration?

Answer. I have been working to improve the transition of our servicemembers to civilian life for most of my life. If confirmed, I am looking forward to taking a very active role in this area. The Department of Veterans Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki is a longtime friend and if confirmed, I will continue the close partnership with him that has existed under Secretaries Gates and Panetta. I will continue the practice of holding regular Secretarial-level meetings and will closely monitor the progress of the many important joint initiatives between the two Departments.

SYSTEMS AND SUPPORT FOR WOUNDED WARRIORS

Question. Servicemembers who are wounded or injured in combat operations deserve the highest priority from their Service for support services, healing and recuperation, rehabilitation, evaluation for return to duty, successful transition from active duty if required, and continuing support beyond retirement or discharge. Yet, as the revelations at Walter Reed Army Medical Center (WRAMC) in 2007 illustrated, the Services were not prepared to meet the needs of significant numbers of returning wounded servicemembers. Despite the enactment of legislation and renewed emphasis, many challenges remain, including a growing population of servicemembers awaiting disability evaluation.

What is your assessment of the progress made to date by DOD and the Services to improve the care, management, and transition of seriously ill and injured servicemembers and their families?

Answer. I believe that important progress in the care, management, and transition of seriously ill and injured servicemembers has been made in the years since the revelations at WRAMC, though there is more work to be done. It will be a top priority to ensure the best quality care for our seriously ill and injured servicemembers and their families. My understanding is Secretary Panetta directed a detailed review of the Integrated Disability Evaluation System (IDES). If confirmed, I look forward to the opportunity to reviewing the details of that effort. I will also work closely with the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to ensure that the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs programs are fully complementary and that wounded servicemembers experience a seamless system of care as they transition to veteran status.

Question. What are the strengths upon which continued progress should be based?

Answer. My understanding is that significant progress has been made in linking an individual with their medical record in a central data repository, and making this information available to any DOD medical treatment facility or Veterans Affairs facility. This appears to provide seamless health care to our members. If confirmed, I will continue to partner with the VA in this area. Although I believe there is more work to be done in improving the care of our seriously ill and injured servicemembers and their families, this issue is a top priority of the senior leadership of the Department and a strength that I will continue to build on. I will also look to build on the close collaboration between the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs in caring for our servicemembers, veterans, and their families.

Question. What are the weaknesses that need to be corrected?

Answer. One weakness is the lack of sufficient mental health care providers at both the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs. While this is mostly a function of the overall shortage of people with this specialty, I know DOD is working hard to address this problem, through increased funding and recruitment. Another weakness that I am aware of is that Veterans Affairs and DOD have multiple caregivers, overwhelming patients and their families. I understand Secretary Panetta and Secretary Shinseki signed an agreement to help wounded warriors navigate through our systems, by naming a lead care coordinator for each wounded warrior. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the implementation of this agreement and work to improve upon it. There is also duplication and overlap in the various services and care programs provided by the Department, the Military Services, and Veterans Affairs, and I would want to make sure that all such programs are fully coordinated, easily accessible, and comprehensible for our wounded, ill, and injured servicemembers and their families.

Question. If confirmed, are there additional strategies and resources that you would pursue to increase support for wounded servicemembers and their families, and to monitor their progress in returning to duty or to civilian life?

Answer. If confirmed, I would look to build on innovative programs and partnerships—both with other Federal agencies, as well as with State and local governments and private and community organizations—that support our wounded, ill, and injured servicemembers and their families. For instance, the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund has added invaluably to the care and treatment of servicemembers and veterans with traumatic brain injury (TBI) and psychological health issues through the National Intrepid Center of Excellence, and they are in the process of building state-of-the-art satellite treatment centers at nine of DOD's largest installations. I am also heartened by cross-agency efforts like the $100 million investment announced last year by the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs to improve diagnosis and treatment of mild TBI and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.

Question. What is your assessment of the adequacy of access to care and care management for Federal civilian employees who are ill or injured in theater, including evaluation and response to traumatic brain injury and post-traumatic stress?

Answer. My understanding is that Federal civilian employees who are injured or ill in theater have been treated by theater military treatment facilities just as Active Duty members would be. Once medically evacuated out of theater, depending on their medical needs, they are transferred to an appropriate civilian institution. If confirmed, I would seek to ensure that Federal civilian employees in theater receive the quality care and care management befitting those who put themselves in harm's way on behalf of the Nation.

Question. Studies conducted as a result of the revelations at WRAMC pointed to the need to reform the disability evaluation system (DES). The IDES was established to integrate the DOD and Department of Veterans Affairs disability systems to improve and expedite processing of servicemembers through the DES.

What is your assessment of the need to further streamline and improve the IDES?

Answer. While the introduction of the joint IDES has on the whole been an improvement over the separate Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs legacy systems, there is still much room for further improvement, particularly with regard to timeliness. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continues to press forward, in close collaboration with Veterans Affairs, with further improvements to the IDES.

Question. If confirmed, how will you address any need for change, particularly the Army's problem with an increasing number of soldiers who are not medically fit for deployment, but who remain on Active Duty while they process through the lengthy IDES process?

Answer. I am aware that this is an issue, particularly for the Army. I do not have specific recommendations at this time, but if confirmed, I will work with the leadership of the military services on ways that we can better balance the need to provide servicemembers with a timely and fair disability evaluation with the need to maintain acceptable levels of deployable personnel.

HOMOSEXUAL CONDUCT POLICY

Question. The law commonly referred to as "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" was repealed effective September 20, 2011. As part of the implementation of this repeal, the Secretary of Defense appointed a benefits review group to conduct a review of all potential benefits that could be made available to same-sex spouses. The report of this review group is long overdue and has been repeatedly delayed.

What is your view of the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell?"

Answer. I fully support the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" and value the service of all those who fight for our country. I fully support gay and lesbian men and women serving openly in the U.S. military and am committed to a full implementation of the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell".

Question. What is your assessment of the implementation of the repeal of this law?

Answer. I understand that the senior military leadership have engaged in a yearlong monitoring process and found that repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" has not had any impacts on readiness, effectiveness, unit cohesion, recruiting, and retention. At the same time, I realize that there is still some work to be done to achieve the full implementation of repeal, particularly with regard to the benefits available to the families of gay and lesbian servicemembers.

Question. What is the status of the report of the benefits review group? When is this group expected to issue its report?

Answer. I understand that this review is not taking the form of a report, per se, but has involved assembling detailed information on individual benefits (including whether each such benefit might be made available under current law, and options for how to do so) to support decision making by the senior civilian and military leadership of the Department, and also that those decisions are currently under active consideration. If confirmed, I will review the work that has been undertaken during the course of the benefits review and will work closely with the DOD civilian and military leadership to move forward expeditiously on this issue.

Question. What is your view on the issue of providing military benefits to same-sex partners?

Answer. As I have stated previously, I fully support the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell," and value the service of all those who fight for our country. If confirmed, I will do everything possible to the extent permissible under current law to provide equal benefits to the families of all our servicemembers.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that completion of the report of the Benefits Review Group is expedited and provided to Congress?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the DOD civilian and military leadership to move forward expeditiously on this issue and will inform the appropriate congressional committees of decisions as they are made.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. The Independent Review Related to the Tragedy at Fort Hood observed that "DOD policy regarding religious accommodation lacks the clarity necessary to help commanders distinguish appropriate religious practices from those that might indicate a potential for violence or self-radicalization." Recommendation 2.7 of the Final Recommendations urged the Department to update policy to clarify guidelines for religious accommodation and Recommendation 2.8 urged the Department to task the Defense Science Board to "undertake a multi-disciplinary study to identify behavioral indicators of violence and self-radicalization. . . ."

What is your view of these recommendations?

Answer. Ensuring appropriate accommodations for the free exercise of religions and protecting servicemembers from violence and harm are both of vital importance. It is my understanding that, pursuant to Recommendation 2.7, the Department updated its policy on religious accommodation to ensure religious freedoms and practices are accommodated to the fullest extent possible considering mission readiness, discipline, and unit cohesion. Regarding Recommendation 2.8, the Department did task the Defense Science Board (DSB) to undertake a study. The DSB recently completed their study and found that it could not determine a specific list of behaviors that would indicate risk of violent/extremist behavior. If I am confirmed, I will review the implementation of the recommendations of the Fort Hood Review.

Question. What is your understanding of current policies and programs of DOD regarding religious practices in the military?

Answer. It is my understanding that policies and programs of DOD regarding religious practices in the military seek to ensure servicemembers' rights to observe the tenets of their respective religions, as well as to hold no specific religious conviction or affiliation.

Question. In your view, do these policies appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. Yes, in my view, current policies appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion for all servicemembers in the pluralistic environment that is the U.S. military. If confirmed, I will continue to monitor and assess these policies.

Question. In your view, do existing policies and practices regarding public prayers offered by military chaplains in a variety of formal and informal settings strike the proper balance between a chaplain's ability to pray in accordance with his or her religious beliefs and the rights of other servicemembers with different beliefs, including no religious beliefs?

Answer. It is my understanding that existing policies provide the military chaplains with sufficient guidance that allows them to balance, in both formal and informal settings, their own faith practices with the rights of others who may hold different or no religious beliefs. I recognize that this at times can be a difficult balance to achieve, and if confirmed, I would work with the civilian and military leadership of the Department and with Congress to ensure DOD continues to do so.

Question. If confirmed, will you work to ensure that a scientific factbased approach to understanding radicalization will drive the Department's relevant policies on this topic?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I would review the Department's existing policies and its plans to address these challenges and determine what, if any, changes should be made. I agree that any changes to how the Department approaches this issue should be based on a solid scientific and factual foundation.

Question. Current policy in the Department gives discretion to military leaders to decide whether requests to waive uniform and appearance standards should be granted based on religious beliefs.

In your view, do DOD policies appropriately accommodate religious practices that require adherents to wear items of religious apparel?

Answer. It is my understanding that current policies allow for consideration of accommodations of religious apparel that do not interfere with the performance of military duties. If confirmed, I would work with the Military Services to ensure that they strike the right balance between military uniform and appearance standards and personal religious practices.

MUSLIMS IN THE U.S. MILITARY

Question. Are you concerned that the attack at Fort Hood could lead to harassment or even violence against Muslims in the military?

Answer. The attack at Fort Hood was a tragedy. It is essential that the circumstances surrounding the attack not compromise the military's core values regarding the free exercise of religion and treating every servicemember with dignity and respect. Each servicemember has the right to practice his or her religious faith without fear of persecution or retribution.

Question. If confirmed, what strategies would you advocate to address the potential for harassment or violence against Muslims in the U.S. military?

Answer. If confirmed, I will not tolerate harassment or mistreatment against Muslims in the military, or against any servicemember based on their religious faith. This sort of behavior or any form of cruelty and maltreatment is inconsistent with the military's core values, detracts from combat capability, and has no place in the Armed Forces. I will expect commanders and leaders at all levels to maintain an environment that promotes dignity and respect, and will hold them accountable for preventing harassment or mistreatment.

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Question. Sexual assaults continue to be a significant issue in the military. Victims of sexual assault report that they are victimized twice: first by attackers in their own ranks and then by unresponsive or inadequate treatment for the victim and failure of the chain of command to hold assailants accountable. The Annual Report on Sexual Harassment and Violence at the Military Service Academies, released in December 2012, documents that while the military academies are in compliance with DOD policies, sexual assault and harassment remain a problem in each academy. Sexual assaults continue to be persistent problem in the Services, as evidenced by the ongoing prosecutions of military training instructors for sexual misconduct with trainees at Air Force basic training at Lackland Air Force Base. Secretary Panetta has recently announced several new initiatives to address the sexual assault problems in the military, including comprehensive assessments of initial training of enlisted personnel and officers, creation of special victim capabilities, and limiting initial disposition authority to Special Court-Martial Convening Authorities in the grade of O–6 or higher.

What is your assessment of the Department's policies for prevention and response to sexual assaults in the military?

Answer. Sexual assault will absolutely not be tolerated in DOD. It is a direct affront to the military's core value to protect all members of the Armed Forces. Current levels of sexual assault are unacceptably high. I know that the Department has put considerable effort into the development and implementation of new policies and procedures to prevent the crime of sexual assault, support victims, and hold offenders appropriately accountable. But I also know that more needs to be done. Secretary Panetta and the Joint Chiefs of Staff have made this issue a top priority. If confirmed, will do the same, and ensure that the Department continues its commitment to address sexual assault in a comprehensive and persistent manner.

Question. What is your view of the steps the Services have taken to prevent and respond to sexual assaults in combat zones, including assaults against contractor personnel?

Answer. I do not have enough information to make a comprehensive assessment of sexual assault prevention and response in deployed environments at this time. It is my understanding that any deployed personnel who are victims, whether servicemembers, civilians, or contractors, receive appropriate emergency medical care and support. I also firmly believe that there must be strict accountability for those who perpetrate such assaults in deployed areas. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continues to address sexual assault in a comprehensive manner—across all Services, in all locations, and for all personnel.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources the Services have in place to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault?

Answer. It is my understanding that all Services have established guidelines for a 24-hour, 7-day-a-week sexual assault response capability for victims in all locations, including deployed areas. With regard to investigations, I understand the Department has multiple efforts underway to enhance its ability to investigate and respond to sexual assault, child abuse, and domestic violence. If confirmed, I will make it a priority to sustain and build on these enhanced capabilities for the investigation of "special victim" crimes.

Question. What is your view of the willingness and ability of the Services to hold assailants accountable for their acts?

Answer. I strongly believe that anyone who commits a sexual assault in the military needs to be held accountable. The Department has a zero tolerance policy, but that is not enough. Accountability is key. To this end, I fully support Secretary Panetta's decision to elevate initial disposition of sexual assault cases to the level of Colonel or Navy Captain, or higher. This action helps ensures our more seasoned, senior commanders determine what actions are appropriate in response to allegations of sexual assault. It is my belief that military commanders are essential to making sexual assault prevention and response efforts successful. But in order to hold assailants accountable, we must have victims who are willing to come forward and report these crimes. To do that, victims need to have confidence in our system of military justice. That is why I also look forward to hearing more about the impact of the Air Force's pilot program assigning an attorney to each victim of sexual assault who requests one to represent them. I believe this could be a very good way to increase the number of victims who are willing to come forward.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to ensure senior level direction and oversight of efforts to prevent and respond to sexual assaults?

Answer. If confirmed, I will make sexual assault prevention and response a personal priority and will work closely with the Secretaries of the Military Departments and the Chiefs of the Military Services to ensure that DOD maintains the current high level of senior leadership focus on this issue.

INCREASED USE OF NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVES

Question. Over the last 2 decades, the National Guard and Reserves have experienced their largest and most sustained employment since World War II. Numerous problems have arisen over time in the planning and procedures for mobilization and demobilization, e.g., inadequate health screening and medical response to service-connected injuries or illnesses, antiquated pay systems, limited transition assistance programs upon demobilization, and inefficient policies regarding members of the Individual Ready Reserve. Reserve Force management policies and systems have been characterized in the past as "inefficient and rigid" and readiness levels have been adversely affected by equipment shortages, cross-leveling, and reset policies. The recently enacted section 12304b of title 10, U.S.C., authorizes Service Secretaries to mobilize for up to 365 consecutive days Reserve component units and individuals in support of pre-planned combatant command missions. Current defense strategy provides for a reduction in conventional ground forces, an increase in special forces, and the establishment of a rotational presence in Europe, the Middle East, and anywhere U.S. interests are threatened. Some in the press have called this a "lily pad" approach, and it potentially dovetails with an operational view of the Reserve components.

What is your assessment of the Reserve and how it will fit into this new strategy of smaller, more lethal forces rotating into and out of many locations of strategic interest?

Answer. The Reserves and National Guard have clearly proven the ability to accomplish any assigned mission overseas or at home. They will continue to play a vital role as we move out of the past decade of war in Iraq and Afghanistan and the Department shapes the force to implement the new defense strategy and to respond to the challenges of a new era.

Question. What is your understanding of the appropriate size and makeup of the Reserve components in light of the current defense strategy?

Answer. I understand that questions about the size and makeup of the Active and Reserve components are currently under consideration as the Department continues to implement the new defense strategy and respond to the current fiscal environment. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Services and the Chief of the National Guard Bureau to determine the most effective mix and makeup of Active, Reserve, and Guard personnel to support the defense strategy.

Question. What is your assessment of advances made in improving Reserve and Guard component mobilization and demobilization procedures, and in what areas do problems still exist?

Answer. I understand that there have been many advances made in policies and procedures governing the utilization of the Guard and Reserves, as well as advancing the pre- and post-Active Duty benefits. These have given Reserve component personnel the ability to plan for periods of utilization followed by substantial time performing inactive duty at home. This provides a predictable cycle of Active Duty and increases readiness by utilizing the Reserve components on a more regular basis. If confirmed, I will ensure these procedures are continually assessed to ensure they are providing the Reserve components the support they need and deserve.

Question. What do you consider to be the most significant enduring changes to the enabling of an operational reserve aimed at ensuring Reserve component and Guard readiness for future mobilization requirements?

Answer. In my view, the most significant and enduring change in this area has been the use of the Reserve component as a full partner in the overall force at large. In particular, the experience and skills that members of the Reserve component have gained from preparing and deploying over the past decade have notably increased the overall readiness of the Reserve component, and the Department will continue to make use of these enhanced skills and readiness in the future.

Question. Do you see a need to modify current statutory authorities for the mobilization of members of the National Guard and Reserves or to further enhance their ability to perform various national security missions?

Answer. I appreciate Congress' willingness in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 to increase authorities to fully use the Reserves as a rotational force. If confirmed, I will consider this question in light of the new strategy, but at the present time I believe that appropriate policies and procedures are in place and no laws need to be changed.

DWELL TIME

Question. While dwell time is improving as our forces draw down in Afghanistan, many Active Duty military members are still not experiencing the dwell time goal of 2 years at home for every year deployed.

In your view, when will the Active component dwell time goal be met?

Answer. I understand that all of the Services, on average, are meeting or exceeding the Department's dwell time goal of 2 years at home for every year deployed, or 1:2, for the Active component. If confirmed, I will continue to monitor this issue closely.

Question. When will dwell time objectives be met for the Reserve components?

Answer. I understand Reserve component dwell time is improving, but has not reached the Department's dwell time goal of 5 years at home for every 1 year of active duty, or 1:5. If confirmed, I will continue to work toward the goal of a 1:5 dwell time ratio for the Reserve component for all of the Services.

ACTIVE-DUTY AND RESERVE COMPONENT END STRENGTH

Question. The Department last year announced its 5-year plan to reduce Active Duty end strengths by over 100,000 servicemembers by 2017, and the Reserve components by another 21,000 over the same period. These cuts do not include any additional personnel reductions that could result from sequestration or any agreement to avoid sequestration.

Do you agree with this plan to reduce Active Duty and Reserve component end strengths?

Answer. If confirmed, I will review the plan, but I believe that we must be able to balance end-strength, readiness, and modernization. The end strength drawdown allows us to achieve the right size force and keep it modern. The plan is designed to maintain capable and ready military forces while managing reductions in a way that "keeps faith" with servicemembers who have been at war for the past 10 years. While the plan will reduce Active Duty end strength by 100,000, I believe the Department has scaled back the Reserve component cut to less than 21,000 (17,000). Preserving the Guard and Reserve reduces the risk of reductions and hedges against uncertainty by providing capacity and capability that can be called up if needed. As future national security conditions change, the Department's planned drawdown could change accordingly.

Question. What is your view of how these planned end-strength reductions will affect dwell time ratios?

Answer. The Army and Marine Corps end strength reductions are synchronized with plans for the drawdown in Afghanistan. The Department's dwell time goal is 1:2 Active, 1:5 for Reserves. With some exceptions, the current dwell is 1:1 Active, 1:5 Reserve. If the Afghanistan force drawdown stays on track, the duty/dwell ratio goal for components should be achieved. If confirmed, I will carefully monitor the dwell time of our servicemembers since it is critical that dwell times be sufficient to preserve the wellbeing of our force.

Question. What effect would inability to meet dwell time objectives have on your decision to implement the planned end strength reductions?

Answer. Preserving the All-Volunteer Force is a top priority, so it is important to avoid stressing the Active and Reserve components. If confirmed, I would assess our ability to achieve our strategic missions and dwell time objectives prior to and during implementation of the planned Army and Marine Corps strength reductions.

Question. What additional military personnel reductions do you envision if the Department were required to sequester funding as outlined in the BCA?

Answer. The President notified Congress of his intent to exempt all military personnel accounts from sequester for fiscal year 2013, if a sequester is necessary. However, if the Department were required to sequester funding, I believe that it would first require a revision of the Defense Strategic Guidance announced by the President last January. The current strategy could not be met with the significantly diminished resources that sequester would impose. The revised strategy could very well impact all components of our workforce—Government civilians and contractors in the near-term as well as Active Duty and Reserve component military if the sequester continues beyond fiscal year 2013.

Question. In your view, what tools do the Department and Services need to get down to authorized strengths in the future, and which of these require congressional authorization?

Answer. The workforce management tools that Congress provided in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 will be useful for the drawdown. The Department continues to examine whether other workforce management authorities are needed and will submit those to Congress as necessary. In addition, in the event that the Department has to sequester funding, the Department would likely revisit the size of all components of the workforce—Active Duty military, Reserve component military, Government civilians, and contractors. After such a review, the Department might require, and would then request, additional authorization for tools to meet reduced end strength goals.

RECRUITING STANDARDS

Question. Recruiting highly qualified individuals for military service during wartime in a cost-constrained environment presents unique challenges.

What is your assessment of the adequacy of current standards regarding qualifications for enlistment in the Armed Forces?

Answer. Today's enlistment qualification standards are well-defined, supported by years of experience, and have stood the test of time. They are driven by the need to provide the Services with men and women who are prepared to adapt to the rigors of military life and meet performance requirements. The adequacy of these standards is evidenced by over 11 years of continuous armed conflict manned by a high quality All-Volunteer Force.

Question. In your view, is there any way to increase the pool of eligible enlistees without sacrificing quality?

Answer. My understanding is the Services are always exploring ways to improve their ability to expand the recruiting market without sacrificing quality. As an example, this year the Department expanded its ability to enlist graduates with alternative diplomas while minimizing first term attrition. The Services also may be able to augment their screening procedures by incorporating other measures, such as temperament, to identify applicants who are likely to adapt well to the military. If confirmed, I will work with the Services to continually find new ways to expand the recruit market.

WOMEN IN THE MILITARY

Question. The issue of the appropriate role of women in the Armed Forces is a matter of continuing interest to Congress and the American public. Last year, DOD released a report to Congress, required by section 535 of the Ike Skelton National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2011 (Public Law 111–383), reviewing the laws and policies restricting the service of female members of the Armed Forces, and provided notice to Congress that the Department would open positions in ground combat units at the battalion level to women in occupational specialties for which they are already qualified to serve, and would eliminate the so-called co-location policy. According to the report, the changes resulted in over 14,000 positions being opened to women that were previously denied. Since then, the Marine Corps opened training positions at its Infantry Officer course to female marines, and the Army recently announced opening some special operation aviation positions to female servicemembers.

What is your view of the appropriate role for women in the Armed Forces?

Answer. Women are indispensable to our military. They have served ably alongside their male counterparts in Iraq and Afghanistan in a variety of roles. I support the expansion of opportunities for women to serve. If confirmed, I will ensure that the process of opening previously closed positions takes place expeditiously and at the same time that our readiness and ability to defend the Nation are not compromised by these changes.

Question. Do you believe additional specialties should be opened up for service by women? If so, which specialties?

Answer. On January 24, 2013, Secretary Panetta rescinded the 1994 Direct Ground Combat Definition and Assignment Rule and directed the integration of women into previously closed positions by January 1, 2016. If confirmed, I will continue implementation of that new policy, including its emphasis on the effectiveness of the fighting force and the development of gender-neutral standards.

Question. Do you believe any changes in the current policy or legislation regarding women in combat are needed or warranted?

Answer. I am not aware of further necessary changes at this time. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the implementation of the January 24, 2013 policy and if I see that additional policies or legislation are needed, I will make recommendations.

RISING COSTS OF MEDICAL CARE

Question. In testimony presented to Congress in February, 2009, the Assistant Director of the Congressional Budget Office asserted that "medical funding accounts for more than one-third of the growth projected for operations and support funding between 2009 and 2026." In April 2009, Secretary Gates told an audience at Maxwell Air Force Base that "health care is eating the Department alive." In recent years, the Department has attempted to address the growth in overall health care costs through various fee increases on military retirees.

What reforms in infrastructure, benefits, or benefit management, if any, do you think should be examined in order to control the costs of military health care?

Answer. It is essential that the Department take steps to control the costs of military healthcare while ensuring it continues to provide for our military personnel, their families, and retirees. I understand the Department included proposals in the fiscal year 2012 and 2013 President's budgets that would slow the growth of healthcare costs while preserving the quality and range of health care. These proposals include increasing enrollment fees and deductibles for retirees and increasing pharmacy co-pays. Not many of these proposals were accepted by Congress. If confirmed, I will review initiatives in this area and look for further opportunities as we must continue to look for savings in this area.

Question. What is your assessment of the long-term impact of rising medical costs on future DOD plans?

Answer. As I understand the situation, health care consumes nearly 10 percent of the Department's budget and could grow considerably over the next decade, taking an ever larger bite out of our ability to invest in enhanced warfighting capability. However, I realize that the healthcare benefit is a key component of retention for our men and women in uniform so I will work closely with the military and civilian leadership in the Department to find reasonable and responsible ways to stem this growth without breaking faith with our servicemembers, their families, and retirees.

Question. If confirmed, what actions would you initiate or recommend to mitigate the effect of such costs on the DOD top-line?

Answer. I cannot make specific recommendations at this time. If confirmed, I am committed to continuing to review military health care. Any changes must keep the faith with our troops, be transparent, preserve the quality and range of health care, and protect wounded warriors, medically-retired, and the families of those who died on Active Duty. Given today's budget environment, we must continue to look for savings opportunities, and this should include military health care.

PERSONNEL AND ENTITLEMENT COSTS

Question. In addition to health care costs, personnel and related entitlement spending continues to grow and is becoming an ever increasing portion of the DOD budget.

What actions do you believe can and should be taken, if any, to control the rise in personnel costs and entitlement spending?

Answer. I understand personnel and entitlement costs make up a significant portion of the Department's budget and have risen sharply over the past 10 years. The Department has proposed several initiatives in an attempt to slow the rate of growth while continuing to attract and retain the right number and quality of personnel. If confirmed, I am committed to exploring options to find savings and more efficient alternatives to help control the rise in personnel and entitlement costs while still fully supporting the All-Volunteer Force.

Question. In your view, can the Department and the Services efficiently manage the use of bonuses and special pays to place high quality recruits in the right jobs without paying more than the Department needs to pay, or can afford to pay, for other elements of the force?

Answer. I understand that targeted bonuses and special pays are very effective tools for achieving the Department's personnel strength and quality objectives and are generally much more cost-effective than across-the-board pay increases. Like any compensation program, these tools must be continually monitored to ensure they are used both efficiently and effectively and that the Department is receiving best value for its dollars.

MILITARY COMPENSATION AND RETIREMENT COMMISSION

Question. The NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 establishes a commission to review all elements of the military compensation and retirement systems and to make recommendations to modernize those systems to ensure the long-term viability of the All-Volunteer Force, enable a high quality of life for military families, and to achieve fiscal sustainability for the compensation and retirement systems.

Do you agree with the need for a comprehensive study of the military compensation and retirement systems?

Answer. I believe it is appropriate to perform a comprehensive review of the military compensation and retirement systems to ensure we have the right mix of pay and benefits to support our members.

Question. Do you support the goals of the Commission?

Answer. Yes. I am committed to ensuring any proposed changes to the mix of pay and benefits keep faith with those who are serving today and with those who have served in the past.

DEPENDENT CARE AND FLEXIBLE SPENDING ACCOUNTS

Question. The 10th Quadrennial Review of Military Compensation recommended providing dependent care and flexible spending benefits to Active Duty servicemembers. Providing these benefits would seem consistent with the initiatives of First Lady Michelle Obama and Dr. Jill Biden on behalf of military families. It would appear that no new legislative authority is needed for the Department to provide these benefits to servicemembers and their families.

If confirmed, would you extend these benefits to the Active Duty servicemembers and their families?

Answer. Taking care of our servicemembers and their families is a top priority of DOD. If confirmed, I will examine the option of flexible spending accounts for military families to determine if they are an appropriate part of our extensive benefits package for servicemembers and their families in this time of fiscal austerity.

SUICIDE PREVENTION AND MENTAL HEALTH RESOURCES

Question. The numbers of suicides in each of the Services continues to concern the committee. The Army released a report in July 2010 that analyzed the causes of its growing suicide rate and examined disturbing trends in drug use, disciplinary offenses, and high risk behaviors. In addition studies conducted by the Army, of soldiers and marines in theater, showed declines in individual morale and increases in mental health strain, especially among those who have experienced multiple deployments.

In your view, what role should DOD play in shaping policies to help prevent suicides both in garrison and in theater and to increase the resiliency of all servicemembers and their families, including members of the Reserve components?

Answer. Suicides by military members are tragic—every suicide is one too many. It is a a complex problem that plagues our entire society—there are no easy answers or quick solutions. I think Secretary Panetta put it best when he said that suicide is perhaps the most frustrating challenge he has come across as Secretary of Defense. I believe that DOD must take a multi-faceted approach to preventing suicides that involves leadership responsibility, access to quality behavioral health care, efforts to improve mental fitness and resiliency, and increased research on causes and means of preventing suicide. If confirmed, I will push for enhancements to DOD's policies and programs in each of these areas.

Question. What is your understanding of the action that the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the Army are taking in response to the July 2010 Army report, and the data in Chapter 3 in particular?

Answer. My understanding is that the Department has taken multiple actions to address the rise of suicides since the release of the Army's July 2010 report as well as the report of the DOD Suicide Prevention Task Force in September 2010. In particular, in November 2011, the DOD established the Defense Suicide Prevention Office to serve as the oversight authority for the implementation, standardization, and evaluation of suicide and risk reduction programs and policies.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to ensure that sufficient mental health resources are available to servicemembers in theater, and to the servicemembers and their families upon return to home station?

Answer. I am firmly committed to implementing the President's Executive Order on "Improving Access to Mental Health Services for Veterans, Servicemembers, and Military Families." I look forward to reviewing the 12-month national suicide prevention campaign that DOD and VA are developing as part of the implementation of this Executive Order and will ensure that DOD does all it can to ensure that it is providing sufficient, high-quality behavioral health care to servicemembers and their families.

MILITARY QUALITY OF LIFE

Question. The committee is concerned about the sustainment of key quality of life programs for military families, such as family support, child care, education, employment support, health care, and morale, welfare and recreation services, especially as DOD faces budget challenges.

How do you perceive the relationship between military recruitment and retention and quality-of-life improvements and your own top priorities for the Armed Forces?

Answer. Quality-of-life programs that address family readiness needs must be available to families of our military members wherever they may be located. Changes in our basing, deployment patterns, and force structure, as we implement our new strategy and respond to the current fiscal environment, will pose some additional challenges in delivering these programs. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the impacts of such changes to ensure the needs of our military families continue to be met.

Question. If confirmed, what further enhancements to military qualify of life would you consider a priority, and how do you envision working with the Services, combatant commanders, family advocacy groups, and Congress to achieve them?

Answer. I recognize that the well-being of the force, as well as recruiting and retention efforts, are significantly impacted by quality of life programs. I look forward to working with Congress, family advocacy groups, the Services, and combatant commanders to ensure we have a comprehensive, accessible, and affordable suite of programs.

FAMILY READINESS AND SUPPORT

Question. Military members and their families in both the Active and Reserve components have made, and continue to make, tremendous sacrifices in support of operational deployments. Senior military leaders have warned of growing concerns among military families as a result of the stress of frequent deployments and the long separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for servicemembers and their families?

Answer. It is the Department's responsibility to help prepare military families to cope with the challenges inherent with military service. In order to build and sustain resilient military families, the Department must continuing to focus on programs that enhance their social, financial, educational, and psychological well-being.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. Sustaining family programs in the current fiscally constrained environment will be challenging, but it is of vital importance. If confirmed, I will seek to protect funding for family readiness programs to the greatest extent possible and will examine all such programs to ensure that they are operating efficiently so that available resources are going to their best and most effective uses.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, deployments, and future reductions in end strength?

Answer. Changes in our basing, deployment patterns, and force structure, as we implement our new strategy and respond to the current fiscal environment, will pose some additional challenges to maintaining family readiness. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the impacts of such changes to ensure the needs of our military families continue to be met.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support is provided to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to Active Duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

Answer. I believe that DOD has a responsibility to ensure access to quality programs, information and resources to families, regardless of their location. Military OneSource is an excellent example of a resource that is not tied to location, but allows families to access information and referral by the internet or by phone with live consultants available 24-hours-a-day, 7-days-a-week. Maintaining a strong network of community-based providers, and partnerships with State and local governments are also key in ensuring local resources are readily available to servicemembers and their families, particularly Reserve component families and Active component families who do not live near a military installation. If confirmed, I will evaluate these programs to ensure we are meeting the needs of these military families.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps will you take to enhance family support?

Answer. I believe there are opportunities to improve the efficiency and accessibility of the resources and programs that DOD, other Federal agencies, State and local governments, and community organizations provide to support servicemembers and their families. If confirmed, I will explore these opportunities and how we can better coordinate efforts among the various entities providing family support.

DETAINEE TREATMENT POLICY

Question. Do you support the policy set forth in the July 7, 2006, memorandum issued by the Deputy Secretary of Defense stating that all relevant DOD directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures must fully comply with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you support the standards for detainee treatment specified in the revised Army Field Manual on Interrogations, FM 2–22.3, issued in September 2006, and in DOD Directive 2310.01E, the Department of Defense Detainee Program, dated September 5, 2006?

Answer. Yes.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that all DOD policies promulgated and plans implemented related to intelligence interrogations, detainee debriefings, and tactical questioning comply with the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and the Army Field Manual on Interrogations?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you share the view that standards for detainee treatment must be based on the principle of reciprocity, that is, that we must always keep in mind the risk that the manner in which we treat our own detainees may have a direct impact on the manner in which U.S. soldiers, sailors, airmen, or marines are treated, should they be captured in future conflicts?

Answer. Yes. reciprocity is a critical component and underlying value of our detainee treatment policies. As a Vietnam veteran, I also view this principle of reciprocity as a way to protect our U.S. soldiers, sailors, airmen, or marines, should they be captured in future conflicts.

COORDINATION WITH THE DEPARTMENT OF HOMELAND SECURITY

Question. After the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001, Congress established the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), and DOD established the U.S. Northern Command and an Assistant Secretary of Defense for Homeland Defense and Americas' Security Affairs.

What is your assessment of the current situation regarding cooperation and coordination between DOD and DHS on homeland security and civil support matters, and what will be your goals in this regard if you are confirmed?

Answer. Recent disaster responses, including the Department's efforts in response to Hurricane Sandy, show that DOD and DHS have a strong relationship. This success is a result of active engagement the Department has at all levels with DHS and many other of the Department's domestic interagency partners. Elements of the Department work very closely on a daily basis with the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), the U.S. Secret Service, the U.S. Coast Guard, and U.S. Customs and Border Protection. The Department and DHS have successfully exchanged liaison and coordination staff officers to cement this collaborative approach at the working level. While a Member of Congress I voted to establish the DHS and have been pleased to see its success. If confirmed, my goal would be to continue to bolster the strong relationship between the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security.

Question. Do you believe the current mechanism for DOD to respond to the needs of domestic government agencies for DOD support in the event of a natural or man-made disaster is appropriate, or do you believe it needs to be modified?

Answer. The mechanisms for the Department to respond to the needs of domestic agencies appear to be working effectively. It is my understanding that the Department acted on 60 requests for assistance from FEMA during the Hurricane Sandy response last year, including helping to restore power, providing millions of gallons of fuel for first responders and residents, and removing water from the Brooklyn Battery tunnel, the longest underwater tunnel in North America. I understand that the Department also responded to some 21 other requests for assistance from FEMA for a variety of other disasters in 2012, as well as providing assistance to other Federal agencies, including the U.S. Forest Service for wildland firefighting and the U.S. Secret Service for protection of the President during special events such as the recent Inauguration. If confirmed, I will work with the Department's partner agencies to ensure that the current mechanisms remain effective and, where opportunities arise, pursue improvements.

IRAQ LESSONS LEARNED

Question. Did you agree with the President's decision on the withdrawal of U.S. military forces from Iraq? If so, why? If not, why not?

Answer. Yes. I supported the withdrawal of all U.S. forces from Iraq by December 2011 in accordance with the November 2008 U.S.-Iraq Security Agreement. It was the right decision. Our military men and women in uniform had completed their mission. We now have a strong relationship with a sovereign Iraq. Our drawdown has allowed us to advance our strategic partnership based on mutual interests and mutual respect.

Question. In your view, what aspects, if any, of the departure/drawdown of U.S. forces would you have modified?

Answer. I would not have modified the withdrawal of all U.S. combat forces by December 2011. I believe that the deadline helped the Iraqi Security Forces step up and take responsibility for the security of their people. This has allowed us to deepen our partnership with a sovereign Iraq, based on mutual interests and mutual respect.

Question. What do you believe are the major lessons learned from the Iraq invasion and the follow-on efforts to stabilize the country through 2011?

Answer. I believe we must think very carefully before we commit our Armed Forces to battlefields abroad. Our forces deserve policies and planning worthy of the sacrifices they make in combat. Our Nation learned a number of lessons in Iraq—from the invasion, to the stabilization, to the withdrawal of our forces. These lessons include ensuring appropriate planning and preparation for a range of outcomes and events, setting clear and realistic strategic objectives, appreciating the limitations of military force and the necessity of engaging all levels of national power (political, economic, cultural, intelligence), recognizing the value and difficulty of building partnership capacity, enhancing interagency coordination, and improving our oversight of wartime spending and contracting. One of the most important lessons is that the U.S. Government must prepare for combat, post-combat, and securing the peace. The U.S. military must plan and train with civilian counterparts, be prepared to operate effectively in all phases of conflict, and improve cultural, linguistic, and partnering and advising skills within our force.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment, if any, of the Department's adaptations or changes in policy, programs, force structure, or operational concepts based upon these lessons learned?

Answer. I understand the Department has taken a number of steps to institutionalize the lessons from Iraq across policy, doctrine, organization, and training. The Department is committed to maintaining a focus on cultural and linguistic capabilities as well as the new operational approaches in counterterrorism, counterinsurgency, and security force assistance. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the Department continues to evaluate and implement lessons learned.

Question. If confirmed, what additional changes, if any, would you propose making to policy, programs, force structure, or operating concepts based on the lessons of combat and stability operations in Iraq?

Answer. I do not feel I know enough at this time to provide not have additional recommendations. If confirmed, I will study and evaluate the Department's efforts to retain and refine the lessons learned, expertise, and specialized capabilities that have been developed over the past 10 years of counterinsurgency and stability operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Question. You called for an international mediator under the auspices of the U.N. Security Council to engage Iraq's political, religious, ethnic, and tribal leaders. Would you advocate that same course of action for Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the Afghan-led reconciliation process and make recommendations on any changes I think would be helpful. However, within the administration, the Afghanistan reconciliation process is led by the Department of State. They are in a better position to advise on the need for a U.N. Security Council role.

Question. Based on the lessons learned during the departure of military forces from Iraq, if confirmed, how would you shape U.S. enduring presence in Afghanistan in the post-2014 environment?

Answer. The U.S. presence post-2014 is an issue being discussed between the President and the Government of Afghanistan. If confirmed, I would work to ensure that the United States retains criminal and civil jurisdiction over U.S. forces in the Bilateral Security Agreement now under negotiation; if it does not, I will not support a continued U.S. military presence.

STABILITY AND COUNTERINSURGENCY OPERATIONS

Question. The January 2012 DOD Strategic Guidance called for U.S. forces to be ready to conduct limited counterinsurgency and other stability operations if required, and to retain and continue to refine the lessons learned, expertise, and specialized capabilities that have been gained over the past 10 years of operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. At the same time, the Strategic Guidance states that, "U.S. forces will no longer be sized to conduct large-scale, prolonged stability operations."

In your view, how should strategic guidance for DOD manage risk and articulate the types of missions or operations U.S. forces will or will not be expected to execute or accomplish?

Answer. The Department's strategic guidance documents should set clear priorities that enable senior Departmental leadership to determine appropriate trade-offs in military missions and force structure. Senior leadership deliberation on these trade-offs should be informed by a comprehensive, strategic understanding of risk to our defense and national security objectives. As strategy is implemented, the Department should continue to test it to determine areas of risk and develop mitigation options. If confirmed, I will aim to have any risk the Department bears be both manageable and acceptable; although budget uncertainty will make this a difficult task.

Question. In your view, what are the appropriate roles and responsibilities, if any, between DOD and other departments and agencies of the Federal Government in the planning and conduct of stability operations?

Answer. Coordinated and integrated interagency efforts are essential to the conduct of successful stability operations. The United States should emphasize nonmilitary means and military-to-military cooperation to address instability and reduce the demand for significant U.S. force commitments to stability operations. In general, the Department should be in a support role to other U.S. Government departments and agencies in the planning and execution of most stability operations. However, if directed, the Department will lead stability operations activities to establish security, to restore essential services, to repair and protect critical infrastructure, and to deliver humanitarian assistance. Once acceptable levels of security and public order have been established, the Department should seek to transition lead responsibility to other U.S. Government agencies, foreign governments and security forces, or international governmental organizations.

Question. In developing the capabilities necessary for stability operations, what adjustments, if any, should be made to prepare U.S. Armed Forces to conduct stability operations without detracting from its ability to perform combat missions?

Answer. As our campaigns over the last 12 years have demonstrated, it is no longer an either/or choice between stability operations and combat. After almost 2 decades of hard-earned lessons in Afghanistan, Iraq, the Balkans, and elsewhere, I understand the Services have made great strides in their combined abilities to conduct stability operations. If confirmed, I will seek to maintain the stability operations expertise the Department has gained, and to ensure that the Services have the mechanisms necessary to expand their capacities, should our military forces be called upon to conduct comprehensive and sustained stability operations.

Question. Do you believe that the U.S. Government needs to establish new procedures to manage stability operations? If so, why?

Answer. Collaborative and coordinated planning with interagency and international partners is fundamental to the successful management and the effectiveness of U.S. Government stabilization and reconstruction activities. We must have a strong combined ability to conduct effective interagency planning. If confirmed, I will review the Department's procedures to identify potential improvements in the current processes and procedures used to manage stability operations across the U.S. Government and, as necessary and possible, expand the Department's support to other departments and agencies in their stability operations planning and execution.

Question. With the drawdown of operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, what is your view on the future disposition of foreign and security force funding authorities including 1206 (Global Train and Equip), the Global Security Contingency Fund (GSCF), and other security force assistance authorities?

Answer. Today's security challenges cannot and should not be addressed by the United States alone. We need partnerships that combine our unique capabilities with the unique strengths of our allies and partners. Future challenges will likely emphasize the importance of our collaboration with capable partners. I understand that in order to meet our counterterrorism challenges, the Department shares these two authorities with the State Department to train and equip foreign security forces in a more rapid fashion than traditional Foreign Military Financing. Section 1206 is an important part of the Department's "toolbox" for responding to urgent and emerging counterterrorism challenges and stability operations, and that the GSCF is in its initial pilot phase. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department effectively and efficiently leverages authorities that enable our security force assistance efforts. These efforts are important to the Department's ability to build the capacity of foreign partners to help them develop effective and legitimate security institutions that can provide for their countries' internal security, and contribute to regional and multilateral responses to threats and instability.

Question. In your view, is there a roll for DOD in improving the operational capabilities of the African Standby Brigades?

Answer. The Department can help improve the capabilities of the individual countries contributing forces to the African Standby Brigades. Direct training can make a qualitative difference in the capabilities of partner countries and increase the effectiveness of the regional organizations that mandate such operations. In terms of helping the Standby Brigades once they are established, I understand that there are Presidential Determinations authorizing work with some regional organizations. In the cases where the Department is able to engage, I understand that habitual training and exercises can help strengthen the Brigades' operational capabilities.

SECURITY SITUATION IN IRAQ

Question. What is your assessment of the current security situation in Iraq?

Answer. The overall security situation is stable, yet challenges remain. It is critical for Iraq to resolve its internal boundary disputes and political differences without the use or threat of force. I am concerned about the intent of al Qaeda in Iraq to exploit political and sectarian differences to breed instability. The Iraqi Security Forces have proven themselves capable of countering this threat to date and I believe that our continuing partnership with Iraq should aim to help Iraq against this terrorist threat.

Question. What are the main challenges to stability and security in Iraq over the coming months?

Answer. The main challenges to internal stability and security in Iraq are al Qaeda in Iraq, slow political progress, and sectarian-motivated groups who would use violence to advance their cause. Moreover, the unresolved status of territories claimed by the Kurdistan Regional Government has the potential to create fissures that can be exploited by extremist groups, and could lead to an escalation of tension between Kurdish and central government forces. While plenty of stumbling blocks exist, it is important that the Iraqi political parties continue to look to the political process to resolve their differences. Continuing to encourage dialogue and respect for the constitutional process will be crucial to ensuring long-term stability. The United States must also closely watch the impact that events external to Iraq, such as the deteriorating situation in Syria, have on Iraqi stability and security.

U.S.-IRAQ STRATEGIC RELATIONSHIP

Question. The withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq at the end of 2011 has been described as the beginning of a new chapter in the strategic relationship between the United States and Iraq. The U.S.-Iraq Strategic Framework Agreement sets out a foundation for a normalized U.S.-Iraqi relationship in areas of mutual economic, diplomatic, cultural and security interests. Secretary of Defense Panetta and the Iraqi Minister of Defense recently signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) for Defense Cooperation between the Ministry of Defense of the Republic of Iraq and the DOD of the United States.

How do you envision the U.S.-Iraq strategic relationship developing in the coming years and what are your priorities for that relationship?

Answer. The United States should seek a normal, productive relationship and a strategic partnership with a sovereign Iraq—analogous to the partnerships we have with other countries in the region and around the world. If confirmed, I will continue to strengthen our military-to-military relationship with Iraq, and further its reintegration into the region.

Question. What do you see as the greatest challenges for that relationship over the coming years?

Answer. Iraq faces several tough challenges as the Nation's new government matures and works through internal differences, and it will be important to continue to engage Iraq during a time of change. We have moved from occupiers to partners, and that can be a hard transition. But recent turmoil in the broader Middle East highlights the importance of active U.S. engagement and maintaining strategic partnerships with regional partners based on mutual interests and mutual respect. We must maintain focus on Iraq in order to advance broader U.S. objectives of peace and security in the region.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the recently concluded MOU? In your view, does this agreement on defense cooperation promote U.S. interests with respect to Iraq and the region?

Answer. My understanding of the MOU is that it represents mutual understandings regarding future expansion of defense cooperation. In a time of great uncertainty in the region, Iraq will play an increasingly important role in ensuring stability and it is critical that we continue to work together to ensure stability and peace in the region.

OFFICE OF SECURITY COOPERATION IN IRAQ

Question. In the NDAAs for Fiscal Years 2012 and 2013, Congress authorized the Secretary of Defense to support the transition in Iraq by providing funds for the activities and operations of the Office of Security Cooperation in Iraq (OSC–I). In the report accompanying the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, the conferees expressed their expectation that the administration will accelerate the transition of the OSC–I to a normalized status comparable to Offices of Security Cooperation in other countries in the region, and that funding for OSC–I activities and operations will be transitioned out of DOD to other sources, as is the case for offices of security cooperation in other countries.

Do you support the transition of the OSC–I to a normalized office of security cooperation comparable to those in other countries in the region?

Answer. Yes. The OSC–I, under Chief of Mission authority, is the foundation for our long-term security partnership with Iraq. If confirmed, I will continue Secretary Panetta's work to normalize the OSC–I, in coordination with the Department of State, which has lead for the U.S. Mission in Iraq.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the transition of the OSC–I to a normalized status, including funding from sources other than the DOD, is completed in a deliberate manner?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will work with the Department of State, which has lead for the U.S. Mission in Iraq, to normalize the OSC–I and transition to traditional security assistance and security cooperation funding sources.

Question. What timeframe would you use as a target to transition OSC–1 to a normalized status?

Answer. I am unable to comment on the specific timing as I have not reviewed the detailed plans and it is a decision to be made with the Department of State, which has lead for the U.S. Mission in Iraq. If confirmed, I will review the planning for OSC–I normalization and work closely with the Department of State.

AFGHANISTAN STRATEGY

Question. Do you support the current strategy for Afghanistan? In your view, is that the right strategy?

Answer. Yes. I support the strategy that the President has set forth and that we are now implementing, and I believe it is the right strategy. I believe that any strategy should be reviewed and adapted over time, and, if confirmed, will give my best advice to the President and consult with Congress on this critical issue.

Question. If confirmed, are there changes you would recommend to the U.S. strategy in Afghanistan?

Answer. I believe that the U.S. strategy in Afghanistan is sound. I also believe that, over time, the administration should continue to assess the strategy. If confirmed, I will consult with Congress, and with our allies and partners in this regard.

Question. What is your assessment of the progress of the campaign in Afghanistan?

Answer. I believe that our campaign in Afghanistan has made significant progress. Our Coalition and Afghan partners blunted the insurgents' summer offensive for the second consecutive year. The Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF) are moving into security lead throughout the country. They are pushing violence out of most populated areas, and the United States and our coalition partners agreed in Chicago to support the long-term stability and security of Afghanistan. Exceeding initial expectations, Afghan forces began leading the majority of operations in July 2012 and now lead approximately 80 percent of operations. In February, in conjunction with the fourth tranche of transition, the ANSF is expected to have the lead in securing 87 percent of the Afghan population. Overall violence was down 7 percent in 2012. At the same time, I understand that significant challenges remain, including insider threats and completing the transition to Afghanistan taking on full responsibility for its security at the end of 2014.

SECURITY TRANSITION IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. President Obama and Afghan President Karzai recently announced that the transition to an Afghan lead for security throughout Afghanistan will occur this spring, several months ahead of schedule. As part of the ongoing transition, coalition forces are shifting increasingly to an advise-and-assist mission but will continue to support Afghan security forces until the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) mission concludes by no later than the end of 2014.

Do you support the announced transition of the security lead to Afghan security forces throughout Afghanistan by this spring?

Answer. Yes. As this transition occurs, I understand that the ISAF will shift into an advisor support role.

Question. Do you support the shift in the mission of coalition forces to an increasingly advise-and-assist role in support of Afghan security forces?

Answer. Yes. This mission shift to an increasingly support role is consistent with what Afghans want and what was agreed at the 2010 Lisbon Summit—an Afghanistan able to provide for its own security, with the assistance of the U.S. and other nations. The U.S. and our coalition and Afghan partners reaffirmed this goal at the 2012 Chicago North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) Summit. For transition to be successful, it makes good sense for the ANSF to assume lead security responsibility this year, enabled by continued support and mentoring from ISAF to prepare them for full security responsibility by the end of 2014.

Question. Do you agree that it is important for the success of the mission in Afghanistan to have Afghan security forces, rather than coalition forces, taking the lead for security and conducting unilateral operations to the maximum extent?

Answer. Yes. Training and developing the ANSF into a force that can sustainably assume full security responsibility by the end of 2014 is critical to meeting this objective.

Question. What is your assessment of the capacity and performance of the Afghan security forces in assuming the lead for security in areas designated for transition, including in contested areas?

Answer. I understand that the ANSF have exceeded initial expectations. Afghan forces began leading the majority of operations in July 2012 and now lead approximately 80 percent of operations, including increasingly complex, multi-day operations. Violence in transition Tranches 1, 2, and 3, where the ANSF are now in the lead, was down 9 percent, 6 percent, and 14 percent respectively in 2012 compared to 2011. Some of these initial areas of transition include contested areas, such as Lashkar Gah and Helmand, where the ANSF have done well. However, the last two transition Tranches contain many contested areas, so significant challenges remain and ISAF support will be critical throughout 2013–2014.

Question. In your opinion, are there any conditions on the ground in Afghanistan at the end of 2014 that would preclude a responsible transition of mission from combat to support for U.S. forces? Under what conditions, if any, would you recommend against making such a transition at the end of 2014?

Answer. Currently, I believe that transition is on track for the Afghans to assume full security responsibility by the end of 2014. At this time, I do not foresee any realistic conditions that would preclude this transition from being completed responsibly by the end of 2014. If confirmed, I will monitor the conditions closely and will continue to assess progress, in consultation with commanders on the ground and the Joint Chiefs; and, if necessary and warranted by changing conditions, I will adjust the Department's recommendations.

DRAW DOWN OF U.S. FORCES IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. In June 2011, President Obama announced his decision to draw down the 33,000 U.S. surge force in Afghanistan so that by the summer of 2012 U.S. forces will be at a level of 68,000. The President recently reaffirmed his pledge to continue to bring U.S. forces home from Afghanistan at a steady pace. He also stated he would announce the next phase of the U.S. drawdown based on the recommendations of the ISAF Commander and other commanders on the ground in Afghanistan.

How would you assess the decision to draw down the 33,000 U.S. surge force from Afghanistan by the end of summer 2012?

Answer. In my view, the decision to draw down the U.S. surge by the end of the summer has been proven by conditions on the ground. Although challenges remain and progress in Afghanistan has been uneven in many areas, overall security has improved and Afghans are increasingly in the lead.

Question. What in your view should be the pace of reductions in U.S. forces during each of 2013 and 2014?

Answer. I do not have access to the relevant analysis to make a detailed assessment, but understand that President Obama will consider options provided by our senior military and civilian leaders. I support the President's direction, articulated in the West Point speech, for "steady" reductions. If confirmed, ensuring an effective transition in Afghanistan will be one of my top priorities.

Question. What in your view should be the size and missions of any residual U.S. force that may remain in Afghanistan after the end of 2014?

Answer. The key missions of any post-2014 military presence would focus: training, advising, and assisting ANSF; and targeted counterterrorism missions against al Qaeda and its affiliates, while also protecting U.S. forces and citizens. The size of the force will flow from missions assigned.

Question. In your view, is there a minimum number of troops that will be required to both accomplish the assigned mission and provide security for those executing that mission?

Answer. I have not yet reviewed the detailed mission planning and analysis to form a view regarding the appropriate number of U.S., coalition, and Afghan troops necessary to fulfill key missions including force protection. I do believe that sufficient forces should be provided to do the job assigned to them, while protecting themselves.

STATUS-OF-FORCES AGREEMENT FOR AFGHANISTAN

Question. As called for in the Enduring Strategic Partnership Agreement signed in May, the United States and Afghanistan are holding talks on a Bilateral Security Agreement, which will provide essential protections for any limited U.S. military presence in Afghanistan after 2014.

Do you agree that it is essential that any status of forces agreement for U.S. military forces in Afghanistan after 2014 provide immunity for U.S. troops from prosecution in Afghan courts?

Answer. Yes. I agree with the position made clear by the President during his joint press conference with President Karzai on January 11, 2013, that "it would not be possible for us to have any kind of U.S. troop presence [in Afghanistan] post-2014 without assurances that our men and women who are operating there are [not] in some way subject to the jurisdiction of another country."

AFGHANISTAN NATIONAL SECURITY FORCES

Question. What is your assessment of the progress in developing a professional and effective Afghanistan National Security Forces (ANSF)?

Answer. Based on the information available to me, I believe that the ANSF has and continues to make significant progress over the past few years. I understand that today the ANSF field three out of every four people in uniform defending Afghanistan, and that Afghans conduct the majority of operations backed up by the ISAF.

Question. What do you see as the main challenges to building the capacity of the ANSF and, if confirmed, what recommendations, if any, would you make for addressing those challenges?

Answer. A first challenge is to continue to improve the quality, readiness and performance of the 352,000 personnel in the ANSF. I understand that problems remain in leadership, retention, corruption, and the long personnel training needed to operate certain enablers such as logistics and intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR). A second challenge is for the ANSF to develop a greater capacity for maintaining equipment and integrating it into operations needed for logistics support, mobility, ISR, and operational planning. I am aware that the Department has an aggressive effort to close these enabler gaps. Third, and most broadly, the ANSF must continue building its self-confidence through operational success in taking the lead responsibility for securing transitioning areas and protecting the Afghan people. If confirmed, I will make it a priority to continue, and where necessary, adjust efforts to build ANSF capacity and capability.

Question. Do you support plans for building and sustaining the ANSF at 352,000 personnel?

Answer. Yes. I understand that our commanders consider the current ANSF force of 352,000 personnel necessary to complete the transition to Afghan lead security responsibility by the end of 2014, and to secure the country during the transition of power following the Afghan Presidential election in 2014. If confirmed, I will continue to review the numbers and capabilities of the ANSF to ensure that we are supporting a force structure that is sufficient to meet our goals, and is fiscally sustainable over the long term.

Question. Do you agree that any reductions in the ANSF from this 352,000 level should be based on security conditions in Afghanistan at the time those reductions would be expected to occur?

Answer. I agree that changes in ANSF force levels should take account of expected security conditions. At the same time, for planning and budgeting purposes, it is necessary to make projections about the future security environment and plans about future force levels. If confirmed, I will review these issues and propose adjustments over time, as appropriate.

INSIDER THREAT

Question. In 2012 there was a significant increase in the number of so-called "green-on-blue" incidents in which individuals in Afghan uniform attacked U.S. or coalition soldiers. The rising number of insider attacks has led U.S. and Afghan military leaders to order a number of precautions against such insider threats, including expanding Afghan counterintelligence efforts to identify possible Taliban infiltrators, increasing cultural sensitivity training, and expanding the "Guardian Angel" program to protect against the insider threat in meetings between coalition and Afghan forces.

What is your assessment of the insider threat and its impact on the military campaign in Afghanistan?

Answer. Insider attacks have the potential to damage the strategic trust necessary for our campaign to succeed. It is vital that we work with our Afghan and international partners to take every step possible to stop these attacks. I understand that U.S. and Afghan efforts have reduced attacks and are helping to reduce risks to coalition personnel. If confirmed, I will continue to pay close attention to countering this threat.

Question. What is your assessment of the measures that have been taken by ISAF and Afghan leaders to address the insider threat?

Answer. My understanding is that the measures put in place to date have helped to mitigate the threat from insider attacks, with the number of attacks now dropping from a peak in August 2012. Raised awareness of the threat and the implementation of robust force protection measures help protect our personnel, but the work by the ANSF to identify threats and prevent attacks through improved intelligence gathering and vetting of personnel remains critical. As we move into the "fighting season" we need to ensure these steps continue to be implemented fully and that ISAF continues to take the necessary steps to prevent these attacks. If confirmed, I will make this a key priority.

Question. Are there additional steps that you would recommend to address this threat, if confirmed?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue current efforts—and ask for a constant review of additional measures to further reduce the risk posed by insider threats.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact of these green-on-blue attacks on the level of trust between coalition and Afghan forces?

Answer. It is understandable that insider attacks have negatively impacted trust in some areas. However, after more than 11 years of fighting shoulder to shoulder and shared sacrifice, I believe that, in most areas, the relationship between the ANSF and the Coalition remains strong, particularly out in the field, where soldiers face a common enemy every day.

Question. In light of the spike in insider attacks, do you see a need to reconsider our plans for embedding small Security Force Assistance Teams of U.S. military personnel with Afghan military units as part of the transition to an Afghan security lead?

Answer. If confirmed, I will place a priority on mitigating insider attacks and will ensure that our commanders continually assess the impact of these attacks on the campaign, and consider whether changes to the Security Force Assistance Team model should be made, including any temporary adjustments as needed.

RECONCILIATION

Question. In your view, what should be the role of the United States in any reconciliation negotiations with the Afghan Taliban and other insurgent groups?

Answer. I agree with President Obama that Afghan-led reconciliation is the surest way to end violence and ensure lasting stability in Afghanistan and the region. Most counterinsurgencies end in some form of negotiation. The U.S. role should be to facilitate credible negotiations between the Afghan Government and the Taliban, and ensure that three necessary outcomes are met: that the Taliban and armed groups end violence, break ties with al Qaeda, and accept Afghanistan's constitution, including protections for all Afghan men and women.

Question. What additional steps, if any, should the United States be taking to help advance the reconciliation process?

Answer. The United States should continue to coordinate efforts closely with the Afghan Government.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of Afghanistan's neighbors, in particular Pakistan, in the reconciliation process?

Answer. Afghanistan's neighbors should support an Afghan-led process. Each will benefit from improved stability in Afghanistan or potentially suffer from continued violence. Pakistan and other neighbors should work forthrightly with Afghanistan to mitigate any suspicions or misunderstandings.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. Special Operations Forces depend on general purpose forces for many enabling capabilities, including ISR; logistics; and medical evacuation. Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command, has said "I have no doubt that special operations will be the last to leave Afghanistan" and has predicted that the requirement for special operations forces may increase as general purpose forces continue to be drawn down.

If confirmed, how would you ensure adequate enabling capabilities for Special Operations Forces as general purpose forces continue to draw down in Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I will seek to ensure that all U.S. forces in Afghanistan—including both Special Operations Forces and general purpose forces—are supported by sufficient enablers. In addition to providing clear guidance to commanders, I will seek the military advice of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, and ensure that the views of all relevant combatant commanders are taken into account.

Question. Last April, the United States and Afghanistan signed an MOU on the "Afghanization" of direct action counterterrorism missions in Afghanistan reflecting the shared intention of having Afghan security forces in the lead in the conduct of such operations with U.S. forces in a support role.

Why is it important for Afghan Special Operations Forces to be in the lead on night raids?

Answer. Having Afghans in the lead for "night operations" makes good sense for three reasons. First, this approach helps ensure that cultural and language differences do not result in misunderstandings that could escalate a situation. Second, having Afghans in the lead allows for improved real-time intelligence collection. Third, the Afghan Special Operations Forces are capable of fulfilling this mission and their doing so is a key part of the transition.

Question. General Allen and others have consistently praised the Village Stability Operations (VSO) and Afghan Local Police (ALP) programs—both U.S. Special Operations missions as critical elements of the counterinsurgency strategy in Afghanistan. Some Afghans have called for the removal of U.S. Special Operators from these operations.

What are your views on the value of these programs and do you believe they should be part of the long-term strategy in Afghanistan (i.e. post-2014)?

Answer. I understand that VSO and the ALP have contributed to the decline in Taliban control in many strategic areas throughout Afghanistan. If I am confirmed, I will make a priority to assess the potential future value of these programs.

U.S. STRATEGIC RELATIONSHIP WITH PAKISTAN

Question. What would you consider to be areas of shared strategic interest between the United States and Pakistan?

Answer. I believe the United States and Pakistan share common interests in disrupting, dismantling, and defeating al Qaeda, and in long-term regional stability, including a durable political settlement in Afghanistan and the safety and security of the Indian Ocean.

Question. In what areas do you see U.S. and Pakistani strategic interests diverging?

Answer. The United States and Pakistan often diverge over Pakistan's approach to the militant and terrorist networks that operate in Pakistan's territory and do not overtly threaten the Pakistani state. However, in my view, these networks threaten Pakistani stability, endanger the prospects for a settlement in Afghanistan, and undermine regional stability—so that in fact, while the relationship is challenging, I believe our long-term strategic interests are in alignment.

Question. If confirmed, what changes, if any, would you recommend for U.S. relations with Pakistan, particularly in terms of military-to-military relations?

Answer. U.S.-Pakistan military-to-military ties have been marked by periodic ups and downs. In my view, the military-military relationship should be underlined by a realistic, pragmatic approach to enhancing those areas of cooperation that are dictated by our common interests and to ensuring accountability for actions that detract from these interests. If confirmed, I will make accomplishing that goal a priority.

U.S. ASSISTANCE TO PAKISTAN

Question. Since 2001, the United States has provided significant military assistance to Pakistan. In addition, the United States has provided significant funds to reimburse Pakistan for the costs associated with military operations conducted by Pakistan along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border and other support provided in connection with Operation Enduring Freedom.

In your view, how effective has the assistance and other support that the United States has provided to Pakistan been in promoting U.S. interests?

Answer. As the President has said, more terrorists have been killed in Pakistan than anywhere else since September 11—and that would not be possible without Pakistani cooperation. Security assistance for Pakistan has helped Pakistan press this campaign against the militant and terrorist networks that threaten us all. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that our security assistance and other support to Pakistan both serves U.S. interests and is cost effective.

Question. Do you support conditioning U.S. assistance and other support to Pakistan on Pakistan's continued cooperation in areas of mutual security interest?

Answer. U.S. assistance to Pakistan should not be unconditional. At the same time, any conditions should be carefully examined to ensure they advance U.S. strategic interests.

AL QAEDA AND ASSOCIATED FORCES

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda and its associated forces to the U.S. Homeland, U.S. interests overseas, and Western interests more broadly?

Answer. I assess that the threat posed by al Qaeda to the U.S. Homeland has been significantly diminished over the past 4 years. At the same time, al Qaeda's remaining leadership in Pakistan and al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula remains of serious concern. Additionally, the Arab Spring has created new opportunities for al Qaeda affiliates in Syria and North Africa.

Question. In light of the recent events in Benghazi and Algeria, do you share the assessment that al Qaeda is on the brink of strategic defeat?

Answer. Our sustained military, intelligence, and diplomatic efforts over the last 10 years have brought us closer to the strategic defeat of core al Qaeda. There can be no doubt, however, that al Qaeda and associated forces remain potent, dangerous, and adaptable foes—as evidenced by its despicable actions in Benghazi and more recently in Algeria. If confirmed, I will continue to focus on defeating al Qaeda and its associated forces around the world.

ARAB SPRING

Question. The Arab Spring has changed—and will likely continue to change—the political dynamics in the Middle East and North Africa. These changes require the United States to adjust our military-to-military and defense civilian relations in this region. Some observers argue that the United States should reduce significantly our military-to-military contact in countries as a result of the ongoing changes and others advocate more robust and stepped-up contact with our partners in this region.

In your view, what should be the posture of the U.S. Government on military-to-military and defense civilian relations in the region?

Answer. DOD's military-to-military and defense civilian relations with our partners in the Middle East and North Africa have played a critical role in advancing U.S. strategic interests, which include: securing and protecting Israel, preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, defeating extremists, countering terrorist organizations, ensuring the free flow of commerce, and supporting operations in Afghanistan. Engagement with key partners' defense ministries and militaries, building partner capacity to meet common challenges, having a forward presence to enable operations and deter threats, and if and when necessary to conduct future contingencies, all require considerable effort by both DOD and the Department of State. During this time of change and uncertainty in the region, the Department should sustain military-to-military and defense civilian relations, while continuing to evaluate and recalibrate the nature and substance of our relationships to ensure they are consistent with U.S. values and advance U.S. vital national interests.

SYRIA

Question. The civil war in Syria continues and President Assad's commitment to continuing his regime's ongoing operations appear unwavering—despite broad international condemnation. To date, the United States has limited its support to opposition forces to non-lethal assistance to forces on the ground, as well as technical assistance to elements of the opposition working to build a cohesive political entity.

In your view, what is the proper role on the United States in this conflict?

Answer. I support the administration's position that Syrian President Bashar al-Asad has lost all legitimacy and must step aside to enable a political solution that ends the bloodshed, and meets the aspirations of the Syrian people. As President Obama has clearly stated, Asad must go. I also support the administration's approach to the ongoing crisis in Syria—working closely with allies, partners and multilateral institutions to achieve this goal through diplomatic and economic pressure on the Asad regime.

I agree with the administration's continued support of the Geneva Action Group's framework for a political solution, which was endorsed by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, the Arab League, and the U.N. General Assembly. If confirmed, I will continue to support Joint U.N.-Arab League Special Representative Brahimi's efforts to build international support for the Geneva framework and urge all parties in Syria to take steps toward its implementation, to help expedite an end to the suffering of the Syrian people.

Question. In your view, should the United States provide other kinds of support to opposition groups on the ground in Syria, including the provision of lethal support?

Answer. The U.S. Government should continue providing non-lethal assistance to the unarmed opposition, as well as humanitarian support to Syrians in need, both inside Syria and in neighboring countries. The United States should also continue to support the opposition in the diplomatic arena. This includes helping the newly established Syrian Opposition Council with its efforts to end the conflict and improve the future of the Syrian people. I also believe that, like ongoing diplomatic efforts, U.S. assistance efforts should continue to be coordinated with our allies, partners, and relevant regional groups to have the biggest impact possible.

I do not believe that providing lethal support to the armed opposition at this time will alleviate the horrible situation we see in Syria. The Syrian people are in great need during this difficult period, and the United States is helping to address those basic needs by providing medical assistance, humanitarian assistance, and political support on the international stage. We must continually explore additional ways to provide resources and help influence the right outcome.

Question. If confirmed, will you review Defense Department planning for options to ensure the security of chemical weapons in Syria, and recommend any additional planning, if needed?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department continues planning for a variety of contingencies in order to provide the President with options. This includes relevant planning for Syria and specifically, the security and elimination of chemical weapons in Syria. If confirmed, I will review these plans and, if necessary, I will direct additional planning on this and any other potential contingencies.

Question. In your view, what should be NATO's role with respect to Syria (i.e. should NATO consider a military intervention, the creation of a no-fly zone, or other military operations to protect civilians and support opposition forces)?

Answer. The United States is working with our allies to achieve a peaceful and orderly political transition in Syria and to end the bloodshed as quickly as possible. Our NATO allies are closely monitoring the situation in Syria, especially as the conflict touches on NATO's border in Turkey, and like us, are extremely concerned about the deteriorating humanitarian conditions on the ground. NATO's ultimate task is the protection and defense of NATO members. To that end, I support NATO's decision to augment Turkey's air and missile defense capabilities in order to defend the population and territory of Turkey and contribute to the de-escalation of the crisis along the alliance's border. This includes the recent deployment of NATO Patriot batteries to Turkey from the United States, Germany, and The Netherlands. I understand the administration has also been working with our international partners, including NATO allies, to ensure that the appropriate humanitarian assistance is reaching those Syrians in need, both inside Syria and in neighboring countries (Lebanon, Turkey, Jordan, and Iraq).

LIBYA

Question. On March 19, 2011, the multilateral military operation, named Operation Odyssey Dawn, was launched in Libya to enforce United Nations Security Council Resolution 1973. Following the initial operations against Libyan integrated air defense systems, this operation continued under NATO Command as Operation Unified Protector.

What are your views on the limited U.S. military mission in Libya—Operation Odyssey Dawn and Operation Unified Protector?

Answer. I believe the U.S. and NATO operations in Libya were a success. Operation Odyssey Dawn stopped Colonel Qadhafi's army from advancing on Benghazi, saved thousands of lives, and established the conditions for a no-fly-zone. Operation Unified Protector built on these accomplishments and created the time and space needed for the opposition to oppose, and ultimately overthrow, Qadhafi. Both operations had limited and clear objectives for the unique capabilities the U.S. military could provide, avoided U.S. boots-on-the-ground, integrated allies and partners, minimized collateral damage and civilian casualties to a historically unprecedented extent, and enjoyed the legitimacy of U.N. Security Council authorization. This was all achieved at a fraction of the cost of recent interventions in the Balkans, Iraq, or Afghanistan.

U.S. MARINE CORPS SUPPORT TO THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Question. The Accountability Review Board for Benghazi recently completed its report examining the facts and circumstances surrounding the September 11–12, 2012 attack against the U.S. temporary mission facility in Benghazi. Among its findings and conclusions, its report supported the "State Department's initiative to request additional marines and expand the Marine Security Guard (MSG) Program—as well as corresponding requirements for staffing and funding. The Board also recommends that the State Department and DOD identify additional flexible MSG structures and request further resources for the Department and DOD to provide more capabilities and capacities at higher risk posts." In the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, Congress authorized up to 1,000 additional marines in the MSG program to provide the additional end strength and resources necessary to support enhanced Marine Corps security at U.S. embassies, consulates, and other diplomatic facilities.

In your view, should the Marine Corps diplomatic security mission be expanded to include new roles beyond the protection of classified information and equipment, and if so, how many additional marines and what rank structure would be needed?

Answer. I am aware that the Departments of Defense and State are currently thoroughly examining the challenges and threats posed by global unrest to our overseas operations and are developing options to address these challenges. These options include consideration of expanding Marine Security Guard detachments, as well as adjustments to their roles and responsibilities. I have not reviewed the details of the options and, therefore, am unable to comment on the specific arrangements, numbers of personnel, or rank structure at this time. However, if confirmed, I will place personal emphasis on this issue and work closely with the Secretary of State and Congress to ensure we are doing all we can to help protect our diplomats and diplomatic facilities overseas.

Question. In your view, should the current arrangements between the Department of State and U.S. Marine Corps be modified?

Answer. I cannot recommend any changes at this time. If confirmed, I will review the on-going work and recommendations that are being developed by the Departments of Defense and State that is examining the roles, responsibilities, and arrangements of the U.S. Marine Security Guards and the Department of State.

STRATEGIC COMMUNICATIONS AND INFORMATION OPERATIONS

Question. Over the past decade, DOD has funded an increasing number of military information support operations (formerly known as psychological operations) and influence programs. The GAO reports that DOD has "spent hundreds of millions of dollars each year" to support its information operations outreach activities. Many of these programs are in support of operations in Afghanistan, but Military Information Support Teams (MIST) from U.S. Special Operations Command also deploy to U.S. embassies in countries of particular interest around the globe to bolster the efforts of the Department of State and the U.S. Agency for International Development. Further, the geographic combatant commands are increasingly moving into this operational space.

What are your views on DOD's military information support operations and influence programs?

Answer. I believe DOD must be able to influence and inform foreign audiences in environments susceptible to the messages of U.S. adversaries. MISTs are trained in developing culturally appropriate messages to counter hostile information and propaganda, as well as assisting with building the capacity of partner nations to conduct these activities themselves. I understand that DOD influence activities, including those conducted by MISTs, are coordinated closely with the embassies in the areas where they operate, both inside and outside of areas of conflict, and at times can support common efforts of other agencies. I understand the Department has taken significant steps to address congressional concerns related to policy oversight, budgeting, and effectiveness. If confirmed, I intend to continue to be responsive to Congress on this matter, as well as to continue the Department's efforts to coordinate information activities across the interagency.

Question. In 2005, al Qaeda's Ayman al-Zawahiri declared that "We are in a battle, and more than half of it is taking place in the battlefield of the media." In 2010, a non-partisan study highlighted the lack of a U.S. strategy to counter radical ideologies that foment violence (e.g. Islamism or Salafist-Jihadism).

In your view, what is the appropriate role of DOD, if any, in developing and implementing a strategy to counter radical ideologies, and how does that role complement or conflict with the efforts of the Intelligence Community and the State Department?

Answer. Countering violent extremist ideology is a whole-of-government endeavor. I believe the Defense Department's focus should be on using its assets to meet military objectives and providing support to other U.S. Government agencies as requested. I understand the Department's activities in this area are closely coordinated with the Intelligence Community and the State Department.

Question. Defense Secretary Gates launched the Minerva Program in 2009 to develop deeper social, cultural and behavioral expertise for policy and strategy purposes.

Do you support this program and its goals?

Answer. I understand both Secretary Gates and Secretary Panetta supported the MINERVA initiative, which provides the Department with a means to focus research on complex social, cultural and political dynamics related to our strategic interests around the world. If confirmed, I would seek to learn more about the program and assess its continued value in supporting policy and strategy development.

SOMALIA

Question. Somalia is a training and operations hub for al Shabab and other violent extremists; pirates operating in the Indian Ocean and Arabian Peninsula; illicit traffickers of weapons, humans, and drugs; and remnants of the al Qaeda East Africa cell that was responsible for the destruction of our embassies in Dar es Salaam and Nairobi in August 1998.

What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Shabab to the U.S. Homeland and U.S. and Western interests in the East African region?

Answer. My understanding is that successful operations by the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) have reduced Al-Shabaab's freedom of movement in south and central Somalia, but al Shabaab remains a threat to the U.S. Homeland and to U.S. and Western interests in the Horn of Africa. Al Shabaab leaders have claimed affiliation with al Qaeda since 2007 and formally merged with the group in February 2012. Al Shabaab has demonstrated a desire and capability to conduct terrorist acts throughout the Horn of Africa, and it presents a threat to the homeland through links into Somali diaspora communities in the United States and Europe. Al Shabaab continues to repress the Somali people and remains the greatest threat to the new Somali Government. As the new Somali Government stands up, I believe that the United States must remain focused on the risks posed by al Shabaab.

Question. Given the role of the various U.S. Government Departments and Agencies in the Horn of Africa, what changes, if any, would you make to DOD's current role in the Horn of Africa?

Answer. With the establishment of the new government in Somalia and U.S. recognition of that government earlier this month, the Department will continue to play a role in Somalia's security sector development in order to help secure the gains made by AMISOM. Most of the U.S. Government's traditional security cooperation tools have been restricted from use in Somalia for some time, but I understand that the United States will explore possible changes in the coming year, as the United States moves to normalize relations with Mogadishu. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the Department's approach to Somalia is developed as part of a coordinated U.S. national security policy toward the Horn of Africa, and to determine how the Department can and should best support our foreign policy in this region.

Question. In your view, what role, if any, should the United States play in the building of a Somali national army?

Answer. The United States can play a guiding and mentoring role in the development of Somalia's security sector. It is in the U.S. interest to ensure that Somalia's new government has a competent and professional military to provide security to its citizens and play a constructive role in the region.

AL QAEDA IN THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

Question. A number of senior U.S. officials have indicated the most significant threat to the U.S. Homeland currently emanates from Yemen.

What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula to the United States?

Answer. I am very concerned about the threat that al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) poses to the Homeland. AQAP has attempted at least three attacks on the United States since December 2009, and in my view fully intends to attack again. AQAP has shown some very sophisticated and innovative techniques, such as the development of concealed explosive devices and printer cartridge bombs.

AQAP is also attempting to recruit and radicalize would-be terrorists in the West through its extensive media outreach.

Question. What is your assessment of the current U.S. strategy to counter al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, specifically in Yemen?

Answer. I support the administration's whole-of-government strategy to: support the political transition, marshal international economic and humanitarian assistance, and build Yemen's counter-terrorism capabilities through training and assistance. The U.S. strategy to disrupt, dismantle, and defeat AQAP is a collaborative U.S.-Yemeni effort. By closely monitoring and acting on current threat streams while building key Yemeni capabilities, I believe the United States has shown the ability to counter near-term threats.

We have made a number of important gains against AQAP over the past couple of years. I understand that the Department continues to collaborate extensively with Yemeni forces on operational matters, which have helped remove several key AQAP operatives from the battlefield. Efforts to counter AQAP's narrative have helped to delegitimize the group and discourage its efforts to recruit new operatives. The U.S. Government's work on countering threat financing has made it more difficult for AQAP to receive funds and to support other parts of al Qaeda. U.S. efforts—many of them executed by the Department—to train, advise, and equip Yemeni forces are driving AQAP from territory it previously held and are enabling precise operations to capture and kill AQAP leaders.

NORTH AFRICA

Question. In December 2012, Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta stated that "Al Qaeda has long sought to operate in areas beyond the reach of effective security and governance, [and] we know that al Qaeda, its affiliates and adherents are looking to establish a foothold in other countries in the Middle East, and north and west Africa, including al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, and the Boko Haram group in Nigeria."

What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda and its associated forces in North Africa? Do they pose a threat to the United States homeland and/or U.S. interests abroad?

Answer. Al Qaeda in the lands of the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) poses an increasing threat to U.S. interests. My understanding is that at this time, there is no credible evidence that AQIM is a direct threat to the U.S. Homeland. However, as seen in the recent hostage situation in Algeria, AQIM and its associates do threaten U.S. persons and interests abroad, as well as our European allies.

Question. In January 2013, the French Armed Forces began conducting operations against violent extremist groups in Mali.

In your view, what should be the role, if any, of the United States in supporting the French operation?

Answer. The United States shares the French goal of denying AQIM and other terrorists a safe haven in the region. I agree with the administration's decision to support the French mission without deploying U.S. combat forces on the ground. My understanding is that this support includes assisting the movement of French and African forces, providing intelligence and planning support, and assisting in the training and preparation of African forces.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of the United States in working with United Nation's Security Council authorized forces from the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) in Mali?

Answer. The African-led International Support Mission in Mali (AFISMA), approved by a Chapter VII U.N. Security Council mandate to restore Malian sovereignty and counter violent extremists, is very important for U.S. interests and for regional stability. I support the U.S. position to expedite the training, equipping and deployment of West African troops as part of AFISMA to ensure a successful, African-led mission.

COLLABORATION BETWEEN THE DEFENSE DEPARTMENT AND THE INTELLIGENCE COMMUNITY

Question. Since September 11, 2001, collaboration—both analytical and operational—between the Defense Department and the Intelligence Community has grown increasingly close. On one hand, seamless collaboration is a vital component of effective and rapid responses to non-traditional threats, and bringing together the strengths of the full spectrum of defense and intelligence missions creates opportunities for solutions to complex problems. On the other hand, such collaboration—without effective management and oversight—risks blurring the missions of agencies and individuals that have cultivated distinct strengths or creating redundant lines of effort.

What are your views regarding the appropriate scope of collaboration between DOD and the Intelligence Community?

Answer. Collaboration between DOD and the Intelligence Community (IC) is an essential element for supporting our national security objectives. Eight of the 17 IC components are embedded in the Department which constitutes a substantial portion of the Nation's intelligence capabilities and resources. It is my understanding that the Department depends on capabilities provided by the IC to support weapons systems acquisition and to enable military operations, while the IC depends on capabilities provided by the Department to support a wide range of critical intelligence-related and special activities. Collaboration has also been central to the ability to dismantle and eventually defeat al Qaeda and to counter the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD). In 2007, the Secretary of Defense and the Director of National Intelligence (DNI) established the position of the Director of Defense Intelligence (DDI) within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, and dual-hatted the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USD(I)) as the DDI. The DNI and the USD(I) have since pursued National Intelligence Program-Military Intelligence Program budget integration leading to more effectiveness and efficiencies from vital intelligence resources.

Question. In your view, are there aspects of the current relationship between the Department and the Intelligence Community that should be re-examined or modified?

Answer. I do not know the issue well enough to make recommendations at the time. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department consistently assesses its processes and procedures for evaluating how it interacts with the IC and look for opportunities to build on the existing relationship.

NATO ALLIANCE

Question. The NATO alliance continues to be central to our coalition operations in Afghanistan and elsewhere, even as many NATO members have significantly reduced their national defense budgets in response to economic and fiscal pressures.

Do you agree that U.S. participation in the NATO Alliance contributes to advancing U.S. security interests?

Answer. Yes. the transatlantic relationship is of critical importance to U.S. security interests. NATO has been the cornerstone of European security and an integral part of U.S. foreign policy for more than 60 years, and NATO has continued to be critically important to U.S. security interests in recent years. In Afghanistan, there have been nearly 40,000 allied and partner forces alongside our own. In Libya, NATO allies came together with Arab and other partners to prevent a humanitarian catastrophe, and to support the Libyan people. Over years in the Balkans, NATO has been vital to stability and has moved us closer to the goal of a Europe whole, free, and at peace. NATO must remain the central Alliance in U.S. global strategy and has proven an effective partner.

Question. What are the greatest opportunities and challenges that you foresee for NATO in meeting its strategic objectives over the next 5 years?

Answer. In my view, the top NATO-related challenge is the mounting fiscal pressures facing all allies and the resulting reduction in alliance military capabilities as allies cut spending. However, these fiscal difficulties present an opportunity to transform NATO into an Alliance that is more efficient, with a new way of doing business that emphasizes innovation, flexibility, and enhanced cooperation and interoperability with allies and partners. The Alliance must also continue to adapt to meet the new threats of the 21st century: cyber attacks, terrorism, proliferation of WMD, and regional conflicts.

Question. In light of the reductions in national defense spending by some NATO members, are you concerned that the alliance will lack critical military capabilities? If so, what steps, if any, would you recommend be taken to address potential shortfalls in alliance capabilities?

Answer. Yes. I am concerned that the Alliance is in danger of losing critical military capabilities if something does not change. The past decade-plus of fighting in Afghanistan has left the alliance with worn equipment and depleted defense budgets. The Alliance should commit to halting defense cuts, complete the capability projects it has already initiated, and reinvest the funds it will save from the end of combat operations in Afghanistan into sustaining and building prioritized capabilities. If confirmed, I will work to ensure NATO's commitments to critical capabilities.

Question. The concept of defense cooperation between NATO members was emphasized at the NATO summit in Chicago in May 2012.

What areas or projects do you recommend that NATO nations cooperate in to improve NATO alliance capabilities?

Answer. I support the roadmap for NATO that was agreed to by Presidents and Prime Ministers from across the alliance at the Chicago Summit last May. It describes and prioritizes NATO's required capabilities, encourages greater pooling of resources, and focuses on improving education, training, and technology to preserve the interoperability resulting from years of joint operations in Afghanistan.

Question. Under what conditions, if any, would you envision further enlargement of NATO in the coming years?

Answer. If confirmed, I would work closely with my colleagues in the administration and in close consultation with Congress and our allies to determine which countries and within what timeframe NATO would undertake further enlargement. Each NATO aspirant should be judged on its individual merits and progress in implementing political, economic, and military reforms.

Question. In your view, is there a continuing requirement for U.S. nuclear weapons to be deployed in NATO countries?

Answer. I agree with the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review that the presence of U.S. nuclear weapons, along with NATO's unique nuclear sharing arrangements, contribute to alliance cohesion and provide reassurance to allies and partners who feel exposed to regional threats. Any changes should only be taken after a thorough review within, and a decision by, the alliance. I also support NATO's Deterrence and Defense Posture Review that the President and fellow Heads of State and Government agreed to at the May 2012 Chicago NATO Summit. The review committed the alliance to ensuring that NATO's nuclear deterrent remains safe, secure, and effective. The review also stated that the alliance is prepared to consider further reductions in non-strategic nuclear weapons assigned to the alliance, in the context of reciprocal steps by Russia. If confirmed, I will continue to consult with our allies on any such negotiations.

Question. What is your understanding of the relationship between Israel and Turkey as it relates to NATO? Are you concerned about the breakdown in the security cooperation relationship between Turkey and Israel and do you have any ideas as to how to mend it?

Answer. I remain concerned about the deterioration of the relationship between Turkey and Israel, both of which are important partners for the United States and are critical to stability in their region. These relationships are broader than this dispute. Turkey is a critical NATO Ally, and we will continue to exercise, plan, and work with Turkey in that context. Israel is a key security partner of the United States. If confirmed, I would work to ensure that the United States continues, in diplomatic channels and in defense contacts, to encourage both Turkey and Israel to take the steps necessary to resolve their dispute and work together to address common regional challenges.

KOSOVO

Question. Approximately 760 U.S. troops remain in the Balkans as part of the Kosovo Force (KFOR) that first deployed to Kosovo in 1999 and today is comprised of over 5,500 personnel from 30 countries. Spikes in violence in 2011 required the deployment of the NATO Operational Reserve Force battalion of approximately 600 soldiers to bolster KFOR and maintain a secure environment. Progress is required in both the military and political realms before further troop reductions can be made.

What major lines of effort do you think are required to further reduce or eliminate U.S. and NATO presence in Kosovo?

Answer. I recognize that the United States has a long-established commitment, together with our NATO allies, to a responsible, conditions-based drawdown of forces in Kosovo. I understand DOD continues to work with allies and NATO military authorities in monitoring and assessing conditions and pursuing carefully developed plans for the eventual drawdown. Ultimately, a political solution is needed to normalize relations between Kosovo and Serbia and thereby establish lasting security in Kosovo and the region. If confirmed, I will support this effort, both through Department-led engagements, and also by supporting our interagency and international partners to achieve this goal. I understand that a key part of the KFOR military plan, executed by NATO, is to enable a transition of security responsibilities to Kosovo. The United States plays a critical role in this effort. If confirmed, I will ensure that DOD provides support for this goal consistent with decisions among the United States and our allies.

Question. In your view, is the European Union (EU) playing a significant enough role in Kosovo?

Answer. The EU is playing a critical role by facilitating high-level dialogue between Kosovo and Serbia. This dialogue is broadly supported by the United States and our allies as an opportunity to normalize relations between the two countries. The EU Rule of Law Mission (EULEX) plays an important role in Kosovo, working to strengthen legal institutions there. The United States will continue its support for a robust role by EULEX to fulfill its mandate.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS FORCES

Question. The previous two Quadrennial Defense Reviews (QDR) have mandated significant growth in our special operations forces and enablers that directly support their operations.

What is your assessment of the QDR mandate regarding the mix of responsibilities assigned to general purpose and Special Operations Forces, particularly as it relates to security force assistance and building partner military capabilities?

Answer. I agree with the premise that adversaries will continue to seek alternative methods to counter U.S. influence and interests, and that for the foreseeable future the most likely contingencies the United States will face will involve irregular threats. Therefore, I fully support the 2010 QDR's strategic shift toward expanding general purpose forces' capabilities and capacity for these contingencies. The overall flexibility of our Armed Forces has been greatly improved by investing in key enablers within our conventional force such as: strengthening and expanding capabilities for security force assistance; increasing the availability of rotary-wing assets; expanding manned and unmanned aircraft systems for ISR; improving counter-improvised explosive device capabilities; and enhancing linguistic, cultural, counterinsurgency, and stability operations competency and capacity.

Question. Do you believe that our general purpose forces need to become more like Special Operations Forces in mission areas that are critical to countering violent extremists?

Answer. Countering violent extremism requires employing all of the capabilities of the Department—mixed and matched appropriately—depending on the mission requirements. The experience of the last 10 years is clear that general purpose units and special forces both contribute to countering violent extremists.

Question. Are there certain mission areas that should be reserved for Special Operations Forces only?

Answer. Special Operations Forces (SOF) are a uniquely specialized component of our U.S. Armed Forces that are trained, organized, and equipped to conduct counterterrorism, unconventional warfare, direct action, special reconnaissance, foreign internal defense, and counter-proliferation of WMD, and other designated operation, often in areas under enemy control or in politically sensitive environments. In such operations and environments, SOF provide unique and essential capabilities.

Question. Do you believe that we should further increase the number of special operations personnel? If so, why, and by how much?

Answer. I understand U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) is on track to meet the growth mandated by the last two QDRs. If confirmed, I would work with Commander, SOCOM, to better understand the command's missions, pressures, and growth plans.

Question. Special Operations Forces rely heavily on Overseas Contingency Operations (OCO) funds.

With the drawdowns in Iraq and Afghanistan, what OCO funding for special operations needs to be moved into the base budget to preserve enduring capabilities in your opinion?

Answer. I believe we must continue to provide SOCOM with base budget resources sufficient to preserve long-term readiness of a global Special Operations Force. I understand that in the fiscal year 2013 budget the Department moved roughly $1 billion from OCO to base funding and the intent is to continue this transition, although the current fiscal and strategic environment make that challenging.

Question. In your view, can the size of Special Operations Forces be increased, while also maintaining the rigorous recruiting and training standards for special operators?

Answer. I understand and agree with the concept that Special Operations Forces (SOF) cannot be mass produced, and I fully support SOCOM's efforts to maintain the quality of SOF operators and support personnel during this current era of SOF growth. Experience has shown that SOF manpower growth of 3 to 5 percent annually can be sustained and will not dilute the force or outpace the required training and support structure. This is the pace SOCOM has sustained to great effect over the past several years and is on track to sustain this year.

Question. In recent years, Special Operations Forces have taken on an expanded role in a number of areas important to countering violent extremist organizations, including those related to information and military intelligence operations. Some have advocated significant changes to SOCOM's title 10 missions to make them better reflect the activities Special Operations Forces are carrying out around the world.

Question. What current missions, if any, do you believe can and should be divested by SOCOM, and why?

Answer. At this time, I do not advocate significant changes to SOCOM's title 10 missions. If confirmed, I would work with Commander, SOCOM, to better understand the command's missions, operations, and pressures and if I see that changes are needed I will offer proposals.

Question. Are there any additional missions that you believe SOCOM should assume, and, if so, what are they and why do you advocate adding them?

Answer. I do not currently foresee any additional missions that SOCOM should assume. If confirmed, I would work with Commander, SOCOM, to review any additional missions that may be proposed.

Question. What can be done to ensure that indirect special operations missions with medium- and long-term impact, such as foreign internal defense, receive as much emphasis as direct action, and that they receive appropriate funding?

Answer. The activities of Special Operations Forces are quite varied, from high-risk strikes and counterterrorist raids conducted in minutes, to training and advising foreign counterparts conducted over months and years. Both require highly skilled operators, trained, organized, and equipped for the task. I believe that each of these activities is a highly valued capability for the U.S. Government that should be maintained and, if confirmed, I will ensure that the Department is adequately prepared for both.

UNIFIED COMMAND PLAN CHANGES

Question. It has been reported that Admiral McRaven, Commander of SOCOM, is seeking changes to the Unified Command Plan (UCP) and other authorities that he believes would allow SOCOM to better support the requirements of the Theater Special Operations Commands (TSOCs). Reportedly, such changes would give the Commander of SOCOM combatant command authority over the TSOCs—including responsibilities for resourcing—and provide for more rapid deployment of special operations forces to and between geographic combatant commands without the requirement for approval by the Secretary of Defense in every case. Operational control of deployed Special Operations Forces would reportedly remain with the respective geographic combatant commander. Some have expressed concern that such changes could raise problems related to civilian control of the military, infringe upon the traditional authorities of the geographic combatant commanders, and make it more difficult for Ambassadors and geographic combatant commanders to know what military personnel are coming into their areas of responsibility and what they are doing while they are there.

Please provide your assessment of whether such UCP changes are appropriate and can be made without conflicting with civilian control of the military, infringing upon authorities provided to the geographic combatant commanders, or raising concerns with the State Department.

Answer. It is my understanding that DOD is considering several initiatives to enhance the organization, training, equipping, and employment of Special Operations Forces to meet future global security challenges, including potential changes to the UCP and other guidance that establish command responsibilities and relationships. If confirmed, I look forward to seeing the recommendations from the Joint Chiefs of Staff and senior civilian leadership and will ensure these proposed changes preserve civilian control of the military principles, establish clear and appropriate command authorities, and support strong interagency relationships.

COMBATING TERRORISM

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda and associated forces to the U.S. Homeland, U.S. interests overseas, and western interests more broadly? Which affiliates and associated forces are of most concern?

Answer. I assess that the threat posed by al Qaeda to the U.S. Homeland has been significantly diminished over the past 4 years. At the same time, al Qaeda's remaining leadership in Pakistan and al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula remain of greatest concern. Additionally, the Arab Spring has created new opportunities for al Qaeda affiliates in Syria and North Africa.

What is your understanding of the Department's role in the U.S. strategy to combat terrorism?

Answer. My understanding is that the U.S. Government is engaged in a multi-departmental, multi-national effort, and that key activities that the Department undertakes to support this strategy include: training, advising, and assisting partner security forces; supporting intelligence collection on al Qaeda; conducting information operations against al Qaeda; and, when appropriate, capturing or killing al Qaeda operatives. I understand that the Department also works to help enable our intelligence and law enforcement partners, both in the United States and overseas, in their efforts to counter this threat.

Question. Are there steps the Department should take to better coordinate its efforts to combat terrorism with those of other Federal departments and agencies?

Answer. Based on my current knowledge, it appears that the Department is properly coordinating its counterterrorism efforts with the rest of the U.S. Government. I understand that the U.S. military, Intelligence Community, and law enforcement agencies regularly collaborate on operations, and that departments and agencies constantly share intelligence, with little of the "stovepiping" that we saw before September 11. I will look at this closely if confirmed.

INTELLIGENCE SUPPORT FOR INDIRECT ACTIVITIES

Question. Some observers contend that the national intelligence agencies focus their assistance to the Defense Department on special operators engaged in direct action operations. As a consequence, it is alleged, general purpose forces and Special Operations Forces engaged in indirect activities, including foreign internal defense and population protection, receive less intelligence support.

Do you believe this is true? If so, and if confirmed, how would you ensure that general purpose forces and special operations forces engaged in indirect activities receive adequate intelligence support?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Intelligence Community and DOD continue to expand intelligence support for a full range of military operations—direct and indirect—not only in Afghanistan, but across multiple areas of responsibility. The Department has invested in and employed innovative ISR capabilities increasing its intelligence and operations support to interagency and foreign partners in their efforts against emerging threats. DOD and the Intelligence Community have assisted our partners in Afghanistan, East Africa, the Arabian Peninsula, Colombia, and the Phillipines. I think that U.S. military operations around the world over the past few years have demonstrated that our general purpose forces are the beneficiaries of consistent, timely support from across the Intelligence Community. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that intelligence capabilities are properly aligned across the force for all missions.

SECTION 1208 OPERATIONS

Question. Section 1208 of the Ronald Reagan NDAA for Fiscal Year 2005 (Public Law 108–375), as amended by subsequent bills, authorizes the provision of support (including training, funding, and equipment) to regular forces, irregular forces, and individuals supporting or facilitating military operations by U.S. Special Operations Forces to combat terrorism.

What is your assessment of this authority?

Answer. I understand that the section 1208 authority has been a very effective tool for U.S. Special Operations Forces (SOF) conducting counterterrorism operations to build effective security partners. Combatant commanders strongly support section 1208.

LORD'S RESISTANCE ARMY

Question. The President notified Congress in October 2011 of Operation Observant Compass (OOC), an operation to support the efforts of Ugandan and other regional militaries to remove Joseph Kony and other senior leaders of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) from the battlefield in Central Africa, and of his decision to send approximately 100 U.S. Special Operations Forces personnel to Central Africa to help regional partners achieve these goals. Despite pressure by the Ugandan People's Defense Forces and efforts by U.S. Special Operations personnel to support them, elements of the LRA—including Joseph Kony—continue to operate and commit atrocities against civilian populations in the Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and South Sudan. Congress recently passed and the President signed the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, which reiterated that the ongoing efforts to remove or apprehend Joseph Kony and his top commanders from the battlefield and end the atrocities perpetuated by his LRA should continue as appropriate to achieve the goals of the operation.

Do you support OOC?

Answer. Yes. My understanding is that Department support to regional counter-LRA efforts helps to advance regional security cooperation and security sector reform more broadly. If confirmed, I would seek to continue the U.S. commitment to deepen our security partnerships with African countries and regional organizations by expanding efforts to build African military capabilities through low-cost, small-footprint operations. At the same time, I would work with the Department of State and other U.S. agencies and departments to seek to strengthen the capacity of civilian bodies and institutions to improve the continent's ability to provide security and respond to emerging conflicts. I would also regularly assess and review Department contributions to this mission to ensure the deployment of U.S. personnel is not open-ended.

Question. What is your understanding of the objectives of OOC?

Answer. U.S. Special Operations Forces under OOC seek to enhance the capacity of local forces to end the threat posed by the LRA. It is my understanding that U.S. military advisors are working with these forces to strengthen information-sharing and synchronization, enhance their operational planning, and increase overall effectiveness. While OOC is important in the effort to counter the LRA threat, there is not a purely military solution to this problem. If confirmed, I would support the current U.S. policy of pursuing a comprehensive, multi-faceted strategy to help the governments and people of this region in their efforts to end the threat posed by the LRA and to address the impacts of the LRA's atrocities. The U.S. strategy to counter the LRA outlines four pillars for continuing support: increasing the protection of civilians; apprehending or removing Joseph Kony and senior commanders from the battlefield; promoting the defection, disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration of remaining LRA fighters; and increasing humanitarian access and providing continued relief to affected communities.

MASS ATROCITIES PREVENTION

Question. President Obama identified the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide as a core U.S. national security interest, as well as a core moral interest, in August 2011 under Presidential Study Directive 10. What are your views on the role the United States plays in the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide?

Answer. As President Obama noted in his speech at the Holocaust Museum last April, preventing and responding to atrocities is a critical mission and a core national security interest of the United States. As the President has made clear, we must look at a wide range of tools before military intervention. I support this view: we should make every effort to prevent crises from escalating, through every policy lever at our disposal, including diplomacy, assistance, and financial measures. I understand that the Atrocities Prevention Board has strengthened our efforts by developing more tools with which to work; I support these vital efforts Question. What are your views on the adequacy of the Department's tools and doctrine for contributing to this role?

Answer. I understand that the Department has played an active role in the work of the Atrocities Prevention Board, working closely with other agencies to develop a range of tools that enhance the USG's ability to prevent and respond to atrocities. I also understand that DOD has strengthened its own capabilities, including by developing formal doctrine on mass atrocity response operations, for the first time, and incorporating atrocity prevention and response into policy and plans. If confirmed, I would continue these efforts.

U.S. FORCE POSTURE IN THE ASIA-PACIFIC REGION

Question. The Defense Department's January 2012 strategic guidance, "Sustaining U.S. Global Leadership: Priorities for the 21st Century", states that "while the U.S. military will continue to contribute to security globally, we will of necessity rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific region." Likewise, the 2010 report of the QDR states that the United States needs to "sustain and strengthen our Asia-Pacific alliances and partnerships to advance mutual security interests and ensure sustainable peace and security in the region," and that, to accomplish this, DOD "will augment and adapt our forward presence" in the Asia-Pacific region.

Do you feel DOD has adequate resources to implement the new January 2012 strategic guidance?

Answer. Congress passed and the President signed into law the BCA of 2011. The President insisted that the resulting defense cuts be driven by strategy and U.S. defense needs in the coming decade. I understand that the fiscal year 2013 DOD budget was shaped by the strategic guidance and reflects key mission and capability priorities emerging from the strategic review. If confirmed, I would continue to refine the focus of the Department's spending in future budget cycles and keep it in line with the President's strategic guidance. believe that the Department is facing hard but manageable cuts. The strategy is executable with the resource levels currently detailed in the BCA, but the potentially severe cuts stemming from sequestration would seriously threaten the Department's ability to implement the strategic guidance.

Question. What do you see as the U.S. security priorities in the Asia-Pacific region?

Answer. The maintenance of peace, stability, the free flow of commerce, and of U.S. influence in this dynamic region will depend in part on an underlying balance of military capability and presence. I believe that as a Pacific nation, the United States should, with its network of allies and partners, maintain an enduring defense presence in the Asia-Pacific region as a tangible demonstration of U.S. commitment to Asia's continued security and economic development.

Question. What does the "rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific region" mean to you in terms of force structure, capabilities, and funding?

Answer. The rebalance is broader than just military policies and programs; it is about harnessing every element of our national power to sustain a regional order rooted in economic openness, peaceful resolution to disputes, and democratic governance and political freedom, In terms of our force structure the rebalance places a renewed emphasis on air and naval forces while sustaining ground force presence. While rebalancing, it will also be important for the Department to develop new capabilities and investments to respond to changes in the security environment and technical advancements required to maintain an edge, our freedom of action, and ability to project power in the Asia-Pacific region. I believe that the rebalancing to Asia-Pacific is vital for U.S. future interests, but it can be done smartly, using air and sea and geographically distributed ground forces, without sacrificing the needed U.S. presence in the Middle East.

Question. Do you believe that it is a "necessity" to rebalance the U.S. military toward the Asia-Pacific region? If so, why?

Answer. I share the President's view that future U.S. economic and security interests will be closely tied to the Asia-Pacific. I have reviewed the Defense Strategic Guidance released last year, and agree that the emerging economic and political dynamism in the Asia-Pacific will require strong and continuous U.S. commitment.

Question. Why, if at all, do you believe it is important for the U.S. military to maintain and even augment its forward presence in the Asia-Pacific region, and what are the advantages to having a forward presence?

Answer. A robust U.S. military presence in the Asia-Pacific has underwritten peace and prosperity in the region for the past 60 years. The Department should be able to assure regional allies and partners, deter threats to regional stability, and prevail in conflicts if necessary. If confirmed, I would support the administration's effort to work towards a posture that is more geographically distributed—for example, the movement of forces to Guam and Australia; operationally resilient, with a focus on our sea based assets; and politically sustainable—meaning we must work with our partners and allies to address their concerns about U.S. presence, such as in Okinawa.

Question. What is your assessment of the risks and benefits that are likely to result from this shift?

Answer. This shift in U.S. posture is meant to continue supporting peace and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific region. U.S. forces should be present to effectively assure our allies and deter potential adversaries. By emphasizing the Asia-Pacific while also focusing on the Middle East, rebalancing will necessarily accept risk in other areas given the resource-constrained environment. I believe the risks associated with this rebalance are manageable. The potentially severe cuts stemming from sequestration, however, would seriously threaten the Department's ability to implement the strategic guidance, including the rebalance.

Question. What changes, if any, in structure, equipment, and training do you believe will be necessary to meet the requirements for general purpose ground forces in an Asia-Pacific strategy?

Answer. My understanding is that our military leadership is already working hard to ensure fielded capabilities enable our military personnel to think, train, and, if necessary, fight to succeed in this theater. The Department is already devoting significant effort to understanding how to operate in—or gain access to—those areas where our adversaries may try to deny us access and is developing the required operational concepts to manage that challenge. We will also need to build military-to-military ties and other relationships, as well as language and cultural expertise, to operate effectively in the Asia-Pacific region. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Services, and Office of the Secretary of Defense leadership to assess any additional changes in structure, equipment, and training.

CHINA

Question. How would you characterize the current U.S.-China relationship?

Answer. I would describe the relationship as simultaneously possessing elements of cooperation and competition. The U.S.-China relationship, of which the defense component is only one part, is one of the most complex and important bilateral relationships in the world. The United States and China are working together to build a cooperative partnership based on practical cooperation in addressing shared regional and global challenges—a commitment President Obama and President Hu made in January 2011. At the same time, China is rapidly modernizing its military and increasingly asserting claims to territory in the East China Sea and the South China Sea.

Question. From your perspective, what effect is China's expanding economy and growing military having on the region at-large and how does that growth influence the U.S. security posture in the Asia-Pacific region?

Answer. China's expanding economy and growing military are developments the United States, allies, partners, and all other nations in the region must monitor carefully. On the one hand, China's growth and potential create an opportunity to cooperate where our interests and those of China converge. At the same time, China's rapid rise and the relative lack of transparency surrounding its intentions can be a source of anxiety and concern in the region. If confirmed, I will evaluate the impact of these developments—as well as the impact of other security trends—on requirements for the U.S. defense posture in the region.

Question. What do you believe are the objectives of China's military modernization program?

Answer. As I understand it, China is pursuing a long-term, comprehensive military modernization program designed to improve the capacity of its armed forces to fight and win high-intensity regional military operations of short duration. I understand that Taiwan contingencies remain the principal focus of much of this modernization, but there are growing indications that China is developing capabilities for missions that go beyond China's immediate territorial concerns, such as its counter-piracy operations off the Horn of Africa and noncombatant evacuation operations from Libya.

Question. How do you believe the United States should respond to China's military modernization program?

Answer. I believe the United States should continue to monitor developments in China's military modernization while encouraging Beijing to be more transparent about its military and security strategies, policies and programs. The U.S. response to China's military modernization should be flexible and supported by the continued evolution of our presence and force posture in the Asia-Pacific region, the strengthening of our regional alliances and partnerships, the maintenance of our global presence and access, and the modernization of our own capabilities in such areas as countering efforts to deny us access and freedom of action.

Question. U.S.-China military-to-military dialogue has been strained over the past several years and efforts to establish and maintain mutually beneficial military relations has been hampered by China's propensity for postponing or canceling military engagements in an apparent effort to influence U.S. actions.

What is your view of the relative importance of sustained military-to-military relations with China?

Answer. I believe there is value in sustained—and substantive—military dialogue with China as a way to improve mutual understanding and reduce the risk that miscommunication and misperception could result in miscalculation. If confirmed, I would look for ways to strengthen the U.S.-China military-to-military relationship consistent with our interests and our values.

Question. Do you believe that we should make any changes in the quality or quantity of our military relations with China? If so, what changes would you suggest and, given Chinese resistance to military-to-military dialogue, how would you implement them?

Answer. If confirmed, I will seek ways to improve the U.S.-China military-to-military relationship, in terms of the quality and the quantity of exchanges between the Armed Forces of our countries. I would support continuing to pursue exchanges with the Chinese armed forces at all levels, and I would look to engage in a wide range of areas where we might find common ground to encourage China to act responsibly on the regional and global scene.

NORTH KOREA

Question. What is your assessment of the current security situation on the Korean peninsula?

Answer. North Korea's provocative behavior, large conventional military, proliferation activities, ballistic missile program, and nuclear program continue to present a serious threat to the United States, our regional allies, and the international community. The opaque nature of the North Korean system, coupled with an uncertain political transition, adds to my concerns. North Korea's December missile launch, which was a violation of United Nations Security Council Resolutions, provided yet another example of North Korea's pattern of irresponsible behavior. If confirmed, I will work with our allies and other key partners in the region and internationally to ensure that we can deter and, if necessary, defeat North Korean aggression.

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed to the United States and its allies by North Korea's ballistic missile and WMD capabilities and the export of those capabilities?

Answer. I am concerned about North Korea's WMD and ballistic missile programs because they present an immediate threat to our allies and partners as well as a growing threat to the United States. North Korea's December launch—using ballistic missile technology—underscores our concerns about North Korea's continued pursuit of a long-range missile program. The United States will continue carefully monitoring, and impede, North Korea's WMD and missile development programs and related proliferation activities. If confirmed, I would ensure that the Department continues working closely with other parts of the U.S. Government to address North Korea's missile and WMD programs, take necessary steps to defend the United States and our allies, and enhance engagement with our allies to ensure that we can deter and, if necessary, defeat North Korean aggression.

Question. In your view, what additional steps should the United States take to defend against the North Korean ballistic missile threat and dissuade North Korea from its continued pursuit of ballistic missile technology and to stop or slow North Korean proliferation missile and weapons technology to Syria, Iran, and others?

Answer. The United States should continue to work to prevent North Korea's proliferation of weapons-related technology by advancing international nonproliferation norms and further tightening sanctions aimed at impeding development of North Korea's ballistic missile and nuclear programs. This includes cooperating with partner nations to inspect and interdict vessels and aircraft suspected of carrying illicit cargo. The United States should also seek to enhance bilateral and trilateral missile defense cooperation with our Republic of Korea (ROK) and Japanese allies, particularly in the area of information sharing. If confirmed, I would continue to work to strengthen the international consensus against proliferation; to invest in programs like the Proliferation Security Initiative, which bolsters the will and capacity of partner nations to interdict these dangerous shipments; to increase WMD-related information sharing with international partners; to take necessary steps to defend the United States and our allies; and to ensure that our ballistic missile defenses are able to defeat any North Korean attack.

U.S. CONTRIBUTIONS TO INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING MISSIONS

Question. In testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on July 29, 2009, the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations (U.N.) stated that the United States "is willing to consider directly contributing more military observers, military staff officers, civilian police, and other civilian personnel—including more women I should note—to U.N. peacekeeping operations." General Dempsey has said the United States "should consider opportunities for U.S. personnel to contribute to U.N. peacekeeping missions" and that "experience shows that even a small number of trained and experienced American servicemembers can have a significant, positive effect on U.N. operations." In your view, should the United States increase the number of personnel it contributes in the form of staff positions and military observers to U.N. peacekeeping missions and other international peace operations?

Answer. I support in principle additional contributions of U.S. military personnel to key positions in U.N. peacekeeping operations where the mission is a strategic priority for the Department and the United States and where our servicemembers can add significant value to the mission effectiveness and efficiencies. I understand that, although we still provide military observers to U.N. peacekeeping missions, the Department has shifted its contributions almost exclusively to staff officer positions so as to maximize the returns on our investment.

Question. In your view, what are the advantages and disadvantages of contributing additional military personnel to U.N. operations in the form of staff positions and military observer positions?

Answer. The success of U.N. peacekeeping operations is important to the United States. I believe that the United States should continue to provide military personnel to U.N. peacekeeping operations, especially for key staff positions that help shape the direction and success of the mission. Such support must be practicable and weighed against the potential costs and competing demands for military commitments. If confirmed, I will carefully evaluate the costs of requested U.N. support against the potential positive impacts and U.S. interests.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE COUNTERNARCOTICS ACTIVITIES

Question. DOD serves as the single lead agency for the detection and monitoring of aerial and maritime foreign shipments of drugs flowing toward the United States. On an annual basis, DOD's counternarcotics (CN) program expends approximately $1.5 billion to support the Department's CN operations, including building the capacity of U.S. Federal, State, and local law enforcement agencies, and certain foreign governments, and providing intelligence support on CN-related matters and a variety of other unique enabling capabilities.

In your view, what is the appropriate role of DOD in counterdrug efforts?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Department plays an important role in U.S. counterdrug efforts in support of the National Security Strategy, the National Drug Control Strategy, and the Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime. The Department supports and enables U.S. agencies and foreign partners to be more effective in executing their respective counternarcotics responsibilities. In the Western Hemisphere, the allocation of DOD capabilities in support of U.S. law enforcement interdiction efforts has helped remove hundreds of tons of cocaine and deny billions in illicit revenues to transnational criminal organizations. I believe this support role is a sensible and effective indirect approach.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of the United States in countering the flow of narcotics to nations other than the United States?

Answer. Drug trafficking is by far the world's most lucrative illicit activity and therefore is often used as a source of revenue by terrorists, insurgents, and other actors threatening our national security. In my view, the consequences of narcotics flows beyond U.S. borders—for example, the role of drug trafficking in Afghanistan and the surrounding region is of particular concern to the Department. If confirmed, I look forward to working with Congress, the Office of National Drug Control Policy, other agencies in the U.S. Government, and military commanders to address the flow of illegal narcotics as it affects U.S. national interests.

NATIONAL STRATEGY TO COMBAT TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME

Question. The Director of National Intelligence recently described transnational organized crime as "an abiding threat to U.S. economic and national security interests," and stated that "rising drug violence and corruption are undermining stability and the rule of law in some countries." In July 2011, the President released his Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime: Addressing Converging Threats to National Security. One of the priority action areas designated in the strategy is "enhancing DOD support to U.S. law enforcement".

In your view, what role should DOD play in combating transnational organized crime and in training and equipping partner security forces that have been tasked with combating it?

Answer. By law, the Department is the lead Federal agency for detection and monitoring of the aerial and maritime transit of illegal drugs into the United States. In the Western Hemisphere, DOD coordinates the efforts of the U.S. interagency and regional partners in the detection and monitoring of illicit aerial and maritime drug shipments towards the United States. It is my understanding that beyond that, the Department's role is to contribute unique capabilities in support of law enforcement, other U.S. Government departments and agencies, and international partners. That support takes multiple forms: military intelligence support to law enforcement; military-to-military capacity building; broader capacity building support to foreign partner security services (including police forces); and counter threat finance support. believe the Department should continue to focus on delivering unique capabilities in support of other departments and agencies that have the lead for combating transnational organized crime.

COUNTER THREAT FINANCE

Question. DOD and the Intelligence Community (IC) have begun investing more resources in identifying and tracking the flow of money associated with terrorist networks and illicit trafficking, but the opportunities for tracking and degrading illicit financing flows are not yet matched by the effort and resources devoted to them. Identifying and disrupting key individuals, entities, and facilitation routes enabling the flow of money that supports terrorism, production of IEDs, narco-trafficking, proliferation, and other significant national security threats could have an outsized impact on confronting these threats.

What are your views on the role of DOD in counter threat finance activities?

Answer. Our Nation's adversaries, from drug traffickers to terrorists or insurgents, rely upon the flow of money to enable their activities. All available U.S. Government tools should be employed to track and disrupt the finances that support these groups, and the Department can bring unique tools to bear. My understanding is that the Department is not the lead U.S. agency in counter threat finance, but does work with other departments and agencies, and with partner nations, to fight our adversaries' ability to access and use global financial networks. For example, the Department has worked with the Intelligence Community and other interagency partners to identify and disrupt our adversaries' finances and remove key sources of insurgent funding in Afghanistan. I believe the Department should continue to work with law enforcement agencies to ensure military support is targeted, tailored, and in line with defense priorities.

Question. Are there opportunities to replicate or improve upon the network-disruption efforts of groups like the Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization or the Afghanistan Threat Finance Cell in impacting other facilitation networks?

Answer. My understanding is that the Afghanistan Threat Finance Cell has been successful at disrupting illicit networks in Afghanistan through broad interagency cooperation. The Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization's quick reaction and innovation has saved countless American lives. I believe that the capabilities involved in network disruption are worth institutionalizing into the Department. If confirmed, I will work with the Department's senior leadership and the interagency on this worthy effort.

Question. In your view, how should DOD coordinate and interface with other key agencies, including the Department of Treasury and the Intelligence Community, in conducting counter threat finance activities?

Answer. My understanding is that the Department works closely with the National Intelligence Manager for Threat Finance as well as the Department of Treasury's Assistant Secretary for Intelligence and Analysis. The Department also supports other U.S. Government departments and agencies and with partner nations to deny and disrupt adversaries' ability to use global licit and illicit financial networks to affect U.S. interests negatively. I believe the Department should continue to support law enforcement agencies, the Department of the Treasury, and the Intelligence Community with unique DOD capabilities, including planning, intelligence analysis and tools, and the integration of intelligence into operations.

CENTRAL AMERICA AND MEXICO

Question. During a March 2012 Senate Armed Services Committee hearing, the Commanders of U.S. Northern Command and U.S. Southern Command discussed the increasingly dangerous region along the northern and southern borders of Mexico and the devastating impact transnational criminal organizations are having on the people and security of southern Mexico, Guatemala, Belize, Honduras, and El Salvador. The United States has increased its assistance in this region, but—to date—DOD has had only a small role.

What are your views on the threats posed by transnational criminal organizations in this region?

Answer. It is clear that transnational and domestic criminal organizations and gangs undermine the security of citizens in many parts of the Western Hemisphere. The influence of criminal elements has brought an increase in violence as well as an increase in narcotics and other illicit trafficking. The root causes of violent crime and insecurity are also influenced by endemic poverty and lack of economic opportunity, weak government institutions, and widespread corruption and impunity. Central America has become one of the most violent regions in the world, and this can be largely attributed to the influence of these elements. Criminal influences threaten regional stability and the fundamental security of an area that lies very close to the United States. I believe the United States has a clear interest in helping partner nations strengthen their security institutions consistent with U.S. values.

Question. What is your assessment of DOD's role and current activities in Mexico and Central America?

Answer. I have not had a chance to fully assess these issues, but I am aware that the Department is building defense relations with Mexico based on mutual interest. I am also aware that the Department has a wide range of activities and initiatives with partner nations in Central America, consistent with our values, shared interests and our partner's capacity. My understanding is that that engagements in both Mexico and Central America are broadly focused on defense planning and institutional reform, human rights training, counterdrug support and humanitarian assistance activities. I believe these roles and activities are appropriate to support our policies and strategies in the region, which focus on efforts to strengthen law enforcement, governance and rule of law institutions, while improving economic and social conditions that can contribute to insecurity.

Question. What changes, if any, would you propose to DOD's current role and activities in this region?

Answer. If confirmed, I would need to conduct a thorough review before being able to propose specific changes to the Department's roles and activities in this region. In general terms, however, I am supportive of leveraging the longstanding military-to-military relationships within the region to ensure our partner nations' defense institutions are capable and remain responsive to civil authorities, while being respectful of human rights.

INTERAGENCY COLLABORATION

Question. The collaboration between U.S. Special Operations Forces, general purpose forces, and other U.S. Government departments and agencies has played a significant role in the success of counterinsurgency and counterterrorism operations in recent years. However, much of this collaboration has been ad hoc in nature.

What do you believe are the most important lessons learned from the collaborative interagency efforts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere?

Answer. The importance of unity of effort and action remains one of the most critical lessons the Nation has learned from its experiences with counterinsurgency, counterterrorism, and stability operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. I believe that effective interagency collaboration can greatly improve the U.S. Government's preparedness to operate effectively in all phases of conflict. If confirmed, I will prioritize efforts to ensure interagency collaboration is as robust and effective as possible.

Question. How do you believe these efforts can be improved?

Answer. Interagency collaboration can always be improved. Ensuring that the U.S. military plans and trains with its civilian counterparts in other U.S. departments and agencies, and vice-versa, is one way to increase our unity of effort in the field. We also need a strong interagency planning process to ensure effective use of expertise from across the U.S. Government that recognizes each department's and agency's unique role and capabilities. I believe that robust civilian capabilities and resourcing are critical to achieving national security objectives and will be vital to the success of future operations.

Question. How can the lessons learned in recent years be captured in military doctrine and adopted as "best practices" for future contingency operations?

Answer. My understanding is that the Department has a variety of efforts devoted to capturing and disseminating best practices within the Department and to the interagency. The importance of institutionalizing lessons learned from the past 10 years of war was highlighted in the 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance. If confirmed I will continue this emphasis.

INTELLIGENCE REFORM AND TERRORISM PREVENTION ACT OF 2004

Question. The Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004 (IRTPA), among other actions, realigned the responsibilities for budgeting for and management of intelligence organizations between the Secretary of Defense and the head of the Intelligence Community, the Director of National Intelligence (DNI).

What do you believe is the role of DOD in intelligence under IRTPA?

Answer. The role of DOD, including the defense intelligence components, is clearly outlined in law. Under titles 10 and 50 of the U.S.C., the Secretary of Defense has broad responsibility for the intelligence and intelligence-related activities conducted by the Department's components. In addition, under title 50, the Secretary has several specific statutory responsibilities for elements of the Intelligence Community that are part of DOD, including the Defense Intelligence Agency, the National Security Agency, the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency, and the National Reconnaissance Office. Consistent with the DNI's statutory responsibilities, the Secretary of Defense is responsible for the continued operation of those elements as effective organizations within the Department for the conduct of their missions in order to satisfy the requirements of the Department and the Intelligence Community.

The Secretary, in consultation with the DNI, is also responsible for ensuring that the budgets of the Intelligence Community elements that are within the Department are sufficient to satisfy the overall intelligence needs of the Chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff, the combatant commanders, and other departments and agencies. The Secretary is also responsible for the timely response of intelligence community elements within the Department to the needs of operational military forces. The Department strengthened its management of defense intelligence in 2002 by designating the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USD(I)) as lead for its intelligence reform efforts and Principal Staff assistant and advisor to the Secretary of Defense and Deputy Secretary of Defense regarding intelligence, counterintelligence (CI), and security matters.

As a former member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and the President's Intelligence Advisory Board, I have seen first-hand how the Intelligence Community and all its elements have become better integrated and cooperative and, if confirmed as Secretary of Defense, I look forward to furthering that cooperation.

Question. Do you believe that the IRTPA strikes the correct balance between the duties and responsibilities of the Secretary and the DNI?

Answer. Yes. I believe the duties and responsibilities of the Secretary and the DNI are well balanced under the IRTPA. The IRTPA appropriately provided the DNI strong authority to oversee and direct the implementation of the National Intelligence Program. As such, the DNI is responsible for establishing requirements and developing budgets as well as setting objectives and priorities for collection, analysis, production, and dissemination of national intelligence. The responsibility for execution of DOD intelligence activities remains with the Secretary. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence also holds the position of the Director of Defense Intelligence in the Office of the DNI; the position was established to enhance integration, collaboration, and information sharing. If confirmed as Secretary of Defense, I will reinforce this strong and effective relationship with the DNI.

Question. What changes in the IRTPA, if any, would you recommend that Congress consider?

Answer. As of now, I would not recommend any changes to the IRTPA. If confirmed, I would address any proposed changes should the need arise.

STRATEGIC REVIEWS

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the DOD processes for analysis, decisionmaking, and reporting results for each of the following strategic reviews:

The QDR (section 118 of title 10, United States Code);

Answer. The QDR is statutorily required, and sets a long-term course for the Department by assessing the opportunities and challenges that the Nation faces in the emerging global security environment. It provides an important opportunity to clearly and concisely articulate the national defense strategy and identify priorities for defense policy and force planning. Given the new defense strategy and the fiscal challenges the Nation is facing, I believe the upcoming QDR will be critical in setting the future path of the Department.

Question. The National Military Strategy (section 153 of title 10, United States Code);

Answer. The National Military Strategy outlines the ways and means for our military to ensure national security based on guidance from the National Security Strategy and the QDR. Section 153 of title 10 of the U.S. Code requires the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to assist the President and Secretary of Defense in providing strategic direction for the Armed Forces. Because the Chairman prepares the National Military Strategy in consultation with the combatant commanders and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I believe that it is the best military advice available for the Secretary of Defense. The Chairman also provides an annual risk assessment based upon the most current National Military Strategy.

Question. Global Defense Posture Review (section 2687a of title 10, United States Code);

Answer. My understanding is that the Department continuously reviews U.S. Global Defense Posture based in part on combatant command submissions of annual Theater Posture Plans. The Department has an executive-level oversight body, the Global Posture Executive Council (GPEC), composed of senior leaders from across the Department and including the Department of State. This body provides analysis and recommendations to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense. The Department submits an annual report to Congress that provides an overview of global defense posture strategy and the status of key overseas posture realignment actions. My assessment, at this time, is that the GPEC offers an appropriate forum for comprehensive analysis of key overseas posture issues.

Question. The Quadrennial Roles and Missions (QRM) Review (section 118b of title 10, United States Code).

Answer. The QRM review is a statutorily required review of the roles and missions of the Armed Forces and the Department's core competencies and capabilities to perform and support these missions. My understanding is that the QRM is required every 4 years, most recently in 2012, and accordingly will be due again in 2016 submitted with or before the President's budget submission for the next fiscal year. I believe that the next few years will be very dynamic—both in world events and how our military can and should respond—and that the next QRM review will be very important to capturing the consequences of those changes.

Question. If confirmed, what recommendations would you make, if any, to change title 10, U.S.C., and to improve DOD's processes for analysis, policy formulation, and decisionmaking relative to each review above?

Answer. Based on my current understanding, at this time I would not request any changes to title 10, U.S.C. If confirmed and after reviewing Department processes relating to each review, I will make recommendations to Congress and the White House accordingly.

Question. The QDR must examine the National Security Strategy as most recently updated by the President's January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance (DSG). Noteworthy, the DSG states that the "tide of war is receding".

Do you agree with that assessment and, if so, how might that influence your analysis and recommendations with regard to strategic priorities in the QDR?

Answer. I agree that, with the drawdown of the war in Iraq and transition of security responsibilities in Afghanistan, our future security challenges will be defined less by the wars of the past decade and more by emerging complex threats. The Department remains committed to security in Afghanistan and Iraq, and our counterterrorism mission will remain a priority for the foreseeable future, but the Department needs to begin focusing on the mix of skills and capabilities and new technologies that will be needed in the future. The QDR should, therefore, examine the current and future security environment, to include changes since the 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance was released, and adjust strategic priorities as appropriate.

Question. Section 118 in title 10, U.S.C. also requires the QDR to identify the budget plan that would be required to provide sufficient resources to execute successfully the full range of missions called for in that national defense strategy at a low-to-moderate level of risk, and any additional resources (beyond those programmed in the current Future Years Defense Program) required to achieve such a level of risk. The law also requires the QDR to make recommendations that are not constrained to comply with and are fully independent of the budget submitted to Congress by the President.

If confirmed, how would you propose to structure the Department's QDR analysis and recommendations to address these two requirements?

Answer. It would be my intent, if confirmed, to oversee a QDR process that begins with an assessment of U.S. interests, opportunities, and challenges, and concludes with the development of a defense program and budget designed to meet the resulting defense objectives we set at a low-to-moderate level of risk. If confirmed, I would intend to provide my honest appraisal of the resources required for defense.

Question. In your view, is there analytical and/or practical value in a defense strategy that is unconstrained by or independent of the current budget request or fiscal environment?

Answer. I think we must be aware of the fiscal environment when determining our defense strategy just as the strategy is informed by other important environmental factors, such as trends in military technology. That strategy must ensure that the U.S. military is be capable of meeting crucial national security priorities across the range of current and future potential threats.

TACTICAL FIGHTER PROGRAMS

Question. Perhaps the largest modernization effort that we will face over the next several years is the F–35 Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) program to modernize our tactical aviation forces with fifth generation tactical aircraft equipped with stealth technology.

Based on current and projected threats, what are your views on the requirements for and timing of these programs?

Answer. Dominance in the air is essential to the success of our forces. I understand that the F–35, which will replace several older generation aircraft in the Air Force, Navy, and Marine Corps, is intended to provide that dominance well into the future. I have not looked at the projected threats in detail; however I believe that other nations, notably China and Russia, have programs to build advanced aircraft that will challenge our current capabilities in the coming years. My view is that we cannot let any other nation achieve parity with the United States in the ability to control the air.

Question. What is your assessment of whether the restructuring of the JSF program that we have seen over the past several years will be sufficient to avoid having to make major adjustments in ether cost or schedule in the future?

Answer. I know that the Joint Strike Fighter is the Department's largest acquisition program and that it has experienced significant cost increases and schedule slips. I understand that the Department has already taken steps to tighten the contract terms for the F–35 and restructured the program in 2012 to reduce concurrency, the risk of being in production before development is finished. I have not had the opportunity to review this program or its restructuring in detail. If confirmed, I will make it a high priority to examine the health of this program to determine if it is on a sound footing and ensure the aircraft are delivered with the capability we need and a cost we can afford.

NAVY SHIPBUILDING

Question. Today's Navy is at its smallest size in decades and could decline further without additional shipbuilding efforts. Over the past several years, successive Chiefs of Naval Operations (CNOs) have concluded that the Navy requires a fleet of at least 313 ships to perform its mission. Despite this conclusion, the President's budget request for fiscal year 2013 proposed the decommissioning of nine ships—two dock landing ships and seven cruisers designed to last another 10 to 15 years, in order to address defense budget constraints and growing operating costs. Congress rejected the proposal noting the Navy's initial investment of $11.6 billion in the nine ships and the fact that cutting them creates unnecessary and unaffordable future shipbuilding requirements.

What are your views regarding the CNO's conclusions about the appropriate size and composition of the fleet, and the adequacy of the Navy's current and projected plans to deliver that inventory of ships?

Answer. A strong and capable Navy is essential to meet our Nation's strategic requirements across the spectrum of operational demands. Therefore, the Navy needs a broad set of capabilities among the mix of ships in its inventory. I understand the Chief of Naval Operations is currently analyzing the Navy shipbuilding goal and will present his analysis shortly. If confirmed, I will review these recommendations for the Navy's current shipbuilding plan and work with the Navy to ensure we have the right size, mix, and usage of our naval forces to meet our strategic goals.

Question. In your opinion, how important is the requirement for a 313 ship fleet on the ability of the Navy to support the national military strategy?

Answer. I understand that the Navy's presently stated requirement is for a 313 ship fleet, but I do not yet know all the details of the mix and capabilities of our present and future fleet. I do know the United States requires a capable Navy that is robust enough to execute the full range of missions called upon by our combatant commanders in support of the National Security Strategy and Defense Strategic Guidance—including operating persistently across the globe, securing freedom of access, responding to crises, and projecting power into denied areas. If confirmed, I will work with the Navy and Congress to ensure naval forces are appropriately structured to meet our national defense needs.

Question. Do you believe the Navy can meet its goals for the size of the fleet in the current budget climate?

Answer. I believe the President's budget request for fiscal year 2013 allowed the Navy to meet its current plan for the size of the fleet. However, the budget environment that we all are dealing with has introduced a good deal of uncertainty for the future of each of the armed services. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of Naval Operations to understand the impact of budget levels on the size of the fleet and how we work within the budget constraints to still meet mission requirements.

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

Question. DOD has repeatedly reaffirmed that the United States is committed to maintaining a fleet of 11 nuclear powered aircraft carriers despite budget pressures, and maintaining 2 carriers on patrol in the Middle East. Yet, recent press accounts cite concerns by the Navy to maintain the carrier deployment schedule due to declining budgets. The Chief of Naval Operations recently stated "Right now, we are committed to providing two carrier strike groups in the Arabian Gulf through March. We've been doing this since 2010, and we're committed to that, as I said, through this March. We need to take a look at that, and we will be, with the Joint Staff and the Services to see if we need to continue this."

What is your view of the impact of maintaining two carriers in the Arabian Gulf on U.S. strategic goals in the region?

Answer. The Carrier Strike Group is a premier instrument supporting the warfighter and demonstrating U.S. resolve and commitment to allies around the world. In recent years the Navy has stepped up to meet increased demands to support operations in the Middle East, as well as to counter other tensions in the region. This support has been critical to our goals in the region. If confirmed, I will work with the Navy to ensure that we allocate our resources to ensure the level of presence necessary to meet our Nation's world-wide strategic goals.

Question. What are your views about the requirement to maintain a fleet of 11 aircraft carriers?

Answer. I understand that the Department's recent strategic reviews indicate that an 11-carrier force is the correct size to support our current strategy and provide sufficient carrier strike groups to meet overseas presence requirements. However, I also understand that increased combatant commander demands for carrier strike groups over the past 3 years have stressed the carrier force. Carriers are an essential tool given the strategic focus on the Asia-Pacific, an inherently maritime theater, and the Middle East, an increasingly maritime theater, and the requirement to conduct operations in multiple regions simultaneously. If confirmed, I will work with the Navy to ensure that we resource a sustainable level of presence that continues to support the strategic goals.

FUTURE ROLE OF THE ARMY

Question. In a speech at West Point in February 2011, former Secretary of Defense Robert Gates argued that it is unlikely that the Nation will commit large land forces to future conflicts, and that the Army must "confront the reality that the most plausible, high-end scenarios for the U.S. military [will be] primarily naval and air engagements." Accordingly, the Army will find it difficult to justify the number, size, and cost of its heavy forces. The Defense Strategic Guidance, announced in January 2012, echoed that prediction and indicated that ground forces would not be sized to conduct large scale long-term stabilization operations.

Do you agree with Secretary Gates assertion that the commitment of land forces, on the scale of Iraq or Afghanistan, is unlikely in the future? Why or why not?

Answer. We will continue to need the best Army in the world. But the best Army does not mean the largest. We must have the Army be appropriately sized for the contingencies we deem likely, and it also must be trained and modernized. Our forces must be able to conduct operations across the spectrum of conflict and adapt to the security environment as it changes. However, given that we must make choices in today's fiscal and security environment, I agree that large-scale, long-term stabilization operations is an area where we can take risk in the future.

Question. Do you agree that high-end military operations will primarily be naval and air engagements such that the Army will have difficulty justifying the size, structure, and cost of its heavy formations?

Answer. The Nation needs a robust balance of capabilities in each of the warfighting domains—air, sea, and ground. These capabilities can and should be complementary of one another—capabilities in one domain need not come at the expense of those in another. Furthermore, I know from my experience that war is an inherently human endeavor. As long as this nation faces adversaries with large, capable ground forces, the United States will need an Army with diverse and flexible capabilities, which include heavy forces.

Question. General Raymond Odierno, Chief of Staff of the Army, has stated that the Army will continue to be an indispensable part of the joint force and that there is a synergy that is gained of all the services in order for the military to meet the Nation's needs. He has also said the Army provides more than Brigade Combat Teams—the Army is the largest contributor to Special Operations Forces and it provides a broad range of essential services to combatant commanders to include ISR; air and missile defense; logistical support; and signal communication support.

In your view, what are the most important considerations or criteria for aligning the Army's size, structure, and cost with strategy and resources?

Answer. The most important considerations are our national security requirements. Our security environment and strategy requires the Army to have the appropriate size and structure to be able to support steady-state operations to shape the environment and deter potential adversaries, while simultaneously supporting contingency operations to defeat any potential adversary should deterrence fail.

Question. If confirmed, what actions, if any, would you propose to properly align the Army's size and structure with the requirements of security strategies and the likely availability of resources?

Answer. The Department should align the Army's size and structure to the strategy in the same way it would align those of any other component of the joint force: based on appropriate security scenarios, examining the demands of the missions that are most relevant to that component and then determining how best to provide the capabilities required to accomplish those missions. During this period of budget austerity, some tradeoffs across the force may be necessary. If confirmed, I will work closely with military and civilian leaders to balance maintaining the skills needed to meet our most pressing national security demands within the limits of acceptable risk.

ARMY FORCE STRUCTURE

Question. The Defense Strategic Guidance of January 2012 calls for the reduction of Army end strength and force structure over the next 5 years to 490,000 personnel and 8 fewer combat brigades. Army analysis underway and decisions still pending could add a third maneuver battalion to the modular armored and infantry brigades requiring a further reduction in the total number of Active component brigades to support such a redistribution of personnel.

If confirmed, what guidance would you give the Army regarding priorities for planning, decisions, and execution with respect to the identification and deactivation of the planned eight and anticipated additional brigade deactivations?

Answer. If confirmed, I would provide the same guidance I would give to any Service, which would be to figure out what is in the best interest of the Nation's security as expressed in the National Security Strategy and Defense Strategic Guidance. The Army, and the other Services, must use a holistic approach to ensure our forces are organized, manned, trained, equipped, and stationed to best incorporate the lessons of the last decade, while remaining ready for the kinds of challenges we will face in the future.

Question. If confirmed, will you prioritize for deactivation those brigades based overseas before those based in the United States?

Answer. If confirmed, I would prioritize the selection of brigades for deactivation based on how best to meet the Nation's global strategy and objectives while minimizing negative impact on Army families and communities and ensuring we maintain our treaty obligations and commitment to our allies. I cannot say now whether that results in prioritizing overseas units versus U.S.-based units, but, if confirmed, I will look comprehensively at this issue. I recognize that any force structure reduction will affect Army communities, and I expect that the Army and DOD will work with those communities to help minimize the impact.

Question. In your view, can the Army's Active component end strength be drawn down below the announced and planned reduction to 490,000? If so, what in your view would be the impact on strategic risk, if any, and, in your view would that strategic risk be acceptable or unacceptable?

Answer. Independent of size, we must maintain the best Army in the world. If fiscal pressures compel us to consider further reductions of any Service, I plan to study tradeoffs and fully understand the risks to our strategy before recommending further cuts. But the size of the force should be driven by mission requirements.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the current size and structure of the Army's Reserve component? If confirmed, what size or force structure changes, if any, would you propose for either the Army Reserve or the Army National Guard?

Answer. The Active and Reserve components of the Army, as parts of the entire force, must be sized and shaped to support our strategy. One of the foundations of the All-Volunteer Force is the Army National Guard with the critical capabilities it provides to the Governors and States, in addition to the tremendous support that it provides for Federal missions at home and abroad. Another foundation is the Army Reserve, which has been a key partner with the Active Army and the Army National Guard throughout many diverse missions. However, as the needs of the Nation change, I expect that the capabilities and capacities resident in the Army National Guard and the Army Reserve may also have to change. If confirmed, I will review the results of ongoing studies on recommended composition and size before I propose future changes to Reserve component end strength.

ARMY MODERNIZATION

Question. According to a recent study done for the Secretary of the Army by former Assistant Secretary of the Army Gilbert Decker and retired Army General Louis Wagner, the Army has sunk $3.3 billion to $3.8 billion annually since 2004 into weapons programs that have been cancelled. The report states that, "The Army lacks a credible, quantitative model and process for determining realistic, achievable requirements for modernization and recapitalization given reduced budgets." The Army has implemented many of the recommendations made in the report.

What is your assessment of the Army's modernization record?

Answer. I understand that the Army has terminated several large acquisition programs in the past, which gave rise to the study commissioned by Secretary McHugh in 2010. These program terminations were caused by a variety of factors, to include the Army's reliance on immature technologies as solutions to very complex and evolving military requirements. These factors significantly impacted program cost and delivery schedule. I understand that the Army has undertaken efforts to address the root causes of these prior terminations in current and future acquisition programs. If confirmed, I will emphasize the need for sound, cost-informed planning regarding the Army's acquisition efforts and work with the Army to continue to address these root causes.

Question. What actions, if any, would you take to ensure that the Army achieves a genuinely stable modernization strategy and program?

Answer. If confirmed, I will closely monitor and oversee the Army's acquisition efforts to ensure that stable and affordable modernization strategies are adopted and implemented. To this end, I will emphasize the need for Army acquisition programs that incorporate sound and realistic development strategies, affordable and technically feasible requirements, and—to the fullest extent practicable—adequate and stable resources. I understand that these are necessary ingredients for success in acquisition programs.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment, if any, of the Army's capabilities portfolio review process and its current modernization priorities and investment strategy?

Answer. It would be premature for me to currently assess the Army's specific processes for reviewing military requirements or setting modernization priorities. I understand that the Capability Portfolio Reviews are designed to provide a comprehensive examination of Army requirements in an effort to validate their operational value and inform the programming and budgeting processes. This holistic approach makes sense to me, but if confirmed, I will work with Army leadership to review their processes.

Question. What actions, if any, would you take to sustain the momentum of these reviews in stabilizing the Army's modernization strategy and priorities?

Answer. If confirmed, I would encourage and support the Army to take any necessary steps to properly define its equipment modernization requirements and priorities. I would closely monitor the outcome of these processes and support the Army's implementation of a successful modernization strategy.

Question. What is your assessment of the Army's implementation of the recommendations of the Decker-Wagner Acquisition Report?

Answer. I understand that the actions to implement the approved recommendations in the 2010 report commissioned by Secretary McHugh are either complete or underway. If confirmed, I will review the Army's implementation of the recommendations and work to ensure that they are reflected in ongoing and future modernization efforts.

UNFUNDED PRIORITIES

Question. What is your position on allowing the Service Chiefs to respond to Congress with a list of critical unfunded priorities not included in the President's budget request?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to continue the Department's current policy whereby the Service Chiefs may communicate their unfunded requirements directly to Congress, once they have informed me of those requirements.

BALLISTIC MISSILE DEFENSE

Question. In September 2009, President Obama announced that he had accepted the unanimous recommendation of the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to pursue a Phased Adaptive Approach (PAA) to missile defense in Europe. This approach is intended to defend all of Europe against existing and emerging threats from Iranian missiles, starting in 2011 and increasing in capability with each of its four phases. Phase 4 of the European PAA is intended to provide a capability to defend against long-range missiles that could reach the United States, thus augmenting the existing Homeland missile defense capability.

Do you support the Phased Adaptive Approach to missile defense in Europe and, if confirmed, will you implement it?

Answer. Yes. I support the European Phased Adaptive Approach (EPAA). If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continues to support implementation of EPAA.

Question. In February 2010, the Defense Department issued its report on the first-ever comprehensive review of U.S. ballistic missile defense policy and strategy, the Ballistic Missile Defense Review (BMDR), as required by Congress. The BMDR established a number of policy priorities, including establishing defense against near-term regional missile threats as a top priority of missile defense plans, programs and capabilities. It also stated the policy of sustaining and enhancing the ability of the Ground-based Midcourse Defense system to defend the homeland against attack by a small number of long-range missiles by countries such as North Korea and Iran, and of hedging against future uncertainties.

Do you support the policies, strategies, and priorities set forth in the Ballistic Missile Defense Review and, if confirmed, will you implement them?

Answer. Yes. I support the administration's policies, strategies, and priorities as set forth in this review, and, if confirmed, I will implement them.

Question. The two most recent flight tests of the Ground-based Midcourse Defense (GMD) system failed to intercept their targets. The Missile Defense Agency (MDA) formed a Failure Review Board to determine the root cause of the failure and developed a plan to correct it, including flight tests to confirm the correction. Until the flight tests confirm the correction, MDA has suspended production of the Exo-atmospheric Kill Vehicles (EKVs) of the type that failed in the previous flight tests, in order to ensure that those EKVs do not contain a flaw that would need to be corrected later.

Do you agree that it is a high priority to correct the failure of the GMD system kill vehicle and demonstrate through flight testing that the system works as intended?

Answer. I'm not familiar with the technical details associated with these flight test failures, but in general I would agree that for any system, but especially for a national missile defense system, it is important to correct failures and demonstrate effectiveness as quickly as possible.

Question. Do you agree that it is prudent to verify that the flight test failure problem has been corrected before resuming production of additional EKVs?

Answer. I am not in a position to express a technical opinion on the right course of action, but in general it would seem prudent to demonstrate system effectiveness before committing to production. This is in line with the administration's principle of "fly before you buy".

Question. Do you support the continued enhancement and sustainment of the Ground-based Midcourse Defense system?

Answer. I very strongly believe that we should sustain and enhance our national missile defense to protect the Nation from limited ICBM attack by states like North Korea and Iran.

Question. Do you support the modernization of the Exo-atmospheric Kill Vehicle, which is based on 20-year-old technology?

Answer. Yes. I understand that the Exo-Atmospheric Kill Vehicle (EKV) is a key component of the Ground-based Midcourse Defense System that we rely on to protect the United States.

Question. Would you agree to study the feasibility, advisability, cost, and potential advantage of deploying additional ground based interceptors in the United States, including at a site located on the east coast of the United States?

Answer. I understand that such a study is required by the NDAA and, if confirmed, I will ensure the Department executes the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 direction to analyze potential locations for another continental United States (CONUS)-based missile defense site and to conduct environmental impact surveys.

Question. The United States and NATO are seeking options to cooperate with Russia on missile defense. President Obama has announced that such cooperation would not limit U.S. or NATO missile defense capabilities.

Do you agree that such cooperation could enhance the security of the United States, NATO, and Russia against common missile threats from nations such as Iran?

Answer. Yes. I agree that missile defense cooperation with Russia has the potential to enhance the security of the United States, NATO, and Russia. I also agree with President Obama's commitment to ensure that such cooperation will not limit U.S. or NATO missile defense capabilities.

Question. Do you agree that, irrespective of Russian objections, the United States is committed to the continued development and deployment of U.S. missile defense systems, including qualitative and quantitative improvements to such systems, to defend the homeland, our forward-deployed troops, and allies and partners overseas?

Answer. I agree that the United States is committed to continue to develop and deploy missile defenses, including qualitative and quantitative improvements consistent with the Ballistic Missile Defense Review. The President is on record as saying, and I agree, that the United States cannot accept limits on its BMD systems or expose information that would put our missile defense systems at risk. The President has made clear the need to ensure our missile defense systems are capable of defeating the most likely threat we face from North Korean and Iranian missiles. It makes sense to explore approaches to missile defense cooperation that improve transparency and reassure Russia that the U.S. missile defense system does not undermine Russia's strategic deterrent.

SPACE

Question. China's test of an anti-satellite weapon in 2007 was a turning point for the United States in its policies and procedure to ensure access to space. As a nation heavily dependent on space assets for both military and economic advantage, protection of space assets became a U.S. national priority.

Do you agree that space situational awareness and protection of space assets should be a national security priority?

Answer. Yes. Space situational awareness is foundational to all space activities, and enables the United States to maintain the strategic advantages we derive from space-based capabilities.

Question. In your view, should China's continued development of space systems inform U.S. space policy and programs?

Answer. Yes. U.S. space policies and programs should be informed by China's continued development of space systems, including its multidimensional counterspace program, as well as by the range of other actors that make the space environment increasingly congested, contested, and competitive.

Question. If confirmed, would you propose any changes to national security space policy and programs?

Answer. At this time, I am unaware of any necessary changes and if confirmed, I would plan to continue to implement the President's 2010 National Space Policy and the 2011 National Security Space Strategy. If I find need for changes in the future, I would propose them.

Question. Do you support the space code of conduct as a non-binding agreement among nations that utilize outer space?

Answer. Yes. An international code of conduct for space activities—a non-binding arrangement among nations that utilize space—would enhance our national security by helping to maintain the long-term sustainability, safety, stability, and security of space. As more countries and companies field space capabilities, a code could encourage responsible behavior and single out those who would act otherwise, while reducing the risk of mishaps, misperceptions, and mistrust.

Question. If confirmed, would you commit to reviewing the overall management and coordination of the national security space enterprise?

Answer. I understand that there has been a recent reorganization of the management and coordination of the national security space enterprise, including the establishment of the Defense Space Council, and the confirmation of the Secretary of the Air Force as the Executive Agent for Space. This reorganization has resulted in improvements in information flow across the Department and among U.S. departments and agencies, and has also improved the process for acquisition and policy decisions. If confirmed, I will commit to review this reorganization to ensure continued progress.

Question. What is your view on weapons in space?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue to implement the 2011 National Security Space Strategy, which states that "it is in the interests of all space-faring nations to avoid hostilities in space," and the President's 2010 National Space Policy, which states that "all nations have the right to explore and use space for peaceful purposes." The National Space Policy also directs the Secretary of Defense to develop capabilities, plans and options to deter, defend against, and, if necessary, defeat efforts to interfere with or attack U.S. or allied space systems.

Question. The administration is proposing to free up 500 MHz of spectrum for broadband use, a candidate portion of which includes the band 1755–1850 MHz, which is used heavily by DOD and other national security agencies.

Do you support this initiative?

Answer. I fully support the national economic and security goals of the President's 500 MHz initiative to make spectrum available for commercial broadband use, the implementation of more effective and efficient use of limited radio-frequency spectrum and the development of solutions to meet these goals.

Question. Do you support section 1602 of Public Law 106–65, which requires the Secretaries of Commerce and Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to certify that any alternative band or bands to be substituted for spectrum currently used by DOD and other national security agencies provide "comparable technical characteristics to restore essential military capability that will be lost as a result of the band of frequencies to be so surrendered"?

Answer. I fully support section 1602 of Public Law 106–65. This provision is absolutely critical to protecting and maintaining our warfighting capabilities. This statutory requirement is intended to ensure the Department is provided access to alternate spectrum before surrendering any spectrum critical for national security capabilities. Any spectrum reallocations and auctions should provide sufficient time for evaluation and certification of such alternate spectrum so that national security operations are not put at risk.

Question. If confirmed, how do you intend to comply with section 1602 in light of the 500 MHz initiative?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continues to conduct operational and cost-feasibility analysis to guarantee that spectrum-dependent national security capabilities are preserved, while supporting the economic benefits spectrum provides to our Nation.

Question. Do you intend to insist that DOD be compensated fully for the cost of relocating, if required to do so?

Answer. Yes. In order to relocate national security capabilities that rely on spectrum, while maintaining mission effectiveness, the Department must have alternate spectrum with comparable technical characteristics, full cost reimbursement for modifying complex weapons systems, and adequate time to make the transition.

Question. How do you propose the Department make more efficient use of communications spectrum through leasing of commercial satellites?

Answer. I understand that both the National Security Space Strategy and the Department of Defense Space Policy indicate that the Department will make use of commercial systems to the maximum extent practicable. I am not familiar with all the details, but will review this more thoroughly, if confirmed.

Question. Do you support more competition in the launch of DOD payloads?

Answer. Yes. in general I favor competition in contracting—to include new competitors that can meet certification standards.

Question. If confirmed, what steps will you take to encourage new entrants to the medium and heavy lift launch of DOD payloads while balancing affordability, mission assurance, and maintaining the viability of the existing launch provider?

Answer. I understand that the Department has developed criteria to certify new space launch vehicles capable of reliably launching national security satellites and will openly compete up to 14 space launches in the next 5 years, while guaranteeing the existing launch provider at least 28 launches.

Question. Do you support commercial hosting of DOD payloads and if so how?

Answer. Hosted payloads are one of the ways to enhance resilience and assure space capabilities in the congested, contested, and competitive space environment. If confirmed, I would support innovative approaches to improve the national security benefits we derive from space in a budget-constrained environment, including through the use of hosted payloads.

Question. What is your long-term vision and support for the Space-Based Infrared Sensing System (SBIRS)?

Answer. I understand that the SBIRS provides advanced early warning of hostile missile threats, allowing our warfighters to take swift and precise action. If confirmed, I would support the Department's continued efforts to define the future architecture necessary to provide early warning.

Question. Do you support splitting the systems sensors up to lower overall cost of the system?

Answer. I understand that the Department of Defense Space Policy requires the consideration of resilience in space architecture development. Splitting space sensors may be one way to achieve resilience. If confirmed, I will look at options for improving resilience in this system.

STRATEGIC SYSTEMS

Question. Over the next 5 years DOD will begin to replace or begin studies to replace all of the strategic delivery systems. For the next 15 plus years, DOD will also have to sustain the current strategic nuclear enterprise. This will be a very expensive undertaking.

Do you support the President's intent, stated in his message to the Senate on the New START treaty (February 2, 2011), to modernize or replace the triad of strategic nuclear delivery systems?

Answer. I support the President's commitment to a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent as long as nuclear weapons exist. I believe that providing necessary resources for nuclear modernization of the Triad should be a national priority. I understand the Department is currently modernizing, replacing, or studying recapitalization options for each leg of the Triad.

Question. Do you have any concerns about the ability of the Department to afford the costs of nuclear systems modernization while meeting the rest of the DOD commitments?

Answer. I am not able to make a judgment on this at this time; however, if confirmed, I will assess the costs to ensure that we protect critically important nuclear systems modernization while meeting other defense commitments. We must continue to aggressively scrutinize each of our programs to ensure we maintain critical capabilities in a fiscally responsible manner.

Question. The Department is committed to modernizing our nuclear command and control system, do you support that commitment?

Answer. I do. An effective, reliable Nuclear Command, Control, and Communication (NC3) system is a vital component of a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent. NC3 systems provide the President redundant and assured capability to execute U.S. nuclear forces under any scenario and are a critical element in ensuring crisis stability and deterrence.

U.S. CYBER COMMAND PERSONNEL REQUIREMENTS

Question. The Commander of U.S. Cyber Command (CYBERCOM) in conjunction with the Chiefs of the Military Services and other elements of DOD, is now seriously engaged in defining the numbers and qualifications of personnel required to conduct the offensive, defensive, and intelligence missions of the Command in support of the combatant commands and the defense of the Nation in cyberspace. Preliminary indications are that the numbers of exceptionally qualified operators are going to be substantial. Secretary Panetta committed to report to the Committee on Armed Services as early as possible this year how the Department would address these serious manpower and training requirements.

Do you believe that the strategy, operational concepts, and operational assumptions that underpin CYBERCOM's force planning have received sufficient critical scrutiny and analysis?

Answer. I understand that the Department's leadership has invested significant effort analyzing the threat, reviewing the force planning model, and is currently addressing how to implement the proposed model. If confirmed, I will review this analysis and implementation plan.

Question. Can the Military Services' current personnel systems and practices produce and sustain the number of highly qualified cyber operators that CYBERCOM believes are required, especially in light of end strength reductions and declining budgets?

Answer. Recruiting, training, and retaining military and civilian personnel needed for cyber operations will be a challenge. This is a high priority area for the Department with regard to investment of both resources and management oversight and, if confirmed, I will review these systems and practices.

Question. Should consideration be given to providing the Commander of CYBERCOM personnel authorities similar to those granted to the Commander of SOCOM?

Answer. If confirmed, I will seek the advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and senior civilian staff of the Department before recommending any additional authorities for CYBERCOM.

CYBER DETERRENCE

Question. Do you believe we are deterring and dissuading our adversaries in cyberspace?

Answer. At this time, it appears that the United States has successfully deterred major cyber attacks. I expect that deterring and, if necessary, defeating such attacks will be a continued key challenge. If confirmed I intend to ensure that the Department provides strong support to our national efforts in this area.

U.S. CYBER COMMAND STATUS

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has recommended that U.S. CYBERCOM be elevated from a sub-unified to a full unified command. The NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 includes a Sense of the Congress resolution calling for consultation with Congress before a Presidential decision is made to make CYBERCOM a unified command, and asking for consideration of a number of issues associated with such a decision.

Do you believe it would be advisable to consult with Congress prior to making a decision to elevate CYBERCOM to a unified command?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will ensure consultation with Congress.

Question. As the current Commander of the sub-unified CYBERCOM is dual-hatted as the Director of the National Security Agency (NSA), what are your views on the wisdom of having an intelligence officer serve as a unified combatant commander, rather than a line officer with broad training and command experience?

Answer. My sense is that dual-hatting the commander of CYBERCOM and the Director of NSA has worked well to date. However, if confirmed, I will review specifics of the dual-hatted relationship and assess whether it should continue in the future. I recognize that NSA support is critical to CYBERCOM's mission given the technical capabilities required to operate in cyberspace. In addition, I recognize that the CYBERCOM commander requires significant understanding of the intelligence community's capabilities and processes to execute his or her missions effectively. However, I am also aware of concerns about the dual-hatted relationship and, if confirmed, will carefully consider these concerns.

Question. Do you believe that CYBERCOM is mature enough to become a unified command, and that policy, strategy, operational planning, and rules of engagement to govern operations in cyberspace are sufficiently developed to justify this step?

Answer. My understanding is that the Department has made significant progress since CYBERCOM's creation in 2009. This includes issuance of a comprehensive strategy for military operations in cyberspace. In addition, I am told that CYBERCOM is expanding its integration into the Department's deliberate planning, and that the Chairman, with the approval of the Secretary of Defense, will issue a new set of rules of engagement governing all military operations, including cyber operations, in the near future. If confirmed, I will evaluate the maturity of the command and will consult closely with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, combatant commanders, and Congress prior to any decisions with respect to CYBERCOM.

CHINA'S AGGRESSIVE THEFT OF U.S. INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

Question. A recent report by the National Counterintelligence Executive confirmed the widespread belief that China is engaged in a massive campaign to steal technology, other forms of intellectual property, and business and trade information from the United States through cyberspace. The current Commander of CYBERCOM has referred to this as the greatest transfer of wealth in history and, along with others, believes this is a serious national security issue.

Do you believe that China's aggressive and massive theft of technology in cyberspace is a threat to national security and economic prosperity?

Answer. I believe that the theft of intellectual property and other sensitive information threatens the United States' military advantage and economic prosperity. If confirmed, I will work within the Department and with other departments and agencies to address this threat.

Question. What steps, if any, do you believe are needed to deter China from such activities in the future?

Answer. I am not in a position to recommend specific policies, guidance, or changes to authorities at this time. I understand that the Department is enhancing its cyber defense programs and those of certain defense industrial base networks, as well as improving its ability to identify the origins of intrusion. If confirmed, I will consider what diplomatic and public engagement as well as other actions that should be taken to address this challenge.

DOD'S ROLE IN DEFENDING THE NATION FROM CYBER ATTACK

Question. What is your understanding of the role of DOD in defending the Nation from an attack in cyberspace? In what ways is this role distinct from those of the Homeland security and law enforcement communities?

Answer. My understanding is that DHS has the lead for domestic cybersecurity. Thus, DHS coordinates national protection, prevention, mitigation, and recovery in significant cyber incidents. The Defense Department provides technical assistance to DHS when requested. The Department's role is to provide the military forces needed to deter the adversary, and if necessary, act to protect the security of the country. This includes planning against potential threats to our critical infrastructure, gathering foreign threat intelligence, and protecting classified networks. I believe that the defense, homeland security, and law enforcement communities should work together, and with our private sector partners to improve network defenses, share information on cyber threats, and ensure swift response to threats when they manifest themselves.

Question. Do you believe that defending the Homeland mission will require both offensive and defensive cyber forces and tools?

Answer. If confirmed, this is an area I will review closely. My current view is that defending the Homeland from cyber attacks should involve the full range of tools at the disposal of the United States, including diplomacy and law enforcement as well as any authorized military operations.

Question. This new mission will require substantial resources, including personnel. How do you envision generating these additional resources in the face of reduced budgets and declining end strength?

Answer. The current fiscal situation will force hard choices across a range of priority missions, including cyber. If confirmed, I will consult closely with military and civilian leaders in the Department, the President, and Congress in finding the right balance.

IRAN

Question. What is your assessment of the military and political threat posed by Iran?

Answer. Iran poses a significant threat to the United States, our allies and partners, and our interests in the region and globally. Iran continues to pursue an illicit nuclear program that threatens to provoke a regional arms race and undermine the global non-proliferation regime. Iran is also one of the main state-sponsors of terrorism and could spark conflict, including against U.S. personnel and interests. Iran is also actively investing in the development of a range of conventional capabilities, including air, missile, and naval assets that have generated regional anxieties and could threaten our interests and personnel in the region.

Question. What is your assessment of U.S. policy with respect to Iran?

Answer. I believe that President Obama has put in place and pursued effectively—with support from the U.S. Congress—a strong, multi-vector strategy to deal with the threats that Iran poses to the United States, particularly its nuclear pursuits. This strategy has included a strong diplomatic effort to test Iranian intentions, lay the ground work for an international coalition that holds Tehran accountable for its transgressions, and isolate Iran in the region and globally. This strategy has also included the application of smart, unprecedented, and effective sanctions against the Iranian regime that has sharpened its choices significantly. Lastly, this strategy has credibly, and smartly in my opinion, made clear that all options are on the table. I believe that this strategy has made it clear to Iran that the United States will do what it must to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, and I will continue to implement this policy if confirmed.

Question. In your view, what has been the effect of sanctions against Iran—how effective have they been?

Answer. I believe that the President with significant help from the U.S. Congress, has been able to bring the world community together to confront Iran with effective sanctions. As a result of these sanctions, Iran's financial, trade, and economic outlook has deteriorated significantly. International financial institutions estimate that Iran's economy contracted in 2012 for the first time in more than 2 decades. Iran's access to foreign exchange reserves held overseas has diminished. Additionally, the Iranian currency—the rial—reached an all-time low in mid-October, losing more than half its value since the start of 2012. Inflation and unemployment are also growing. As the economic outlook for Iran continues to worsen and as the U.S. continues to reinforce our pressure track along with the International Community, I believe that pressure is building on Iran.

Question. You have said that "Washington should make clear that everything is on the table with Tehran—an end to sanctions, diplomatic recognition, civil nuclear cooperation, investment in Iran's energy sector, World Bank Loans, World Trade Organization membership, Iraq, Afghanistan, regional security arrangements, etc.—if Iran abstains from a nuclear weapons program, ends support for terrorist groups, recognizes Israel, and engages in more constructive policies in Iraq."

Do you still hold this view?

Answer. I do believe that if Iran lives up to international obligations, it should have a path to a more prosperous and productive relationship with the international community and eventual rejoining of the community of nations. The other choice is clear as well—if Iran continues to flout its international obligations, it should continue to face severe and growing consequences. While there is time and space for diplomacy, backed by pressure, the window is closing. Iran needs to demonstrate it is prepared to negotiate seriously.

Question. In March 2012, President Obama said "when it comes to preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, I will take no options off the table, and I mean what I say. That includes all elements of American power: A political effort aimed at isolating Iran; a diplomatic effort to sustain our coalition and ensure that the Iranian program is monitored; an economic effort that imposes crippling sanctions; and, yes, a military effort to be prepared for any contingency."

Do you agree with the President's view that "all options should be on the table" to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon?

Answer. I agree with the President that the United States should take no options off the table in our efforts to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. If confirmed, I will focus intently on ensuring that U.S. military is in fact prepared for any contingency.

COUNTERING IRAN'S BALLISTIC MISSILE THREATS

Question. Iran has hundreds of short- and medium-range ballistic missiles today that are capable of reaching forward-deployed U.S. forces, allies, and partner nations in the CENTCOM AOR. The Ballistic Missile Defense Review Report of February 2010 stated that the United States intends to pursue a phased and adaptive approach to ballistic missile defense tailored against such missile threats in various regions, including the Middle East.

Do you agree that such a phased adaptive approach will provide CENTCOM with the missile defense capabilities needed to defend our forward deployed forces and our allies and partners in the region against Iranian ballistic missile threats?

Answer. While I have not looked into the details of the phased adaptive approach, I believe this approach includes the appropriate steps to protect the United States as well as our forces and interests overseas. If confirmed, I will work to ensure the President continues to propose a budget sufficient to support our ballistic missile defense priorities, balanced with competing priorities, and consistent with the projected capabilities of missile defense systems to deal with the anticipated threats.

Question. What role do you see for the Aegis Ballistic Missile Defense system with Standard Missile-3 interceptors in U.S. regional missile defense capabilities against Iran's ballistic missiles?

Answer. My understanding is that today, U.S. Aegis combatants equipped with Standard Missile-3s are on station and protecting U.S. forces, partners, and allies in the Middle East as well as Europe against Iran's ballistic missiles. My expectation is that this capability will continue to evolve.

Question. In addition to U.S. missile defense capabilities in the CENTCOM AOR, what role do you see for other nations in the AOR to contribute to regional missile defense capabilities, such as UAE's plans to purchase the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense system?

Answer. Recognizing that global demand for BMD will likely exceed the U.S. supply, it is appropriate for the United States to seek appropriate burden-sharing arrangements with partners and allies in the CENTCOM area and other regions. Such arrangements can increase the quantity of missile defense assets in support of U.S. regional deterrence and security goals. If confirmed, I will encourage those contributions to our mutual defense needs.

Question. The Intelligence Community assesses that, with sufficient foreign assistance, Iran may be technically capable of flight testing an ICBM capable of reaching the United States by 2015. What should the United States do to hedge against this possibility?

Answer. I understand that, with the deployed Ground-based Midcourse Defense system, the United States is currently protected against the threat of limited ICBM attack from states like Iran and North Korea. As noted in the 2010 Ballistic Missile Defense Review, it is important that we maintain this advantageous position by hedging against future uncertainties. If confirmed, I would continue the current efforts to prepare options in case the threat changes or if the development of new technical capabilities is delayed.

U.S.-ISRAEL DEFENSE COOPERATION

Question. In recent years, the NDAA has supported close cooperation and substantial funding for a number of critical missile defense and rocket defense programs for the state of Israel, including the Arrow system, the Arrow-3 interceptor, David's Sling, and the Iron Dome system.

In your view, should the United States continue to support such joint cooperation and funding for these programs?

Answer. Yes. I am proud of the work that the United States has done in support of the ballistic missile defense of Israel and, if confirmed, I will continue to support these efforts. Missile defense is a core area of U.S.-Israel joint cooperation. The importance of these efforts came to the forefront with Israel's recent Operation Pillar of Defense in Gaza. Throughout the 8 days of the operation, Hamas and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad launched over 1,506 rockets into Israel. Focusing only on these that posed a real threat to populated areas, Iron Dome intercepted 421 rockets with an overall intercept rate of approximately 85 percent—saving the lives of countless Israeli civilians. This highlights the importance of the work that the United States is doing with the Israelis on all layers of missile and rocket defense, and if confirmed, I will work to continue and expand this cooperation.

DOD'S COOPERATIVE THREAT REDUCTION (CTR) PROGRAM

Question. The CTR program is focused on eliminating WMD in the states of the former Soviet Union and other nations around the world. Its key objectives include: (1) eliminating strategic nuclear weapons; (2) improving the security and accounting of nuclear weapons and weapons-usable fissile material; (3) detecting, eliminating, and preventing the proliferation of biological and chemical weapons and capabilities; and (4) encouraging development of capabilities to reduce proliferation threats. The current CTR umbrella agreement between the Russian Federation and the United States will expire at the end of May 2013, and it has been reported that the Duma does not support extending the umbrella as it is currently written at this time.

Do you support extending this umbrella agreement?

Answer. Yes. On December 3, 2012, President Obama said, "If Russia believes the CTR agreement hasn't kept pace with the changing relationship between our countries, we should update it." If confirmed, I will support continuation of the nonproliferation cooperation with Russia supported by the CTR Umbrella Agreement.

Question. Do you support continued cooperation with the Russian Federation to eliminate WMD in Russia?

Answer. Yes. U.S. and Russian efforts to secure and eliminate WMD have made both countries safer, and have proven to be a productive area of cooperation.

Question. Do you support the use of metrics to assess the progress of the CTR programs and to ensure individual programs complete their objectives?

Answer. Yes. Metrics are an important tool in ensuring efficient execution of the CTR program.

Question. In your view, are Russia and the former Soviet Union countries making a significant contribution to efforts to reduce the proliferation threats they inherited?

Answer. My understanding is that the Russian Federation and several other states of the Former Soviet Union have contributed in many ways to reduce threats posed by WMD that they inherited. I understand that the Department supports these efforts through the CTR program, which helps secure nuclear materials, destroy chemical weapons, and reduce the threat from especially dangerous pathogens. Russia and several of its neighbors also made important contributions to the Nuclear Security Summits held in Washington and Seoul.

Question. Do you think the CTR program is well-coordinated among the U.S. Government agencies that engage in threat reduction efforts in Russia, e.g., DOD, the Department of Energy, and the State Department?

Answer. My understanding is that CTR and other nonproliferation programs executed by Federal agencies are coordinated well through the leadership of the National Security Staff. If confirmed, one of my priorities as Secretary of Defense will be to ensure that all of the Department's activities in this area are well-coordinated with interagency partners.

Question. As the CTR program expands to geographic regions beyond the states of the former Soviet Union, in your view what proliferation prevention and threat reduction goals should the DOD establish or focus on?

Answer. My understanding is that the President has highlighted nuclear and biological terrorism as key threats, and that the CTR program strongly supports these priorities. I agree with these priorities.

Question. Do you support extending the CTR program to nations in the Middle East, especially with respect to containing Syrian chemical weapons?

Answer. My understanding is that the CTR program is authorized to undertake activities in the Middle East. The main objective of this expanded authority is to enhance the capacity of regional partners, particularly the nations that border Syria, to mitigate the threat to their territory posed by the potential loss or use of Syria's chemical weapons. If confirmed, I would continue to support this effort.

Question. Do you support extending the CTR program to nations in Africa, especially with respect to biological materials?

Answer. Yes. based on my current understanding, I believe it makes good sense to continue to expand the CTR program's geographic reach beyond the former Soviet Union. Any cost effective steps we can take to keep terrorists from accessing dangerous biological agents by partnering with other nations are especially important in regions like East Africa where active terrorist threats converge with emerging infectious diseases.

PROMPT GLOBAL STRIKE

Question. The 2010 QDR concluded that the United States will continue to experiment with prompt global strike prototypes. There has been no decision to field a prompt global strike capability as the effort is early in the technology and testing phase.

In your view, what is the role for a conventional prompt global strike capability in addressing the key threats to U.S. national security in the near future?

Answer. I understand that the Department continues to assess a broad range of conventional strike capabilities to address current and emerging threats. Conventional prompt global strike weapons could provide the President with unique conventional capabilities in certain scenarios that include fleeting or otherwise inaccessible time-sensitive targets for example. I understand, however, that there are concerns about this operational concept. At this point, I believe that it makes sense to assess potential approaches to conventional prompt global strike. If confirmed, I will look forward to further discussions with Congress on this topic.

Question. What approach to implementation of this capability would you expect to pursue if confirmed?

Answer. I understand the Department is continuing to conduct research and testing to support the development of concepts and technologies for boost-glide systems that could provide the basis for a conventional prompt global strike capability. If confirmed, I will review implementation options.

Question. Do you support a competitive procurement of prompt global strike systems if they progress to a milestone B stage?

Answer. In general, where viable options exist, I think the Department should take maximum advantage of a competitive procurement process.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS AND STOCKPILE STEWARDSHIP

Question. Congress established the Stockpile Stewardship Program with the aim of creating the computational capabilities and experimental tools needed to allow for the continued certification of the nuclear weapons stockpile as safe, secure, and reliable without the need for nuclear weapons testing. The Secretaries of Defense and Energy are statutorily required to certify annually to Congress the continued safety, security, and reliability of the nuclear weapons stockpile.

As the stockpile continues to age, what do you view as the greatest challenges with respect to assuring the safety, reliability, and security of the stockpile?

Answer. I understand that the Stockpile Stewardship Program has ensured that our nuclear weapons stockpile remains safe, secure, and effective without the use of underground nuclear weapons testing. At the same time, the challenge we face is that some aspects of today's nuclear complex are in need of repair or replacement. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Department of Energy to ensure the safety, security, and reliability of our stockpile, and the modernization of the nuclear weapons complex infrastructure.

Question. Do you agree that the full funding of the President's plan for modernizing the nuclear weapons complex, commonly referred to as the 1251 report, is a critical national security priority?

Answer. The modernization of the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA) infrastructure and life extension of our nuclear weapons are critical to sustaining a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent. If confirmed, I will work to ensure appropriate funding levels and cost-effective management for these efforts, which will require a substantial and sustained fiscal commitment.

Question. Prior to completing this modernization effort, do you believe it would be prudent to consider reductions below New START treaty limits for either the deployed or nondeployed stockpile of nuclear weapons?

Answer. I believe that we should make necessary investments in infrastructure modernization regardless of potential future nuclear weapon reductions. I understand that the New START treaty does not limit nondeployed warheads; if confirmed I will ensure that the stockpile, including both deployed and nondeployed nuclear warheads, sustains the credibility of the U.S. deterrent, including our commitments to extend deterrence to U.S. allies.

Question. What role does the Nuclear Weapons Council (NWC) play in helping to establish key stockpile stewardship goals and modernization objectives?

Answer. The NWC is the primary interface for coordinating nuclear weapons enterprise issues between DOD and the Department of Energy. I understand that its current top priority is to address stockpile life extension and nuclear infrastructure modernization in the current fiscal environment.

Question. Do you support a more active role of the Office of Cost Analysis and Program Evaluation (CAPE) in ensuring the programs within the Department of Energy and the NNSA are appropriately tailored for the best investment of funds possible to achieve a safe, effective, and reliable nuclear weapons stockpile?

Answer. I am not familiar enough with the degree of CAPE's involvement with the Department of Energy and the NNSA to make that determination at this time. I understand that CAPE has worked closely with NNSA over the past year to review NNSA programs, and if confirmed, will closely consider CAPE's appropriate role in this regard in the future.

MEDICAL COUNTERMEASURES INITIATIVE

Question. The administration has produced an interagency strategy for the advanced development and manufacture of medical countermeasures (MCM) to defend against pandemic influenza and biological warfare threats. In this strategy, DOD will be responsible for the rapid development and manufacture of medical countermeasures to protect U.S. Armed Forces and Defense Department personnel.

Do you support this interagency strategy and the MCM Initiative and, if confirmed, would you plan to implement them?

Answer. I am very concerned about the threat of biological weapons. I support assigning to the Department the responsibility for protecting the U.S. Armed Forces and Defense Department personnel with rapid development and manufacturing of medical countermeasures. If confirmed, I will need to look into the specific plans associated with the interagency strategy of the Medical Countermeasure Initiative. I would do my best to implement the administration's strategy, consistent with any statutory guidance and available funding.

DEFENSE ACQUISITION REFORM

Question. The Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 (WSARA) is designed to ensure that new defense acquisition programs start on a sound footing, to avoid the high cost of fixing problems late in the acquisition process.

What are your views regarding WSARA and the need for improvements in the Defense acquisition process?

Answer. I believe that our weapons systems acquisition process has substantial room for improvement. My understanding is that WSARA, which enacted a number of steps to improve many aspects of weapons system acquisition, has been largely implemented by the Department and that it is improving the Department's acquisition performance, but that more needs to be done. I am aware the Department is continuing to implement the remaining provisions of WSARA and other acquisition improvement initiatives. If confirmed, I will review these efforts to ensure that they are adequate and I will continue to work with Congress and our industry partners to improve the way we acquire systems for the Department.

Question. If confirmed, how would you improve all three aspects of the acquisition process B requirements, acquisition, and budgeting?

Answer. Close coordination of these three processes is essential to improving the Department's ability to acquire services and systems and to obtain the best value for every defense dollar. Since WSARA's enactment, progress appears to have been made in regard to closer integration of these three processes, but I do not believe that this work is complete. In my view, requirements must be feasible and affordable, there must be an executable plan to acquire the products that meet those requirements, and there must be an adequate budget established to conduct the program and acquire the product. If confirmed, I will work to bring requirements, acquisition, and budgeting into close alignment by ensuring that the individuals responsible for these three aspects of acquisition work in conjunction with one another and not in isolation.

Question. If confirmed, how would you improve acquisition accountability?

Answer. I support a chain of command for the acquisition process that provides for the clear responsibility and accountability that was established by the Goldwater-Nichols Act in the 1980s. For major programs, this chain of command begins with the Defense Acquisition Executive and runs through DOD component head to the Service or Component Acquisition Executive, the Program Executive Officer, and the Program Manager. If confirmed, I will hold these individuals accountable for acquisition system performance.

Question. Do you believe that the current investment budget for major systems is affordable given increasing historic cost growth in major systems, costs of current operations, and asset recapitalization?

Answer. I have not yet reviewed DOD's investment budget in detail or the balance between major systems investments, operations, and recapitalization. However, it is clear to me that pursuing only affordable programs and controlling costs throughout a product's life cycle are critical in any financial environment. All programs must be closely managed to avoid cost growth, and the affordability of any new requirements must be carefully scrutinized at the outset—before the program is authorized. If confirmed, I will examine the investment budget closely for near and long-term affordability, taking into consideration the potential for cost growth. I will also assess the sustainability of the balance between the various accounts that make up the Department's budget, including the investment, operations, and asset recapitalization portions of the budget.

Question. If confirmed, how do you plan to address this issue and guard against the potential impact of weapon systems cost growth?

Answer. My understanding is that the Department has been imposing affordability cost caps on new programs for over 2 years for both production and sustainment costs. These caps are being used to force trade-offs between capability and costs early in a program's life cycle. If confirmed, I will strongly support the imposition and enforcement of these cost caps. I will also work with the Department and industry to ensure that we stay on budget and on schedule. DOD and the taxpayer cannot afford the excessive cost growth that has plagued some programs in the past.

RELIABILITY OF WEAPONS SYSTEMS

Question. The Department's process for procuring major weapons systems places insufficient emphasis on reliability and maintainability and, therefore, produces systems that are increasingly costly to operate and sustain. Given that these ownership costs comprise most of a given weapons systems' overall lifecycle cost, these increased costs could undermine considerably the Department's "buying power".

How would you ensure that the defense acquisition system produces more reliable weapons systems?

Answer. I believe that the key to obtaining necessary reliability is to establish effective incentives and, when necessary, to enforce the consequences of failure to meet established standards. If confirmed, I will ensure that the acquisition system takes this approach to achieving the needed reliability performance for its weapons systems.

EXCESSIVE CONCURRENCY IN MAJOR DEFENSE ACQUISITION PROGRAMS

Question. Major defense acquisition programs (MDAP) have experienced excessive cost-growth and schedule delays due to, among other things, too much of an overlap between development and production. This has exposed these systems to a high risk of costly new discoveries requiring redesign and retrofit late into operational testing or production.

What more can be done to ensure that the defense acquisition system safeguards against excessive concurrency in MDAPs?

Answer. I am not an expert in this field; however, my understanding is that some limited degree of concurrency between development and initial production can often be the most efficient way to structure a weapons system program. However, the Department has in some cases, such as the F–35 Joint Strike Fighter, taken too much risk with concurrency, committing to production well before the design was tested enough to know that it was mature and stable. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the risks of concurrent development and production are fully understood and taken into account by acquisition decisionmakers before a program enters production.

PROCUREMENT PROGRAM RISK

Question. Another major cause of excessive cost growth and schedule delays in how the Department procures major weapons systems and major automated information systems (in particular, "enterprise resource planning" systems, which are vital to defense financial improvement and business transformation), relates to the Department's inability to identify, price, and therefore effectively manage program risk, (e.g., technological, developmental, integration, and manufacturing risk).

How would you improve the defense acquisition system to ensure that the Department can more effectively and timely address all types of risk in its major defense procurement programs to better ensure the delivery of needed combat capability on time and on budget?

Answer. I believe the early identification, management, and mitigation of program risk is a critical element of any well-managed acquisition program. I understand that the Department, through implementation of WSARA and other ongoing initiatives, is working to improve early planning efforts to better understand risks and to put in place steps that will remove and/or mitigate them prior to the commitment of a major investment in product development or initial production. My view is that new product development inherently involves risk and that the risk of any new product development must be actively managed if the program is to be successful. If confirmed, I will review the adequacy of these initiatives and their effectiveness.

SERVICES CONTRACTING

Question. Over the last decade, the Department has become progressively more reliant upon contractors to perform functions that were once performed exclusively by government employees. As a result, contractors now play an integral role in areas as diverse as the management and oversight of weapons programs, the development of personnel policies, and the collection and analysis of intelligence. In many cases, contractor employees work in the same offices, serve on the same projects and task forces, and perform many of the same functions as DOD employees.

In your view, has DOD become too reliant on contractors to support the basic functions of the Department?

Answer. Although I understand that DOD has been taking steps in recent years to reduce its reliance on contractors, I believe DOD must continue to manage its workforce in a way that avoids inappropriate or excessive reliance on contractor support for basic Department functions, while also meeting its obligations to perform work efficiently and effectively and to be a good steward of taxpayer resources. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department implements a workforce strategy that aligns functions and work among military, civilian, and contracted services in a cost effective, and balanced manner consistent with workload requirements, funding availability, and laws and regulations.

Question. If confirmed, how do you plan to address the issue of cost growth in services contracting and ensure that the Department gets the most for its money in this area?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue the efforts of the administration and the Department to improve the visibility and accountability of contracted services by expanding and refining the data we collect from contractors, as required by statute, in order to compare it to our civilian and military workforce planning factors.

Question. U.S. military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan have relied on contractor support to a greater degree than previous U.S. military operations. According to widely published reports, the number of U.S. contractor employees in Iraq and Afghanistan has often exceeded the number of U.S. military deployed in those countries.

Do you believe that DOD has become too dependent on contractor support for military operations?

Answer. At this time I don't have enough information to make an assessment. While many support functions for military operations are appropriate for contract support, some are more closely associated with work that should be performed by government employees (military or civilian), or other Federal agencies. I am aware of recent recommendations made by the Commission on Wartime Contracting and the GAO regarding such dependence and, if confirmed, I will support ongoing efforts to implement those recommendations as appropriate.

Question. What risks do you see in the Department's reliance on such contractor support? What steps do you believe the Department should take to mitigate such risk?

Answer. Reliance on contractor support can lead to operational risk if contractors fail to perform or perform outside the scope of appropriately defined roles. Our experiences in Iraq and Afghanistan have also shown that additional risk is introduced when there is poor government oversight, further increasing the potential for fraud, waste, and abuse. We also know that government oversight is critical to ensure appropriate contractor interaction with local communities.

If confirmed, I will support the Department's ongoing efforts to minimize any over-reliance on contractors and ensure the appropriate mix of military, civilian, and contract personnel in theater. I will also review the Department's progress in implementing recommendations made by the Commission on Wartime Contracting, the GAO, and the legislative mandates in the NDAA regarding operational contracting requirements including considerations for contract support as part of the national military strategy, the QDR, and the Chairman's annual risk assessment.

Question. Do you believe the Department is appropriately organized and staffed to effectively manage contractors on the battlefield?

Answer. I do not have enough information yet to make a full assessment of this issue. However, I believe that investments made over the last few years in the Department's acquisition workforce, as well as the implementation of recommendations made by the Commission on Wartime Contracting and the GAO, have vastly improved the Department's ability to effectively manage contractors on the battlefield. If confirmed, I will continue to improve our capabilities in this critical area.

Question. What steps if any do you believe the Department should take to improve its management of contractors on the battlefield?

Answer. At this time I don't have enough information to identify specific steps or actions necessary to improve management of contractors on the battlefield. If confirmed, I will work with the Chairman, the Joint Chiefs, the combatant commanders, and other Department leadership to ensure commanders in the field have the necessary resources and access to information to effectively manage contract support and mitigate against potential risks.

PRIVATE SECURITY CONTRACTORS

Question. Federal agencies including DOD have spent more than $5 billion for private security contractors in Iraq and Afghanistan over the last decade. Over this period, there have been numerous reports of abuses and questionable activities by private security contractors in both countries.

Do you believe DOD and other Federal agencies should rely upon contractors to perform security functions that may reasonably be expected to require the use of deadly force in highly hazardous public areas in an area of combat operations?

Answer. I believe it may be appropriate to use private security contractors for specific security functions in contingency operations when they are limited by specific rules for the use of force. Such functions include providing security for our military bases in areas of operations and protecting supply convoys. Without a significant increase in end strength and resources, the Department would not have the capacity to take on all the missions private security contractors are able to fill. However, the Department must provide proper guidance and supervision when using private security contractors and must ensure they do not engage in combat operations. I cannot comment on the use of private security contractors by other Federal agencies.

Question. In your view, has the U.S. reliance upon private security contractors to perform such functions risked undermining our defense and foreign policy objectives in Iraq and Afghanistan?

Answer. The use of private security contractors in support of contingency operations always requires careful oversight. The misapplication of the use of force by private security contractors can undermine our strategic objectives. If confirmed, I will ensure DOD has established policies and procedures to effectively manage private security contractors to prevent actions that would be detrimental to our policy objectives.

Question. Section 846 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 requires DOD to carry out risk assessments and risk mitigation plans whenever it relies on contractors to perform critical functions in support of OCOs.

What steps will you take, if confirmed, to implement the requirements of section 846?

Answer. I believe that contract support is an essential part of the total force and will remain so in the future. In many cases contractors are absolutely vital. For example transportation command heavily uses contractors to move personnel and equipment. If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD policy and operational guidance addresses the requirements of section 846 and that proper risk assessments and risk mitigation plans are conducted.

Question. What steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to ensure that any private security contractors who may continue to operate in an area of combat operations act in a responsible manner, consistent with U.S. defense and foreign policy objectives?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure DOD has policies that effectively guide the operations of private security contractors when they are used, and that we provide proper oversight. We must also strive to ensure that all contractors, including private security contractors, are appropriately legally accountable for their actions, and that private security contractors that operate in an area of combat and contingency operations act responsibly.

EFFICIENCY IN DEPARTMENT OPERATIONS

Question. The Joint Chiefs recently stated that, "we must be given the latitude to enact the cost-saving reforms we need while eliminating the weapons and facilities we do not need."

In your view, what latitude must be given to the Joint Chiefs to enact cost-saving reforms?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Joint Chiefs supported some hard choices that were made in the fiscal year 2013 President's budget in order to achieve the savings required to sustain the new defense strategy. The Joint Chiefs need Congress to provide them the latitude to implement those changes and allow them to execute the new strategy. I also understand that it is now a zero sum game. If the Department is not able to implement the changes proposed, other offsets must be made, while still preserving warfighting capability.

Question. If confirmed, how would you work with the Joint Chiefs to eliminate unneeded weapons?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to the opportunity to sit down with the Joint Chiefs and to work together to thoroughly review, identify, and eliminate any effort that is outdated or no longer needed by the Department.

Question. Do you support the administration's request for the authority to conduct two rounds of Bases Realignments and Closures (BRAC) to eliminate unneeded facilities?

Answer. I understand that the administration's proposal for two rounds of BRAC was not accepted by Congress. However, I also think any prudent manager has to look at all options when faced with significant budget pressures. As with industry, the Department should examine its infrastructure and eliminate excess. The BRAC process is not perfect, but I believe BRAC is a fair and comprehensive way to rightsize the Department's footprint, and is the best process identified to date. If confirmed, I would have to look at the need for BRAC in the future.

Question. If so, given the recent report by GAO of the excessive costs of the 2005 BRAC round, what would be your priorities in carrying out a round of BRAC?

Answer. It is my understanding that the 2005 BRAC round was an anomaly, the only round conducted while the Department was growing. It focused on transformation, jointness, and relocating forces from overseas. A future BRAC round is more likely to be like the rounds in 1993 and 1995 where excess capacity was reduced.

ACQUISITION WORKFORCE

Question. Over the last 15 years, DOD has reduced the size of its acquisition workforce by almost half, without undertaking any systematic planning or analysis to ensure that it would have the specific skills and competencies needed to meet DOD's current and future needs. Since September 11, 2001, moreover, the demands placed on that workforce have substantially increased. Section 852 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2008 established an Acquisition Workforce Development Fund to help DOD address shortcomings in its acquisition workforce. This requirement was revised and updated by section 803 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013.

Do you agree that the Department would be "penny-wise and pound foolish" to try to save money by cutting corners on its acquisition workforce at the risk or losing control over the hundreds of billions of dollars that it spends every year on the acquisition of products and services?

Answer. Yes. It is imperative that DOD act as a good steward of the resources entrusted to it by the American people. A properly qualified and sized acquisition workforce is central to maintaining this stewardship and to ensuring that the Department obtains as much value as possible for the money that it spends obtaining products and services from contractors.

Question. Do you believe that the Acquisition Workforce Development Fund is needed to ensure that DOD has the right number of employees with the right skills to run its acquisition programs in the most cost effective manner for the taxpayers?

Answer. I understand that the Acquisition Workforce Development Fund has provided funds necessary for strengthening the acquisition workforce with regard to both its size and skills. I support this goal and, if confirmed, will work with Congress to ensure that the Fund is used effectively to build the capability of the Department's acquisition workforce.

HUMAN CAPITAL PLANNING

Question. DOD faces a critical shortfall in key areas of its civilian workforce, including the management of acquisition programs, information technology systems and financial management, and senior DOD officials have expressed alarm at the extent of the Department's reliance on contractors in these areas. Section 115b of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Department to develop a strategic workforce plan to shape and improve its civilian employee workforce.

Would you agree that the Departments human capital, including its civilian workforce, is critical to the accomplishment of its national security mission?

Answer. Yes. I agree. The civilian workforce performs key enabling functions for the military, such as critical training and preparation to ensure readiness, equipment reset and modernization. Civilians also provide medical care, family support, and base operating services—all vital to supporting our men and women in uniform.

Question. Do you share the concern expressed by others about the extent of the Departments reliance on contractors in critical areas such as the management of acquisition programs, information technology and financial management?

Answer. Yes. We must ensure that we have a properly sized, and highly capable, civilian workforce that maintains critical skills and prevents an overreliance on contracted services. If confirmed, I will support the administration's focus on reducing inappropriate or excessive reliance on contracted support.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the Department undertakes necessary human capital planning to ensure that its civilian workforce is prepared to meet the challenges of the coming decades?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will ensure departmental human capital planning employs strategies for recruitment, development, and retention of a mission-ready civilian workforce.

Question. Section 955 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 requires a 5-percent reduction in anticipated funding levels for the civilian personnel workforce and the service contractor workforce of DOD, subject to certain exclusions.

What impact do you expect the implementation of section 955 to have on the programs and operations of DOD?

Answer. I do not have enough information at this time to speak to potential impact. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department's implementation of section 955, both in the civilian and contracted support workforces, is done in a manner that best mitigates risk to programs and operations, while maintaining core capabilities and support to our warfighters and their families.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that section 955 is implemented in a manner that is consistent with the requirements of section 129a of title 10, U.S.C., for determining the most appropriate and cost-efficient mix of military, civilian and service contractor personnel to perform DOD missions?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure implementation of section 955 recognizes that the sourcing of work among military (both Active and Reserve components), civilian, and contracted services must be consistent with requirements, funding availability, and applicable laws.

Question. What processes will you put in place, if confirmed, to ensure that the Department implements a sound planning process for carrying out the requirements of section 955, including the implementation of the exclusion authority in section 955(c)?

Answer. If confirmed, I will review the current processes the Department has for workforce determinations, along with existing management structures and tools. I do not currently have enough information regarding possible specific exclusions, but will ensure that the workforces of the Department are sized to perform the functions and activities necessary to achieve the missions of the Department.

TEST AND EVALUATION

Question. If confirmed, will you make it a priority to ensure that the Department as a whole and each of the Services specifically maintains its testing organizations, infrastructure, and budgets at levels adequate to address both our current and future acquisition needs?

Answer. Yes. Test and evaluation is a critical element of our acquisition system, that providing the measured and objective insight into a system's performance that is essential to making sound programmatic decisions.

Question. A natural tension exists between major program objectives to reduce cost and schedule and the test and evaluation objective to ensure performance meets specifications and requirements. What is your assessment of the appropriate balance between the desire to reduce acquisition cycle times and the need to perform adequate testing?

Answer. Test and evaluation provides acquisition decisionmakers with accurate and objective information on system performance necessary to inform critical acquisition decisions. My view is that we should generally not gamble on the performance of a weapons system when a reasonable amount of testing will significantly reduce the risk of redesign or major changes after production has been started. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the balance between reducing acquisition cycle time and conducting adequate testing to ensure warfighters receive affordable, operationally effective, and suitable systems when they need them.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe we should procure weapon systems and equipment that has not been demonstrated through test and evaluation to be operationally effective, suitable, and survivable?

Answer. I understand that test and evaluation plays a critical role in product development and fielding. I believe that there are only a limited number of cases where it might be necessary to field a system prior to operational testing—for example, to address an urgent gap in a critical operational capability in an ongoing or imminent conflict. Even when fielding is accelerated to meet an urgent need, applicable statutes governing the test process must be complied with. There must be some level of testing to ensure basic operational performance and the safety of the system and to evaluate the system's capabilities and limitations to identify any deficiencies that might need to be corrected.

Question. Congress established the position of Director of Operational Test and Evaluation to serve as an independent voice on matters relating to operational testing of weapons systems. As established, the Director has a unique and direct relationship with Congress, consistent with the statutory independence of the office.

Do you support the continued ability of the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation's to speak freely and independently with Congress?

Answer. Yes.

FUNDING FOR SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY (S&T) INVESTMENTS AND WORKFORCE

Question. In his State of the Union speech in 2010, the President said that "maintaining our leadership in science and technology is crucial to America's success." The DOD budget submissions for fiscal years 2012 and 2013 supported continued investment in science and technology, despite the significant budget pressure.

Do you support maintaining growth in the DOD's S&T investments?

Answer. I understand and appreciate the importance of government investment in science and technology in the area of national security. Maintaining technological superiority against current and projected adversaries underpins our National Security Strategy and it is only through this investment that we can sustain this critical edge. I fully support the President's commitment to science and technology, and if confirmed, I will work to support science and technology investments in our defense budget.

Question. How will you assess whether the science and technology investment portfolio is adequate to meet the current and future needs of the Department?

Answer. If confirmed, I anticipate conducting reviews of the Department's current science and technology investment strategy, in the context of the Department's priorities and capability needs. I also acknowledge the necessity of maintaining a strong technology base.

Question. Well over half of all graduates of U.S. universities with advanced degrees in science and technology are non-U.S. citizens. Due to a variety of reasons, many return to their home countries where they contribute to competing against the United States in technology advancement.

What is your view on steps that the Department should take, if any, to ensure that DOD and the defense industrial base are able to recruit and retain scientists and engineers from this talent pool?

Answer. In order to maintain our technology superiority, it is essential for the Department to attract the best and brightest minds. The President made clear in his recent inaugural address that including bright students and engineers from abroad in America's workforce is an imperative for our future. If confirmed, I will work within the Department and the administration to find ways in which the Department could enhance its skilled workforce, to include its scientific and engineering segments, by drawing upon a broad talent pool and by seeking to recruit and retain the best possible individuals, within the construct of national security requirements.

DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

Question. The latest QDR addressed the need for strengthening the defense industrial base. Specifically, it said: "America's security and prosperity are increasingly linked with the health of our technology and industrial bases. In order to maintain our strategic advantage well into the future, the Department requires a consistent, realistic, and long-term strategy for shaping the structure and capabilities of the defense technology and industrial bases—a strategy that better accounts for the rapid evolution of commercial technology, as well as the unique requirements of ongoing conflicts."

What is your understanding and assessment of the current state of the U.S. defense industry?

Answer. I understand the Department relies on a broadened technical and industrial base that is now far more global, commercial, and financially complex than ever before. For the past decade the defense industrial base has enjoyed a period of increasing budgets that is now at an end. While I think our industrial base is currently strong, I am concerned about the impact that further defense budget cuts would have on the ability of the base to provide the broad range of products and services that the Department and our Nation need. If confirmed, the continuing health of the industrial base will be a high priority for me.

Question. Do you support further consolidation of the U.S. defense industry?

Answer. Expansion and consolidation of industries and companies is the hallmark of a robust free market economy as it responds to the market forces. I expect, and encourage, the free market to act when faced with changing demands. However, I believe the Government must also be watchful for consolidations that eliminate competition or cause market distortions. At the end of the Cold War there was a major consolidation at the top tier of defense businesses. My understanding is that the Department's leadership have indicated that further consolidation at the top tier would not be viewed favorably. I have not studied this in detail; however, my initial assessment is that this is the correct view. I also believe that each individual case of consolidation, acquisition, or merger dealing with our defense firms must be examined carefully for what is best for the warfighter and the taxpayer, particularly with regard to its impact on competition.

Question. What is your position on foreign investment in the U.S. defense sector?

Answer. Foreign investment has generally benefitted the United States, including DOD, by providing needed capital and increasing access to leading-edge technologies. However, I believe foreign investment in the defense sector can also expose critical national defense-related technologies to risks, including loss of the intellectual property that gives our military personnel the technological edge they rely upon. Congress has put provisions in place to address critical national security concerns of this nature, including the Committee on Foreign Interests in the United States led by the Department of the Treasury. If confirmed, I will continue DOD's commitment to its oversight function and to ensuring that national security concerns are addressed in transactions that involve foreign investments in the United States, including investments in the defense sector.

Question. If confirmed, what steps if any do you believe DOD should take to most effectively and efficiently manage risk and ensure the continued health of the U.S. defense industrial base?

Answer. If confirmed, I would seek to ensure the sources of manufacturing and services in the industrial base that the Department relies on are capable of meeting our warfighters' requirements. I will ensure that the Department proactively monitors the base to identify any risks that need to be addressed. When necessary and as resources permit, the Department should be prepared to act to ensure that key industrial capabilities are sustained, although, unfortunately, this will not be possible in every case. I will also make myself accessible to the best source of information on the industry's concerns—industry itself. This means working closely and communicating with private industry to ensure that, as the Department makes changes necessary to adapt to a new set of strategic and budgetary challenges, it does not inadvertently jeopardize critical elements of the industrial base. I believe the Department must simultaneously be receptive to industry's concerns and address their issues as effectively as possible, consistent with the Department's priorities and the resources available.

RESET AND RECONSTITUTION FUNDING

Question. The Department has a substantial backlog of maintenance availabilities due to the high tempo and demand of more than a decade of combat operations. Senior DOD officials have testified that they will require 2 to 3 years of additional funding to restore readiness through reset and reconstitution of their equipment and personnel.

Do you agree with the assessment that the DOD will need 2 to 3 years of additional funding for reset and reconstitution?

Answer. I would need to review the facts behind the specific estimate of 2 to 3 years; however, I believe that it will require considerable time to repair equipment returning from operations in Afghanistan because of the nature of the repairs and difficulty of removing the equipment from theater.

Question. If confirmed, how will you balance maintenance and reset requirements with fiscal realities and future risk in developing your budget request?

Answer. The goal of reset and reconstitution is to produce ready units with the equipment they need for contingencies or current operations. Any further budget cuts must be balanced against this need for ready units, and, if confirmed, I will work with the services to prioritize the readiness of the units needed to implement the President's strategy.

OPERATIONAL ENERGY

Question. Last July, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Operational Energy Plans and Programs published a policy that any alternative drop-in replacement fuel procured for DOD-wide use and distribution within the Class III (Bulk) supply chain must compete with petroleum products and any awards will be based on the ability to meet requirements at the best value to the government, including cost.

What is your view of this policy?

Answer. I understand this policy to be a positive one. It is prudent for the Department to engage in tests and demonstrations that confirm defense equipment can operate on a range of fuels; however, as the Department allocates its limited resources to ensure it delivers necessary warfighting capability, it should only buy large volumes of these fuels when they are cost-competitive with petroleum products.

Question. What is your assessment of section 526 of the Energy Independence and Security Act of 2007 and how it should apply to military operations of DOD?

Answer. My understanding is that section 526 has not restricted the Department from purchasing whatever fuel it has needed to support military operations. Rather, section 526 applies only to contracts that are for the express purpose of buying alternative or synthetic fuel. As long as mission capability is not restricted, it is helpful to have this guidance that new fuels should not be any more polluting than fuels produced from conventional petroleum sources.

Question. Considering the potential of further cuts to Defense budgets and the importance of energy security, do you believe DOD should jointly invest with other government agencies in the construction of a commercial biofuels refinery?

Answer. I understand the Department is in the early planning stages of such a project, undertaken in partnership with the private sector and the Departments of Energy and Agriculture, which have the lead roles for the Federal Government in promoting biofuels. I have not reviewed this project; however, I believe the Nation's long-term energy security would benefit from a competitive, domestic renewable fuels industry—the Department has a long history of contributing to national innovation by innovating to meet the defense mission. As a major consumer of liquid fuels, the Department would benefit from that industry as well. That said, I am not yet in a position to comment on the trade-offs between the value of this investment and the other priorities of the Department. Given the Department's funding constraints, I would, if confirmed, examine the value of this investment carefully before authorizing it to proceed.

Question. If confirmed, what priorities would you establish for Defense investments in energy technologies?

Answer. My broad priorities for defense energy investments will be those that: increase military capabilities, provide more mission success, and lower total cost. If confirmed, I will focus on both operational effectiveness and efficiency—improving the energy performance of aircraft, ships, ground vehicles, and military bases; reducing the vulnerability of our fuel supply lines; lowering the load our expeditionary forces must carry; and diversifying the energy supplies we use.

LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTION

Question. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea is pending consideration in the U.S. Senate.

What is your view on whether or not the United States should join the Law of the Sea convention?

Answer. I strongly support U.S. accession to the Law of the Sea Convention. Ratification would allow the United States to take its rightful place and enjoy the benefits and protections of this treaty.

Question. How would being a party to the Law of the Sea convention help or hinder the United States' security posture?

Answer. Becoming a party to the Law of the Sea Convention would enhance the U.S. security posture around the globe in several significant ways. First and foremost, accession would enable the United States to reinforce all of the rights, freedoms, and uses of the sea codified in the Convention, including the navigational and over-flight rights that are critical to the global mobility of U.S. forces as well as the right to submit extended continental shelf claims that would help us preserve the rights to potential resources. Additionally, accession would help the United States to promote a common rules-based approach among other nations to peacefully resolve their territorial and maritime disputes, particularly in East Asia. Further, accession would add to the Department's credibility in a large number of Asia-focused multilateral venues where Law of the Sea matters are discussed. Lastly, accession would reassure some nations who have expressed concerns of the legality of cooperative security efforts that United States supports, such as the Proliferation Security Initiative. The United States has longstanding interests in freedom of the seas and respect for international law, and our accession to the Convention would further demonstrate our commitment to those national interests.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as Secretary of Defense?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

U.S.-ARMENIAN DEFENSE RELATIONSHIP

1. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Hagel, what is your assessment of the U.S.-Armenia defense relationship, and what steps, if any, would you take to strengthen that relationship?

Mr. HAGEL. The U.S.-Armenia defense relationship is sound. As with all relationships, there is room to grow and areas where we can strengthen our cooperation and partnership. That growth will be based on shared interests and willingness to cooperate, available resources, and capacity to absorb new capabilities and missions.

If confirmed, I would continue to engage Armenian leaders to strengthen existing areas of engagement and identify new areas of cooperation that support Armenia's defense reforms, especially its peacekeeping brigade, and continue its ability to deploy in coalition operations. I would look for the United States to be Armenia's partner of choice and help Armenia's defense establishment contribute to regional security and stability.

NUCLEAR TRIAD

2. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Hagel, the Global Zero report provides an illustrative example of a future alternative nuclear policy and force structure in the 2022 timeframe that would eliminate, through negotiated international agreements, our land-based Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles (ICBM) as a means to reduce the size of our nuclear forces consistent with our obligations under Article VI of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT).

Do agree with General Kehler, the Commander of U.S. Strategic Command and with the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review (NPR) that at the present time, the triad of strategic nuclear forces continues to serve U.S. national security interests?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I agree that the NPR's recommendation remains the right one at the present time. I believe that the triad's mix of ICBMs, submarine-launched ballistic missiles (SLBMs), and nuclear-capable heavy bombers continues to support U.S. national security interests under New START limits.

MALIGN IRANIAN INFLUENCE

3. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Hagel, Iran supports proxies in Lebanon, Yemen, Iraq, Afghanistan, Bahrain, and the Western Hemisphere. In your view, what is the impact of Iran's activities in places such as Lebanon, Yemen, Iraq, Afghanistan, Bahrain, and the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. HAGEL. Iranian support for proxy groups and terrorist activities in the Middle East region and in places around the world constitutes a serious threat not only for the stability of our partners and allies who are directly impacted by these activities, but also for U.S. interests. In short, Iran's activities are malevolent and intended to be destabilizing. If confirmed, I intend to focus intently on countering Iran's malign influence—including preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

4. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Hagel, in your view, what role—if any—should the Department of Defense (DOD) play in countering malign Iranian influence in the Middle East?

Mr. HAGEL. In my view, DOD could help to counter Iranian malign activities in at least three ways. First, the Department should support diplomatic and intelligence efforts to inhibit the activities of Iranian proxy and terrorist groups. Second, the Department can leverage its presence in the region to deter and, when directed by the President, disrupt Iranian malign activities. Third, the Department could leverage its extensive security cooperation relationships with countries in the Middle East and around the world to partner in countering Iranian destabilizing activities.

SYRIA

5. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Hagel, the civil war in Syria continues and President Assad's commitment to continuing his regime's ongoing operations appears unwavering—despite broad international condemnation. You have indicated that you share the Obama administration's position that Assad must go. In your view, what is the most effective way to bring about the end of the Assad regime?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that a political transition should remain our goal. The best way to weaken the Assad regime at this time is through political, diplomatic and economic pressure, as well as assisting the unarmed opposition. If confirmed, I will support the President's ongoing reassessment of the continuously changing conditions on the ground in Syria to determine what additional steps may be appropriate.

6. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Hagel, what is your assessment of the composition and intentions of the Syrian opposition?

Mr. HAGEL. Based on my observations, the opposition is made up largely of Syrians wanting to free themselves from a repressive ruler. An important exception is the Al Nusrah Front, which the State Department has listed as an alias of al Qaeda in Iraq. In my view, the United States should continue to encourage the Syrian Opposition Council to pursue an approach that isolates extremist elements but is inclusive of a broad range of communities inside Syria, and I will continue this policy if confirmed.

7. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Hagel, are the opposition's motivations consistent with U.S. interests in the region?

Mr. HAGEL. In Syria, the opposition is made up of disparate groups with varying interests and values. I believe that the Syrian Opposition Council's fundamental motivation to end Assad's rule is consistent with U.S. interests. U.S. efforts in Syria should aim to partner with those groups that share U.S. interests and values, and isolate those groups—such as the Al Nusrah Front—which do not.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JACK REED

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

8. Senator REED. Mr. Hagel, could you please provide clarification of your views on the Armenian genocide?

Mr. HAGEL. As President Obama has emphasized in his April 24th Remembrance Day statements, the achievement of a full, frank, and just acknowledgement of the facts of what occurred in 1915 is in all of our interests. I further concur with the President that the best way to advance that goal is for the Armenian and Turkish people to address the facts of the past as a part of their efforts to move forward. If confirmed, I would continue to strongly support the State Department's efforts to work with Armenia and Turkey to normalize relations so they can forge relationships that are peaceful, productive, and prosperous.

GLOBAL ZERO REPORT

9. Senator REED. Mr. Hagel, there have been a number of questions raised about the Global Zero report on U.S. nuclear policy and force structure. I want to make sure we understand the context of that report. Is it correct that the report provides an illustrative alternative nuclear policy and force structure 10 years in the future—as an example of how we could continue to reduce our reliance on and the number of nuclear forces, in line with our future security requirements?

Mr. HAGEL. In the Global Zero report we took a longer-term view of what might be possible under different circumstances. The policy and force structure it provided was indeed illustrative in nature. The study group's analysis was intended to provide a stimulus to national debate about how many nuclear weapons may be enough in the future, and to illustrate a possible pathway forward.

10. Senator REED. Mr. Hagel, is it correct that the illustrative reductions envisioned would be made through bilateral and multilateral negotiated arms control agreements?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I agree with the administration's view, as stated in the 2010 NPR, that large disparities in nuclear capabilities on either the United States or the Russian side could raise concerns and could hinder our pursuit of a stable, long-term U.S.-Russian relationship. Therefore, I agree that further reductions should be negotiated bilaterally or, if appropriate, multilaterally.

11. Senator REED. Mr. Hagel, is it correct that pursuing additional reductions to our nuclear forces, beyond the limits established in the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), is consistent with our obligations under Article VI of the NPT, and with the findings and conclusions of the April 2010 NPR?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, I believe that pursuing negotiated reductions below New START levels would be consistent with both Article VI of the NPT and with the conclusions of the 2010 NPR.

12. Senator REED. Mr. Hagel, is it correct that the illustrative example of an alternative U.S. nuclear policy and force structure in the next decade would be consistent with maintaining a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent force?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

STRATEGIC DISPERSAL

13. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, our Nation must recognize the spectrum of threats that confront us daily, and position our assets accordingly. Pearl Harbor taught us assets and resources should not be concentrated in one place. Dispersing our capital ships is in our best national security interest and specifically, dispersing the East Coast carrier fleet is a national security priority. One needs to only look at the Pacific Fleet to see an excellent example of strategic dispersal. The Navy has stationed its Pacific Fleet at four different homeports—San Diego, CA; Bremerton, WA; Everett, WA; and Japan, but has been slow to accomplish the same thing with our Atlantic Fleet. The military decision to disperse the fleet has been studied, and restudied. Admiral after admiral, secretary after secretary, have all testified keeping a second Atlantic homeport is essential to national security. In addition, the 2010 Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) clearly states, "To mitigate the risk of a terrorist attack, accident, or natural disaster, the U.S. Navy will homeport an East Coast carrier in Mayport, Florida."

Moving a carrier from Norfolk, VA, to Mayport is a cost-effective national security objective. As Secretary of Defense, will you maintain the DOD's support for moving a carrier from Norfolk to Mayport and, as your predecessors have done, will you ensure strategic dispersal is again added as an objective in the 2014 QDR?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree that our country faces a spectrum of threats and concur that strategic dispersal is a critical element in reducing risk and providing strategic flexibility in the event of natural disaster, manmade calamity or attack by a foreign nation or terrorists. If confirmed, I will look at strategic dispersal as a means of ensuring we address strategic risk to our national security objectives. I support the Department's efforts to continue to prepare Mayport for carrier access.

14. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, will you support the addition of programmed funds in the next President's budget to do so?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will ensure future budgets and the upcoming QDR evaluate all options to maximize our strategic objectives, including strategic dispersal of our carriers on the east coast.

EXCESS CAPACITY IN OVERSEAS MILITARY INSTALLATIONS

15. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, the value of having a forward footprint with our men and women stationed abroad, as well as the cooperation it breeds with our allies, is critical to our national security. However, I am concerned about the excess capacity of U.S. military bases in overseas locations and the drain of our taxpayers dollars to maintain these installations. I believe this excess capacity and the potential for savings needs to be addressed before we begin to close or realign domestic installations. Please share your thoughts on this issue.

Mr. HAGEL. A prudent manager has to look at all options when faced with significant budget pressure. That includes reviewing options for consolidation overseas—particularly in Europe, where the Department is reducing force structure and there are clear opportunities to reduce supporting infrastructure. The Department should begin this review immediately, as specific legislation is not required to consider base closures overseas. However, this should not preclude the Department from taking simultaneous action to realize infrastructure savings at domestic installations. Given the size of the cuts the Department is facing, it is unrealistic to expect to achieve all necessary savings by looking only at overseas infrastructure.

MORATORIUM ON DRILLING IN THE GULF OF MEXICO

16. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, in 2006, you cosponsored the Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act to restrict leasing in areas of the eastern Gulf of Mexico within 125 miles of Florida, including areas in the Gulf of Mexico east of the military mission line. Previous Secretaries of Defense (Rumsfield, Gates) supported a moratorium on drilling east of the military mission line. These training ranges are vital for our fifth generation air superiority assets—F–22, F–35—as well as providing an area for the critical testing of the weaponry on various airframes. As Secretary of Defense, will you maintain this vital military test and training area?

Mr. HAGEL. My understanding is that the Department conducted analysis in 2010 that identified some parts of this region where drilling would not interfere with military activities if the drilling activities are significantly constrained—for example, in some regions, drilling was deemed compatible if the structures were subsurface. If confirmed, I will review this analysis and ensure the Department does not put critical military test and training capabilities at risk.

AFGHANISTAN DRAWDOWN

17. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, President Obama plans to withdraw combat forces from Afghanistan by 2014. The U.S. and North Atlantic Treaty Organization

(NATO) allies are transitioning from fighting to training and advising the Afghan security forces, and during his recent meeting with President Karzai, President Obama signaled the transition to Afghan security forces may be accelerated. What footprint should the U.S. and NATO allies have after 2014?

Mr. HAGEL. The President has stated, and I agree, that the scope of the international mission in Afghanistan after 2014 should focus on two primary objectives: first, to deny safe haven to al Qaeda and its affiliates; and second, to train, advise, and assist the Afghan forces so they can maintain their own security. This mission shift is consistent with what was agreed upon by the United States, NATO allies, and ISAF and Afghan partners at the Chicago NATO Summit last year and also with our long-term Strategic Partnership Agreement with the Afghan Government, signed May 1, 2012. I understand that the President is considering a range of options provided by his military commanders and national security team. I have not been a part of those discussions, but, if confirmed, I will work to ensure that the appropriate resources and capabilities are made available for the post-2014 mission.

18. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, how will the Afghanistan Government afford to maintain their military operations?

Mr. HAGEL. At the 2012 NATO Summit in Chicago, the United States, NATO allies, and other international partners pledged to provide significant financial assistance after 2014 to help maintain the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF). The Afghan Government also pledged to provide at least $500 million a year for the ANSF beginning in 2015, and to increase this amount over time as its economy grows. The international donor community has also pledged its support to Afghanistan's continued economic and social development after 2014 through commitments made at the 2012 Tokyo conference, including pledges for $16 billion in civilian aid over 4 years. With this support, as Afghanistan's economy grows and its revenues increase, Afghanistan will increasingly be able to take responsibility for future security costs. Further, it is my understanding that DOD is working closely with the Afghan Government to ensure that the force we are building and developing is a sustainable one. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Afghan Government to ensure that the ANSF is sustainable within available resources.

CAMP LEJEUNE WATER CONTAMINATION

19. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, Florida has 16,000 veterans and civilians in the Camp Lejeune water contamination registry, second only to North Carolina. The Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry (ATSDR) is completing studies designed to determine the size and scope of water contamination at Camp Lejeune. In January, ATSDR released the preliminary results of a drinking water study, which shows the following:

- Housing complex drinking water was contaminated with dry cleaning solvents from 1957 to 1987 above the current Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) limits.
- Separate housing areas were contaminated with organic compounds (from 1 million gallons of spilled gasoline) from 1953 to 1985 above the current EPA limits.

Recent ATSDR findings show drinking water contamination at Camp Lejeune from 1953 through 1987. Although the U.S. Navy Bureau of Medicine had established Navy drinking water standards during this time period, DOD continues to state that no standards existed. As Secretary of Defense, will you ensure that these misleading statements from the Navy and Marine Corps receive the proper oversight from you?

Mr. HAGEL. The health and well-being of our servicemembers, their families, and civilian employees is of the utmost importance to me. If confirmed, I will be committed to finding answers to the many questions surrounding the historic water quality issue at Camp Lejeune and ensuring appropriate oversight of these efforts. Working with the leaders of the Navy and Marine Corps, I will engage the proper experts and review all the facts pertaining to the Bureau of Medicine Instruction to which you refer, ensuring that accurate information is provided to all who believe they may have been exposed to contaminated water at Camp Lejeune. The Department will continue to understand the meaning of ongoing scientific efforts and provide comprehensive science-based answers to our servicemembers, their families, and civilian employees.

I applaud Congress' efforts to support families through the passage of the Honoring America's Veterans and Caring for Camp Lejeune Families Act of 2012 and

I pledge to support the Department of Veterans Affairs efforts to properly implement the legislation.

AIR FORCE OVERSIGHT

20. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, the Air Force recently released two major decisions which affected Florida: the Air Force Materiel Command (AFMC) reorganization and the KC–46 basing selection. We believe there is room for improvement in regards to the Air Force routing and seeking validation through the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) on these very important decisions.

In regards to the KC–46 basing decision and the analysis to determine future requirements, the level of engagement and coordination between the Air Force and Combatant Commands (COCOM), as well as OSD validation of the Air Force decision, requires additional attention.

On December 18, 2012, in section 2814 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2013, the Air Force was directed to submit a report and include the efficiencies and effectiveness associated with the AFMC reorganization, as well as the extent to which the proposed changes were coordinated with OSD.

Critical decisions of a strategic nature need to be properly coordinated with the COCOMs. As Secretary of Defense, how will you direct your staff to ensure the Air Force seeks OSD validation prior to releasing decisions such as these?

Mr. HAGEL. It is my understanding that each Service has a decisionmaking methodology and process for managing its operations, organizational structure, and basing decisions. OSD oversees these efforts, which involve key stakeholders including the COCOM. For reorganization decisions such as these, I think it is important that the Secretary of Defense allow the Military Departments the latitude to make proposals to streamline management functions while also preserving core capabilities. OSD oversight of this process ensures that affected stakeholders have the opportunity to provide their perspective on the implications of proposed changes. If confirmed, I will ensure my staff and the combatant commands continue to appropriately examine the Air Force approach to basing decisions.

TAIWAN RELATIONS ACT

21. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act and the Six Assurances of 1982 have contributed to the peace and stability of the Asia-Pacific region for the past 3 decades. With the military balance—including air superiority—gradually shifting in China's favor, what are your plans to implement the security commitment the United States has for Taiwan under this framework?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree that the Taiwan Relations Act has contributed to peace and stability in the region for over 30 years. In my view, the increasing complexity and sophistication of the military threat to Taiwan from China means that Taiwan must devote greater attention to asymmetric concepts and innovative technologies to maximize Taiwan's strengths and advantages. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, throughout DOD, and with our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act.

22. Senator NELSON. Mr. Hagel, as Taiwan is likely to retire some of its older fighter aircraft in the next 5 to 10 years, do you believe that sales of advanced aircraft are a next step in this commitment?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, throughout DOD and with our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act. If confirmed, I will look at what specific capabilities will help Taiwan meet its self-defense needs in light of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait and the evolving military capabilities on the mainland.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

CONTRACTING REFORM

23. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Hagel, in 2011, in its final report to Congress, the Commission on Wartime Contracting found that as much as $60 billion, roughly $12 million "every day for the past 10 years," was lost to waste or fraud through contracts in Iraq and Afghanistan. In addition to the financial costs, the Commission found that poor planning, management, and oversight of contracts damaged the United States' strategic and diplomatic objectives overseas. Building on the Commission's recommendations, last year I offered legislation, along with our former Senate colleague, Jim Webb, to reform wartime contracting practices within DOD, the Department of State, and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID). Major provisions of this legislation were signed into law as part of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013.

Section 843 of the new law requires the Secretary to establish a chain of authority and responsibility for policy, planning, and execution of operational contract support. Do I have your commitment to direct the needed resources to look at our over-reliance on contractors and our loss of core capabilities in certain areas and to report back to me on the responsibilities you lay out after this review?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. If confirmed, you have my commitment to look at the Department's reliance on the use of contractors in contingency operations and to assess what core capabilities should be retained in DOD.

24. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Hagel, section 846 requires the Secretary of Defense to conduct a risk assessment of certain types of contracting, including not only private security contractors, but also contracts for training, intelligence, and a host of other problem areas. You have your pick of poster child case studies in Iraq and Afghanistan to know this is a problem. DOD does not operate in a vacuum in wartime. Do I have your commitment to work with the State Department and USAID, who are also subject to this provision, and to conduct this assessment based not just on whether you are legally entitled to contract something out, but on whether it makes sense in the long term, for both our military mission and our own future capabilities to do so?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. If confirmed, I will work with State Department and USAID in conducting the required risk assessment of contingency contracting from not just a legal perspective but also from the perspective of our long-term capability needs.

F/A–18

25. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Hagel, the F/A–18 program has been a model acquisition program, and continues to deliver Super Hornets on-time and on-schedule at less than half the cost of an F–35. The fact is, the Super Hornet is an aircraft that has performed superbly in virtually every combat operation and delivers nearly all of the capability.

As the F–35 program continues to slip, we are nearing the end of the production line for the Super Hornet, which is currently scheduled to shut down in 2014. I am concerned that the United States could be left with a gap in the defense industrial bases' ability to produce strike fighters and eliminates DOD's ability to rely on the F/A–18 lines to manage future F–35 cost, performance, and schedule risks. As Secretary of Defense, how would you address this gap?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will assess the strike fighter capability mix, the progress of the F–35, and the state of the F/A–18 production line to determine if a gap exists and evaluate the options to address it for feasibility and affordability.

26. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Hagel, international sales of the F/A–18 could help mitigate the risk of the closing of domestic strike fighter production line that can address our own strike fighter shortfall. Will you ensure that DOD actively supports international sales of the F/A–18?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department actively supports foreign military sales of U.S. defense products including the F–18.

SEXUAL ASSAULT

27. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Hagel, DOD under Secretary Panetta's leadership has implemented a number of initiatives to try to curb sexual assaults in the military—a problem he has stated could be six times greater than reported—and we have seen both military and civilian leaders acknowledge that sexual assault is a problem that affects the recruitment, retention, and readiness of our armed forces. This committee has taken up the issue of sexual violence in the military and has implemented some reforms in the NDAA, most recently in fiscal year 2013.

We have seen some promising programs developed by the Services, as well. You mentioned in one of your responses to the advance policy questions that you look forward to hearing about the outcome of the Air Force's pilot program that assigns an attorney to each victim of sexual assault who requests one to represent them through the process. I have been impressed by the training for special investigators going on at the Army's Military Police School at Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri. This course has been recognized as the "gold standard" for special investigator training, which both DOD and Congress have encouraged the other Services to follow.

As a former prosecutor, I understand how critically important the investigation process is to the outcome of sexual assault cases. The investigation process is also key for victims, as victims may feel more comfortable coming forward to report their cases if they have confidence that the military justice system is working and that perpetrators will be brought to justice.

While I recognize each of the Military Services have a unique history and culture, that should not be an excuse for refusing to adopt best practices to combat a problem they all share. Will you push the Services to adopt best practices in their efforts to combat sexual assault?

Mr. HAGEL. It is my understanding that the Services are sharing information about their processes and working to adopt these best practices across the Services. If confirmed, I will work to continue and expand this important effort.

28. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Hagel, will you review whether the Services have done enough, in your view, to address the problem of sexual assault within the military?

Mr. HAGEL. Sexual assault is a horrible crime and cannot be tolerated, ignored, or condoned in DOD. If confirmed, I will be fully committed to combating this crime and determined in reducing the instance of sexual assault, with a goal of eliminating it from the military.

I know that the over the past year, the Department has developed and implemented several new policies and procedures to prevent the crime of sexual assault, support victims, strengthen investigations, and hold offenders appropriately accountable. I also know that these efforts are not enough.

The Department must continue its multi-discplinary approach in combatting sexual assault. Prevention efforts are important, so that the crimes do not happen in the first place. These efforts must ensure that every servicemember, from top to bottom in our military ranks, knows that dignity and respect are core values we must all live by.

But accountability is key and people who violate the standards of acceptable behavior must be held appropriately accountable for their actions. I believe a positive first step was elevating the initial disposition of the most serious sexual assault cases to the level of colonel or Navy captain, or higher. Military commanders are essential to making sexual assault prevention and response efforts successful.

I look forward to learning more about the Department's ongoing program to develop Special Victims Capabilities across each of the Services, a program legislated in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, and which is under development in the Department in the form of special training and standardized procedures for investigators, prosecutors, paralegals, and victim witness liaisons. This program's objective is to enhance the quality of investigations and accountability in sexual assault cases and I fully support it.

I also look forward to hearing more about the impact of the Air Force's pilot program, implemented in January, which assigns an attorney to a victim of sexual assault who requests one to represent them. I believe this could be a very good way to improve accountability. It will improve victim confidence and increase the number of victims who are willing to report; thereby increasing the number of cases that can be investigated and the number of cases in which offenders can be held appropriately accountable.

If confirmed, I will be resolute in advancing the Department's prevention, investigation, accountability, victim support and assessment programs in order that we address the problem of sexual assault in a persistent, comprehensive, and effective manner.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MARK UDALL

ALTERNATIVE ENERGY PROGRAMS

29. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, do you believe that the U.S. military's dependence on foreign oil represents a national security risk?

Mr. HAGEL. I am concerned about the Nation's dependence on foreign oil. At the same time, U.S. military forces need to be able to buy fuel wherever they operate. I support efforts to reduce the military's energy needs and diversify supplies in order to increase military effectiveness.

30. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, do you support the continuation of DOD's energy conservation and alternative energy development programs?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the continuation of energy initiatives that improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the Defense mission. The Department has a long history of harnessing innovation to meet defense challenges in ways that can benefit the civilian economy, and there is potential for such gains in this case.

31. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, do you believe those programs represent a strategic investment that will benefit U.S. national security and increase our military capabilities?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. Energy efficiency and alternative energy programs are critical for cost savings, operational effectiveness, and our strategic national security goals. The Department has a long history of harnessing innovation to meet defense challenges in ways that can benefit the civilian economy, and there is potential for such gains in this case.

AFRICA

32. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, what specific actions should be taken by DOD to address the wave of extremism in the Sahel region of Africa?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe the United States should continue to support France's strong actions to counter al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb's effort to establish a safe haven in Mali, including by providing DOD assistance. The Departments of Defense and State should also continue contributing to the robust international support to the African-led International Support Mission in Mali (AFISMA). AFISMA will help to degrade the threat posed by al Qaeda and allied terrorist groups and put Mali on a path to stability.

Elsewhere in the Sahel region, the United States should continue to work with regional partners to strengthen their security capacities and create the conditions to apply region-wide pressure on extremist groups.

33. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, what methods would you prescribe to prevent additional countries and national governments in North Africa from falling to extremists?

Mr. HAGEL. Extremists in North Africa clearly pose a significant threat to regional stability. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of State, other interagency counterparts, international partners and allies, and countries across the region to build the capacity of their militaries to counter these threats and to assist North African governments in improving governance and security for their populations. This includes preventing the expansion of terrorist networks and then degrading and, ultimately, defeating terrorist groups.

PAKISTAN

34. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, do you believe that there are steps that the United States should take to further pressure Pakistan to withdraw their tacit support for terrorist groups like Lashkar-e-Taiba and the Haqqani Network in order to enhance the prospects for a stable peace in the region?

Mr. HAGEL. The ability of militant and terrorist networks to operate on Pakistani soil poses a threat to the United States, Pakistan, and other countries in South Asia. Therefore, the United States should continue to work to ensure that Pakistan meets its commitments, including supporting a durable settlement in Afghanistan, pressuring the Haqqani Network, and not allowing Pakistani territory to be used to launch terrorist attacks on other countries. Our approach should apply diplomatic pressure where needed and ensure our security assistance, which is an important tool, is not unconditional but conditions advance U.S. strategic interests.

MILITARY HEALTHCARE

35. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, as Secretary of Defense, would you continue to prioritize funding for military suicide prevention programs, as well as for improved treatment for physical and psychological injuries?

Mr. HAGEL. I am deeply concerned about the significant rise in military suicides and am firmly committed to prioritizing funding for the full range of the Department's mental and physical health programs. These programs include: suicide prevention programs, such as the Army's Shoulder to Shoulder and Navy's Combat and Operational Stress Control resilience and fitness programs; peer-to-peer programs such as the Vets4Warriors which focuses on our Reserve members; transition and family support programs, such as Recovery Care Coordination; and quality of life programs, such as those offered through Military OneSource. In addition, I will continue ongoing collaboration with the Department of Veterans Affairs, with continued emphasis on the Military Crisis Line, to ensure that our members receive support as they transition back to their civilian lives. Finally, and most importantly, I agree with Secretary Panetta that there is a significant leadership role and responsibility for preventing suicides and building the resilience of the force. If confirmed, I will continue to look for opportunities to improve our military and civilian leaders' ability to understand the needs of distressed servicemembers and reduce stigma so that they can be properly guided to the support they need.

ROLE OF THE RESERVE COMPONENT

36. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, would you agree that, over the last decade, the National Guard and Reserves have demonstrated their value to the military mission in support of domestic disaster relief, combat operations, and in a variety of other roles at home and abroad?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. The National Guard and Reserves have played an integral role during the past decade, mobilizing in unprecedented numbers for the wars in Afghanistan. They have also been critical to Homeland defense and security, highlighted by their heroic efforts during Hurricane Sandy.

37. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, please discuss your views of the Reserve and National Guard and the role they should play in the coming years.

Mr. HAGEL. The Reserve components have served with distinction over more than a decade of war and continue to be a relevant and cost effect part of the Total Force. In a time of declining budgets and complex contingencies, I believe that the Department will continue to call on both Active and Reserve components to accomplish the domestic and overseas requirements of the new strategy. I understand that the Department is still in the process of finding the proper Active component/Reserve component mix that will most effectively accomplish our new strategy in a constrained fiscal environment. If confirmed, I will work with our military leaders on this important issue.

RUSSIAN POLICIES

38. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, since Vladimir Putin was reelected as Russia's president, the Russian Federation has sent mixed signals for what its defense and foreign policies will be going forward. The creation of a so-called "Eurasian Union"—which would consist of Russia and other former Soviet republics—was a key component of President Putin's campaign platform, and is viewed by some as an attempt by Russia to "re-Sovietize" the region, which would pressure U.S. allies in the region. Former Senator John Kerry (nominated to be Secretary of State) has reaffirmed the U.S. Government's unwavering support for the independence of these countries and their right to choose "political, military, [and] economic" alliances "free from coercion". One such U.S. strategic partner, Azerbaijan, recently allowed a lease with Russia for the Gabala Radar station—the last Russian installation on Azerbaijan's soil—to expire due to a disagreement over the cost of the lease, continuing a trend of moving away from Moscow's orbit. As Secretary of Defense, what will be your policy to ensure that the independence of U.S. strategic partners in the region is preserved?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will support continuing engagement with the leaders of the defense and security institutions of former Soviet Republics to advance reform and defense modernization goals, to contribute to regional stability and security, and to advance our shared security interests. It is possible for countries in the region to preserve their independence while also having a constructive, positive relationship with the United States, Russia, and other countries. As sovereign independent nations these countries must pursue the bilateral and multinational relationships that they assess are in their own national interests, but I would work to ensure the United States is the partner of choice. Working with the Department of State and other U.S. agencies, I would, if confirmed, continue to support partners in the region building their government institutions, practices, and capabilities to enable them to exercise the full measure of responsibilities and opportunities of independent, sovereign countries.

COOPERATIVE THREAT REDUCTION

39. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, do you support the work conducted under the Cooperative Threat Reduction (CTR) programs which seek to eliminate threats, demilitarize systems, and to secure stocks of existing weapons of mass destruction (WMD)?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I believe that the Cooperative Threat Reduction Program is a vital mechanism for partnering with other nations to counter the threat posed by weapons of mass destruction. The program is now global and focused on core U.S. priorities, including nuclear security, countering biological threats, and destroying chemical weapons. If confirmed, I will continue to support the work of this vital program.

40. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, how would you characterize your own views on the importance and priorities of the CTR program, originally undertaken in the former Soviet Union, and more recently expanding into other territories including Africa and the Middle East?

Mr. HAGEL. In the immediate aftermath of the Cold War, I believe that it made good sense for the CTR program to focus on reducing the threat posed by the former Soviet Union's nuclear arsenal. Based on information currently available to me, I believe that the program's recent expansion into new geographic areas, including Africa, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia also makes good sense, as does a new focus on biological threats. In my view, CTR remains a very important tool in reducing risks to the United States.

NUCLEAR MODERNIZATION

41. Senator UDALL. Mr. Hagel, do you support the restoration of funding appropriations to maintain the U.S. nuclear triad, and for key nuclear infrastructure programs such as the Chemistry and Metallurgy Research Replacement Nuclear Facility in the fiscal year 2013 appropriations bills?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the President's commitment to a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent as long as nuclear weapons exist. I believe that maintaining the triad and modernizing our nuclear forces and the nuclear weapons infrastructure are national security priorities. If confirmed, I will give sustained attention to these issues.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KAY R. HAGAN

SEXUAL ASSAULT/DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

42. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, as you and I discussed earlier this week, the number of sexual assault and domestic violence cases reported in the military every year is appalling. Studies show that there are 3,200 reported cases every year, but even more astonishing is that the actual number is estimated at 19,000 cases. This means that somewhere around 80 percent of all cases go unreported.

A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report concluded that most victims stay silent because of "the belief that nothing would be done; fear of ostracism, harassment, or ridicule . . . or labeled trouble makers." That same report goes on to say that some victims go silent because they do the math: only 8 percent of cases that are investigated end in prosecution, compared with 40 percent for civilians arrested for sex crimes.

This year's NDAA included provisions to combat this problem, including enhanced education, training, and awareness for our troops and the leadership. While this is a positive step, just having a zero-tolerance policy and getting out the message is not always enough.

If confirmed, do you pledge to ensure the NDAA sexual assault provisions are implemented as rapidly as possible?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

43. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, how do you intend to further prevent sexual assault and domestic violence?

Mr. HAGEL. Sexual assault is a horrible crime and it cannot be tolerated, ignored, or condoned in DOD. If confirmed, I will be fully committed to combating this crime and determined in reducing sexual assault, with a goal of eliminating it from the military.

I know that the over the past year, the Department has developed and implemented several new policies and procedures to prevent the crime of sexual assault, support victims, strengthen investigations, and hold offenders appropriately accountable. I also know that these efforts are not enough.

The Department must continue its multi-disciplinary approach in combating sexual assault. Prevention efforts are important, so that the crimes do not happen in the first place. These efforts must ensure that every servicemember, from top to bottom in our military ranks, knows that dignity and respect are core values we must all live by.

44. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, how will you approach fostering an environment where victims feel safe to come forward to report these crimes?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe a first step in this area is an Air Force pilot program, implemented in January, which assigns an attorney to a victim of sexual assault who requests one to represent them. I believe this could be a very good way to increase accountability. It will improve victim confidence, increase the number of victims who are willing to report; thereby increasing the number of cases that can be investigated and the number of cases in which offenders can be held appropriately accountable. If confirmed, I will continue to study the impact of this pilot program and look for other initiatives that may be helpful.

45. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, how do intend to increase accountability at all levels—not only of the perpetrators, but also of their leadership?

Mr. HAGEL. Accountability is key and people who violate the standards of acceptable behavior must be held appropriately accountable for their actions. I applaud Secretary Panetta's decision last year to elevate the initial disposition of the most serious sexual assault cases to the level of colonel or Navy captain, or higher. Military commanders are essential to making sexual assault prevention and response efforts successful.

I also look forward to learning more about the Department's ongoing program to develop Special Victims Capabilities across each of the Services, a program legislated in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, and which is under development in the Department in the form of special training and standardized procedures for investigators, prosecutors, paralegals, and victim witness liaisons. This program's objective is to enhance the quality of investigations and accountability in sexual assault cases. I fully support it.

CAMP LEJEUNE WATER CONTAMINATION

46. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, historic and recent public statements made by the leadership of the U.S. Marine Corps cite that at the time of the drinking water contamination period aboard Camp Lejeune, there were no regulatory standards governing the organic chemicals which fouled the water aboard the base. Yet, recent Department of the Navy and Marine Corps documents uncovered by former marines and their families affected by the contamination indicate there was indeed a Naval regulatory standard in place for total organics in potable water as early as 1963 (NAVMED P–5010–5 and BUMED 6240.3B and beginning in 1972, version C).

As Secretary of Defense, what steps would you take to ensure the Department of the Navy and Marine Corps are truthfully conveying pertinent facts, disseminating important developments to the Camp Lejeune community, and allowing the community a voice in the matter to ensure total transparency regarding this issue?

Mr. HAGEL. The health and well-being of our servicemembers, their families, and civilian employees is of the utmost importance to me. If I am confirmed, I will be committed to finding answers to the many questions surrounding the historic water quality issue at Camp Lejeune, including ensuring appropriate oversight of these efforts. I will work with the leadership of the Navy and Marine Corps to engage the proper experts and review all the facts pertaining to the Bureau of Medicine Instruction to which you refer, ensuring that accurate information is provided to all who believe they may have been exposed to contaminated water at Camp Lejeune. The Department will continue to understand the meaning of ongoing scientific efforts and provide comprehensive science-based answers to our servicemembers, their families, and civilian employees.

I applaud Congress' efforts to support families through the passage of the Honoring America's Veterans and Caring for Camp Lejeune Families Act of 2012 and I pledge to aggressively support the Department of Veterans Affairs efforts to properly implement the legislation.

BIOFUELS

47. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, in August 2011, the Departments of the Navy, Agriculture, and Energy signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) to invest $510 million to spur production of advanced aviation and marine biofuels under the Defense Production Act. The joint-MOU, where each Department contributes $170 million, requires substantial cost-sharing from private industry of at least a one-to-one match.

Critics of the MOU claim the Department of Energy (DOE) should be the only Government agency involved in the promotion of advanced biofuels. While DOE must certainly play an important role, I believe the Navy and the Department of Agriculture also need to be involved. From my perspective, leveraging the unique capabilities of each agency—in partnership with the private sector—exemplifies the type of innovative approach needed to solve our country's most vexing challenges.

As the end-user of this fuel, do you believe there are significant benefits of having the Navy participate in this initiative?

Mr. HAGEL. I have not reviewed all the details of this initiative; however, all of the Military Services require fuel to operate, so all, including the Navy, have an interest in promoting military energy security and have the potential to benefit from such an initiative. I agree that it is important for the Department to leverage the expertise of civilian agencies that have the lead or an interest in this area. The Defense Department has a long history of harnessing innovation to meet defense challenges in ways that can benefit the civilian economy, and there is potential for such gains in this case.

48. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, would you agree that leveraging the unique capabilities of these three agencies enhances the prospects for programmatic success?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #47.

49. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, in this budgetary environment, I understand that difficult decisions need to be made about funding defense programs. However, as the largest single consumer of fuel in the world, DOD uses approximately 120 million barrels of oil each year and spent over $17 billion in fiscal year 2011 on fuel alone. This dependency on a single source of energy jeopardized our military's readiness. When the price of oil goes up $1, it costs the Navy an additional $30 million and the entire DOD over $100 million. In 2011, the Navy was forced to pay an additional $500 million because the price of fuel was higher than budgeted. Costs overruns could force the military to curtail training and less urgent operations—resulting in increased risk to future missions.

Do you believe that developing a commercially viable biofuels industry will help DOD diversify its fuel sources, reduce the risk of energy volatility, and ultimately produce cost savings for the Navy?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe it is in the long-term energy security interests of the United States to promote a commercially viable biofuels industry. A commercially competitive industry could help to reduce market volatility and reduce risk. If confirmed, I will look into the role biofuels could play in increasing military capabilities and lowering costs and risks for the Navy and other military departments.

LITHIUM

50. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, DOD has indicated that sustaining domestic capacity of lithium metals is critical because of the military's reliance on rechargeable lithium batteries in the field and the importance of lithium to developing next generation batteries. Do you believe it is in our national security interest to secure domestic production of lithium metal and reduce our reliance on imports from China?

Mr. HAGEL. My understanding is the Department is examining a range of options to ensure adequate and sustainable supply of lithium metal. If confirmed, I am committed to ensuring the Department has access to lithium metals, using all authorities available.

51. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Hagel, will you consider using authorities under the Defense Product Act to accomplish this goal?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #50.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOE MANCHIN III

DOWNSIZING THE FORCE

52. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. Hagel, if you are confirmed as Secretary of Defense, you will oversee the military's largest personnel downsizing in a generation. This, I believe, is one of the most important tasks facing the next Secretary, especially with the high rate of veterans' unemployment. I am very concerned about telling servicemembers, many who deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan multiple times, their services are no longer needed as the force downsizes. If confirmed, what approach would you bring to overseeing this massive personnel drawdown?

Mr. HAGEL. The Department must take care of its people, not only while they are serving, but it is an obligation that continues through the transition to civilian life. We, as a Nation, owe it to them for the sacrifices they have made.

It is my understanding that the Department has worked with the Department of Veterans Affairs, Department of Labor, the Small Business Administration, and the Department of Education to redesign the Transition Assistance Program (TAP). The redesigned TAP curriculum contains a Department of Labor sponsored employment workshop, a Veterans Affairs benefits briefing and registrations, a financial planning workshop and Service-specific training to equip members with the tools needed to successfully pursue their post military goals. The Department is also working with other agencies to meet the mandates of the VOW to Hire Heroes Act.

If confirmed, I will look at the services available for our men and women, both those that continue to serve and those that transition to civilian life.

DOD AUDIT

53. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. Hagel, in your advance policy questions you provided the following statement regarding the Pentagon's audit objectives: "Yes. I support the effort and will maintain the Department's commitment to producing audit-ready financial statements by the congressional deadline of September 2017, with an audit beginning by the end of calendar year 2017." Will you do everything in your power to speed this process up?

Mr. HAGEL. Improving the Department's financial management capability is an important priority and, if confirmed, I will ensure that senior leaders throughout the Department are focused on this goal and hold them accountable. While I will push for this effort to be completed as soon as possible and by the dates we have set, the Department must also be careful not to take manual or "heroic" steps to achieve this goal in an inefficient manner. I understand Congress has, in fact, directed DOD not to follow such an approach.

MILITARY FAMILIES

54. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. Hagel, DOD will face difficult budgetary choices in the future. Priorities will need to be evaluated and some programs will face cancellation or reduction. After a decade of war it is not only our soldiers that feel the stress, but so do their families. How will you help ensure programs for military families continue to be a high priority for DOD?

Mr. HAGEL. I share the concern of our senior military leaders that fiscal constraints will affect the very necessary programs needed to support the families of our servicemembers. If confirmed, I will seek to prioritize funding for family readiness programs to ensure that the quality of support for our military families is not negatively affected by budget reductions while also identifying the most effective programs and best practices. If confirmed, I will work through a newly formed Task Force on Common Services for military families to seek to protect funding for family readiness programs.

U.S. ROLE IN THE PACIFIC

55. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. Hagel, there has been an increase in tension in the East China Sea around the Senkaku Islands in recent months. In your view, what is the role of the United States in territorial disputes in Asia?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the President's policy that while the United States does not take sides over competing claims, the United States opposes any and all forms of coercion to resolve disputes or apply pressure (including economic measures). In addition, I believe that the United States should continue to make clear that we will meet our Treaty commitments.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JEANNE SHAHEEN

SEQUESTRATION

56. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, in your responses to the advance policy questions, you support Secretary Panetta's assessment of the damaging effects that sequestration would have on the entire DOD and defense industries. Please describe the negative impact to military families should Congress fail to reach an agreement.

Mr. HAGEL. Sequestration will reduce the operations and maintenance (O&M) funding that is used to train our troops, to run our bases, and to run many of our family support programs. While the Department is still finalizing its assessment of specific impacts, I believe the these cuts in O&M funding will likely force cuts in our civilian workforce that will lead to cuts in the hours, services, and staffing available at clinics, family support centers, libraries, and athletic facilities. Furthermore, I believe the Department has already concluded sequestration will force significant cuts in the maintenance of DOD facilities, which directly affects quality of life.

If confirmed I will make it a priority to minimize the impact of sequestration on our military families. Sustaining family support programs in these days of extreme budget uncertainties will be challenging, but it is an integral part of our military readiness. If confirmed, I will seek to minimize funding cuts to family support programs to the greatest extent possible.

57. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, please describe the negative impact to our defense industrial base should Congress fail to reach an agreement.

Mr. HAGEL. Sequestration would significantly curtail important industrial base capabilities and skills which, if lost, would be difficult, expensive, and perhaps even impossible to replace. My understanding is that the Department has worked diligently to preserve those truly unique industrial base assets. Sequestration would render these careful efforts largely ineffectual. I believe the Department is still assessing the impact on specific weapons programs and service support contracts, and that those impacts will vary from case to case, but each such program will be cut by about 10 percent.

WOMEN'S HEALTHCARE

58. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, there have been a number of positive steps taken over the last year with respect to eliminating inequalities facing women in our military. One of which was our effort to bring female servicemember reproductive health care in line with Federal standards, to ensure women in uniform have the same access to care as their civilian counterparts. I was encouraged that we were able to change this policy during last year's NDAA, and I look forward to its full implementation.

It is my understanding that the Surgeon's Generals of each of the Services will issue guidance to their Departments to ensure that doctors and nurses are aware of new medical options available and are prepared to advise their patients. I also understand that the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office will issue guidance to victim advocates to ensure they are aware of this policy change and are prepared to brief victims on the full range of medical options now available. Do you commit to implementing this measure, which is now law, to ensure that our service women have the same health care as the civilians they protect?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I am committed to ensuring that our female servicemembers are afforded the same reproductive health care options as women in the civilian population. I will work with the Services to guarantee that all medical personnel are aware of the new options and that every victim has all resources available. I assure you that I will fully implement all laws protecting women servicemembers' reproductive rights. My goal is to ensure the health care provided to our servicemembers remains world class and contemporary.

LESBIAN/BISEXUAL/GAY/TRANSGENDERED MILITARY FAMILIES

59. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, as the implementation of the repeal of Don't Ask, Don't Tell policy continues, concerns have been raised about remaining inequalities faced by Lesbian/Bisexual/Gay/Transgendered (LBGT) military families. We have a case in New Hampshire which demonstrates the pain and injustice inflicted by the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA). Charlie Morgan is a chief warrant officer in the Army National Guard. She served her country in the Active Army, the Reserve and the Guard, and most recently, she was deployed to Kuwait. Unfortunately, she has been diagnosed with inoperable breast cancer and due to DOMA, her spouse, Karen, is denied any survivor benefits, and she is prohibited from health coverage worth well in excess of $10,000 a year. She also cannot get a base pass that would let her escort her 4-year-old daughter to medical appointments on base. Though I recognize that certain restrictions on monetary benefits apply to LGBT families under DOMA, will you commit to ensuring that LGBT families are fully incorporated into military communities and social programs?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. As I have said, I know firsthand the profound sacrifice our servicemembers and their families make. We must always take care of our people. That is why, if confirmed as Secretary of Defense, I will do everything possible to the extent permissible under current law to provide equal benefits to the families of all our servicemembers, as members of our military community.

SUBMARINES

60. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, recent operations in Libya, Somalia, and around the globe highlight the value submarines continue to bring to the fight in both our conventional and covert operations. Can you discuss the importance of our undersea warfare capability, particularly with respect to the capabilities the Virginia-class submarines bring to the Navy?

Mr. HAGEL. U.S. undersea warfare capabilities are unparalleled in the world and give us an asymmetric advantage against our adversaries in both peace and war. Our U.S. Navy dominates the undersea domain, using attack and guided missile submarines for a variety of clandestine missions, including intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance, indications and warning, and special operations forces insertion and recovery. Submarines operate covertly in places that overt units cannot, providing unequaled capability for intelligence collection.

Ballistic missile submarines, the most survivable leg of the nuclear triad, are vital to the national mission of strategic deterrence, and under New START will comprise an increasing percentage of our operationally deployed weapons.

To maintain our undersea dominance, we must continue a vigorous submarine building program. The Virginia-class program is the Navy's most successful shipbuilding program, consistently providing submarines ahead of schedule and under budget.

PACIFIC VERSUS ATLANTIC FOCUS

61. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, obviously, our strategic shift towards the Asia-Pacific region prioritizes assets in that area of responsibility (AOR). However, as recent operations in Libya and Mali, as well as challenges throughout the Mediterranean, the Middle East, and North Africa demonstrate, we must maintain the capability to quickly respond to contingencies on the Atlantic side as well. Considering the uncertain and complex world of threats we face, how important is it to maintain flexibility and balance to ensure that our shift does not leave us vulnerable on the Atlantic side of the country?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree that our military forces need to remain flexible, agile, and balanced in order to be ready for challenges around the world. I think that DOD recognizes the complexity and uncertainty of the global security environment and avoids predicting with certainty how the future will unfold. As outlined in the January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance, the Department is developing an adaptable and technologically-advanced Joint Force capable of responding to a wide range of contingencies. Regardless of where U.S. military forces may be positioned or stationed, one of the key advantages of our military is that we can bring to bear effective capabilities virtually anywhere throughout the world to address the threats countering our interests.

ISRAEL

62. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, the Senate Armed Services Committee (SASC) has been a strong proponent of U.S.-Israeli cooperation on missile defense and has provided significant funding for cooperative efforts, like the Arrow system, David's Sling, and the Iron Dome. Last year, the SASC provided $211 million to help Israel procure additional Iron Dome defense systems in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013. What is your view on the importance of these cooperative programs?

Mr. HAGEL. I strongly support U.S.-Israel cooperative efforts on missile defense, including Iron Dome. U.S. cooperation with Israel, enabled by congressional support, has led to the development of one of the most comprehensive missile defense architectures in the world. Each of the Israeli programs—Iron Dome, David's Sling, and Arrow—fill a critical requirement in a multi-layered architecture that has been designed to protect the Israeli populace from existing and emerging threats.

63. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, will you commit to continuing these programs?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, if confirmed, I will seek to continue these programs and to expand them as appropriate. As we saw in Operation Pillar of Defense in Gaza, these programs are a lifesaving investment in Israel's future and our defense relationship.

SERVICEMEMBER REINTEGRATION

64. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, you noted in your response to the advance policy questions that you are committed to working with State and local governments as well as private and community organizations to support reintegration of returning servicemembers, particularly those with combat injuries. Several States have established successful programs designed to augment reintegration services provided through DOD's Yellow Ribbon Reintegration Program (YRRP). New Hampshire's Deployment Cycle Support program is an example of these efforts that combine State and local as well as public and private funds to provide comprehensive assistance to military families. What steps can DOD take to better support these State and local efforts to ensure their continued success?

Mr. HAGEL. I am very familiar with the congressionally-mandated YRRP established in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2008 that assists National Guard and Reserve members as they transition between their military and civilian roles, providing servicemembers and their families with access to programs, services, resources, and referrals during all deployment phases.

I am also aware that there are several State programs that go beyond YRRP with strong networks of community-based service providers, and partnerships with State and local governments that are key in ensuring resources are readily available to servicemembers and their families when they need them.

I understand that one of the initiatives of the YRRP Center for Excellence includes evaluating State-based outreach and reintegration efforts to identify best practices in order to share those initiatives nationwide. Additionally, the Center for Excellence is evaluating and substantiating various Service curricula at YRRP events and post-event survey data to disseminate best practices. They are also creating on-line toolkits for use across all components at YRRP events.

If confirmed, I will review the Department's support to YRRP efforts within the Department and across the various State programs to ensure we are maximizing our combined efforts and sharing best practices as much as possible.

DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

65. Senator SHAHEEN. Mr. Hagel, it is critical that DOD and the Services have an overarching direction and comprehensive policy for maintaining the manufacturing and engineering capabilities that are necessary to ensure we have production lines for building ships, combat vehicles, and even engines and transmissions for our current and future weapons systems. What is your view of the status and health of the defense-related industrial base, and can you give your assurances that you will work to ensure these capabilities remain viable and competitive in the near- and long-term?

Mr. HAGEL. I am committed to a healthy industrial base, and I am concerned that changes in the defense market may impact that base. If confirmed, I will work to ensure critical defense industrial base capabilities remain viable and competitive in the near- and long-term. The Department is dependent on a strong industrial base for the wide range of products and services needed to support the missions of our forces, and to provide for the innovation and technical excellence that provides technological superiority.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KIRSTEN E. GILLIBRAND

AFGHANISTAN

66. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, I was a cosponsor of the Afghan Women and Girls Security Promotion Act in the 112th Congress, both the standalone version and the bill in the form of an amendment that was included in the final version of the NDAA. I would like to know what actions you will take to follow the amendment's directive and execute as robust a report as possible on the efforts made by the U.S. Government to ensure the security of Afghan women and girls during and after Afghanistan's transition process?

Mr. HAGEL. Promoting and protecting the security of Afghan women and girls has been a priority of both the Defense and State Departments in Afghanistan. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the State Department to monitor progress throughout the transition and provide Congress with information that is responsive to the NDAA.

67. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR) has reported that some of the $1 billion in fuel purchases from Russia and Turkmenistan were blended with Iranian oil. What measures are going to be put into place to ensure that we are not violating our own sanctions on Iran?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe the SIGAR reported that there may be Iranian oil in some products we have purchased. I understand that our contracts for fuel in Afghanistan, including contracts for fuel purchased in Russia and Turkmenistan, require certifications that Iran was not a source of the oil. If I am confirmed, I will ensure that we have appropriate processes in place to preclude the purchase of fuel that may have come from Iran and to enforce our own sanctions against Iran.

WOMEN IN THE MILITARY

68. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, Secretary Panetta recently lifted the ban on women serving in direct combat roles. I applaud that decision and am happy to hear that you plan to continue its implementation, if confirmed. The military you served in with such distinction in many ways looks very different than the military of today. Today, women make up nearly 15 percent of the Armed Forces. More than 283,000 women have been deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan. More than 800 women have been wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, and more than 140 women have died. Two women have earned Silver Star medals. Why do we need to wait until 2016 for the Services to complete their assessment when so many women are already serving on the front lines?

Mr. HAGEL. As I've said, I strongly support Secretary Panetta's decision to lift the ban on women serving in combat roles. While there are women serving on the front lines, the rescission of the Direct Combat Rule and Assignment Policy requires the Services to review the requirements and standards for all combat positions. It is my understanding that this process takes, at a minimum, 2 years in order to review tasks, develop testing, and validate the tests which will result in gender neutral standards.

69. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, I understand and appreciate that you support the announcement made last week regarding the policy of opening combat roles to women. I wholeheartedly support this overdue change in policy as women already have been fighting and dying on the frontline. I just as strongly believe that military standards should not be lowered for women seeking these roles and we will see extraordinary women meeting those standards and strengthening our national security. I am concerned, however, about the potential for the goal posts being moved back, or arbitrary standards set, which would in effect keep combat roles closed to qualified women. How will you ensure this policy is implemented as intended and as rapidly as feasible?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe the military and civilian leadership are committed to implementing the rescission as quickly as possible and, if confirmed, I assure I will work to have it implemented expeditiously. I will ensure that all standards reflect legitimate requirements for combat roles. In short, if a female soldier has the full skills and capabilities required to perform in a position, I will make sure she does.

70. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, we know that women are already participating, unofficially, with many combat units and special operations units. With the lifting of the combat exclusion ban, what will happen to the women already serving with ground combat troops?

Mr. HAGEL. It's my understanding that women who served or are serving in units under an exception to the ground combat exclusion do so in an official capacity. It's also my understanding that women currently serving with ground combat troops will continue to serve with ground combat troops.

71. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, will their combat service now be recognized as such?

Mr. HAGEL. It's my understanding that women's service in combat is already being recognized. If confirmed, I expect we will continue to recognize their service and achievements based on the contributions they make toward mission accomplishment.

72. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, will they be eligible to compete now for combat arms leadership positions?

Mr. HAGEL. On January 24, 2013, Secretary Panetta rescinded the 1994 Direct Ground Combat Definition and Assignment Rule and directed the integration of women into previously closed positions by January 1, 2016. If confirmed, I will continue implementation of that new policy. Within this policy I expect women will be able to compete for leadership positions where they are qualified and meet the standards.

73. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, sexual assault is an appalling problem in our military that continues to threaten the military's core value of protecting all members of the Armed Forces. It has been speculated that lifting the direct ground combat exclusion for women will help mitigate the sexual assault problems in our military by eliminating gender classes in the military. Do you agree with this theory, and if so, will you use it as leverage to ensure combat roles are opened to women swiftly and equally across the Services?

Mr. HAGEL. I have not had sufficient time to study this particular theory. As I have previously stated, sexual assault has no place in our military or anywhere in our society and I will work tirelessly to resolve that issue holding all commanders fully accountable.

74. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, lifting the combat exclusion ban has raised the question of whether women should be required to register for the Selective Service. Selective Service requirements are determined by law; would you support Congress' decision to include women in the mandatory registry for Selective Service at age 18?

Mr. HAGEL. This is an issue that concerns DOD, although it is not responsible for administering the Selective Service System. If confirmed, I will look forward to participating in any interagency discussion of the merits of extending selective service registration to women.

75. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, we have been told many times that commanders will be held responsible if there is a climate in their units that contributes to sexual assault or harassment. But I am concerned that measurable mechanisms for holding leaders accountable in addressing sexual violence issues have not been devised. DOD needs to develop a process for more directly holding leaders accountable for enforcing DOD's sexual abuse and harassment policies. The Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services even recommends that effectiveness in combating sexual harassment and assault should be a part of individual performance evaluations of all servicemembers and not just leaders. Accountability seems to be lacking in many respects. Case in point: Right now there appears to be no one person assigned to oversee the implementation of Secretary Panetta's directives on sexual assault prevention and response.

When it comes to issues of sexual violence in the military, what do you believe is the best mechanism for evaluating leaders?

Mr. HAGEL. The men and women who are serving their country face many challenges both on and off the battlefield. They should never have to fear the threat of sexual assault from a fellow soldier or superior.

Accountability is always the most important tool for leader evaluation. One of the most effective mechanisms across all Services is the command climate assessment. This tool provides timely feedback as a modality to determine if leaders have reinforced a culture of mutual respect and created an atmosphere that reinforces that sexual assault has no place within our ranks. The results from the assessment are key indicators whether leaders are taking responsibility for good order, morale, and discipline.

76. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, do you believe that effectiveness in combating sexual harassment and assault should be part of individual performance evaluations for commanders?

Mr. HAGEL. Accountability is always the most important tool for leader evaluation. One of the most effective mechanisms across all Services is the command climate assessment. This tool provides timely feedback as a modality to determine if leaders have reinforced a culture of mutual respect and created an atmosphere that reinforces that sexual assault has no place within our ranks. The results from the assessment are key indicators whether leaders are taking responsibility for good order, morale, and discipline.

77. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, in your opinion, what consequences should follow if a commander is found to be unresponsive or ineffective on this issue?

Mr. HAGEL. I will hold all commanders responsible for this issue.

In order to successfully address this issue, I will continue to advance the positive steps taken by Secretary Panetta to change the policies and the culture that has discouraged victims from speaking out and trusting that there are resources in place to support and protect them.

Among the initiatives that have already been taken by this administration, I feel strongly about efforts to raise the awareness of this issue and elevate its importance to the Department, including elevating disposition authority for the most serious cases, requiring commanders to conduct annual organizational climate assessments, and enhancing training programs for sexual assault prevention.

If confirmed, I will work closely with the Joint Chiefs of Staff to ensure that all of our commanders are responsive and establish appropriate repercussions for those commanders who do not fully support this goal.

WOMEN'S SECURITY

78. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, on December 19, 2011, the United States released its new National Action Plan (NAP) on U.N. Security Council Resolution 1325 on Women Peace and Security (WPS). The plan released by the administration is the first ever U.S. national action plan and Executive Order to implement these goals to establish women as influential and active agents in the prevention and resolution of conflicts. On August 10, 2012, the United States released the first-ever U.S. Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Gender-based Violence Globally, and President Obama signed an accompanying Executive Order directing all relevant agencies to implement the Strategy. The Strategy underscores the U.S. Government's commitment to preventing and responding to gender-based violence.

We know that all too often violence against women is used as a tool of war, yet U.N. peacekeepers and regional forces are under-trained and under-equipped in addressing violence against women. What actions will you take to implement this Executive Order?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that, in the first year of implementation, the Department made noteworthy progress on the NAP for WPS objectives, both internally and with a range of foreign defense partners. First and foremost was Secretary Panetta's decision to rescind the restriction on women in direct combat, a decision I applaud. Externally, in bilateral and multilateral engagements, I am told combatant commands and our Regional Centers are focused on building the capacity of partner militaries to promote and strengthen gender equality.

I understand that the Department is developing a DOD Instruction to institutionalize the NAP's priorities. If confirmed, I would continue this progress in implementing the NAP and ensure the Department continues to lead by example on WPS issues.

79. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, are there assets, such as excess defense articles, that the United States can contribute to peacekeeping forces, such as those in the Congo, in order to specifically help women facing significant and constant threats of sexual violence?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I plan to fully support the Department's efforts to implement the U.S. Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Gender-based Violence Globally and associated Executive Order. In this context, training of peacekeepers is critical and I believe it is important that DOD peacekeeping training continue to include human rights training and targeted instruction on prevention of and response to sexual and gender based violence. If confirmed, I will also continue to leverage Department authority to provide excess defense articles to equip peacekeeping contingents, where appropriate.

CYBER

80. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, in your responses to the advance policy questions, you have said that "recruiting, training, and retaining military and civilian personnel needed for cyber operations will be a challenge". One noted expert recently told the press that of the 10,000 necessary top cyber personnel, DOD has or can recruit only 2,000.

Why don't we begin an aggressive program of recruiting National Guard and Reserve cyber experts—a cyber corps—which would leverage the training and hiring of the private tech sector? The additional benefit from using the Guard is their ability to operate both in the military and Homeland defense space so that they can address the spectrum of threats to our national interests.

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that the National Guard and Reserve are a tremendous resource of talent and of surge capacity for DOD, and these skilled personnel can contribute greatly to the cyber mission. We are already using Guard and Reserve personnel in this mission area. It will not only be critical to recruit the right talent, but we must take a strategic approach to leveraging our National Guard and Reserve Forces as part of our overall structure. If confirmed, I will ensure that we appropriately draw upon a broad pool of our Nation's cyber experts in support of our critical cyber mission.

81. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, I also understand that the pipeline of cyber personnel has to start in early education in order to interest and educate the right number of future cyber warriors. Why don't we make Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics (STEM) aptitude and interest a significant focus of our Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) selection?

Mr. HAGEL. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) is vital to training the exceptional officers upon which our military relies, including in cyber skill sets. I believe that we should explore many approaches to build the critical technical skills DOD needs, and this should include exploring STEM related incentives in our ROTC program.

NEW YORK INSTALLATIONS

82. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, I represent New York, home to our Nation's number one terrorist target. In the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, I worked to ensure the second WMD civil support teams for both New York and Florida were authorized, and that funds have been appropriated. Both of these units are fully trained and ready to deploy in the event of a terrorist attack, yet DOD and the National Guard Bureau are trying to disestablish our second teams. While I recognize the need for cost savings, these teams cost so little and yet provide so much to our country. Given the importance of these teams to our national security, do I have your commitment to follow clear congressional direction, which has authorized and fully funded these teams?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree that WMD civil support teams are vital to our national security. I am not familiar with the funding for these teams, but I will look into this matter if confirmed.

83. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, I understand that the Army must cut its forces, but it is taking only two of its eight Brigade Combat Teams (BCT) slated for reduction out of Europe, and the rest from Continental United States (CONUS). Will you consider further cuts outside the CONUS (OCONUS), perhaps using rotational units?

Mr. HAGEL. The additional BCT reductions must be made consistent with our global strategy and treaty obligations. The three remaining BCTs not stationed in the United States, one in Korea and two in Europe, provide vital forward presence, partnership opportunities, deterrence, and rapid response. I will certainly work with my staff and the Secretary of the Army and Chief of Staff of the Army to see what other options may be feasible and affordable while still providing the requisite reassurance to our allies.

84. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, what metrics and methodology will DOD use in approaching reductions in overseas personnel and infrastructure, while concurrently taking actions which reduce force structure in the United States?

Mr. HAGEL. The Department will seek to balance posture reductions in a way that aligns with our national strategic interests. As we consider options, we will balance our strategic and operational priorities against the need to reduce costs.

85. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, the Army has reiterated the importance of rotary wing aviation in Iraq and Afghanistan as a critical asset to reducing the amount of casualties during ground convoys because of improvised explosive devices (IED). As the Army downsizes, do you see the number of Combat Aviation Brigades decreasing as well?

Mr. HAGEL. As it downsizes, the Army must maintain the proper balance amongst all of its capabilities—Ground Combat capabilities, Combat Support capabilities, Sustainment and Logistics capabilities, and Institutional capabilities. Army Aviation must be part of this balance. I don't know to what extent Aviation will be affected, but I will review with the Secretary of the Army and the Chief of Staff of the Army their plans for the Army drawdown and ensure that I and my staff continue to be comfortable with the Army's plan.

86. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, we've seen from Air Force 2013 Force Structure proposal, a disconcerting strategy which shifts more flying missions and iron to the Active component, while placing the Air Guard with fewer assets. The Guard getting unmanned missions is a welcome development, but the reduced manning requirements and the ability of the Air Guard to provide support to Governors with fewer numbers of critical assets, such as C–130s, remains a concern. It may also place a chill on Air Guard recruiting given the decreasing opportunities for pilots. What is your strategy to maintain a strong balance in flying missions and assets for the Air Guard over the next 4 years and beyond?

Mr. HAGEL. Since its inception, the Air Force has relied on the Total Force—made up of the Active, Reserve, and Air Guard components. Over the past 2 decades, the Air Force has become a more integrated force, both operationally and organizationally, as all three components—Active, Reserve, and Air Guard—have trained, deployed, and conducted the full range of missions together. I understand the Air Force continually reevaluates the mix between Active and Reserve components through an institutionalized process that includes representatives from all three components. If confirmed, I intend to work with Air Force leadership to understand and evaluate this process myself.

87. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, how will you assure that the Air National Guard has a greater voice in decisionmaking, rather than simply being handed decisions from the Air Force?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe the work currently under way between the Department and the Council of Governors to develop a mutually agreed upon consultative process will ensure that the concerns of States are taken into consideration in future National Guard force structure, basing and budgeting decisions. I intend to continue with this effort and am committed to working closely with the Council of Governors.

88. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, with the downsizing of the military, and last year's request from the administration for Base Closure and Realignment (BRAC) authorization, I anticipate that we will be discussing a new round of domestic base closings in this year's posture hearings. How will the metrics rolled out by the Air Force and Army respectively, in the last year and a half, inform any BRAC decisions?

Mr. HAGEL. It is my understanding that BRAC recommendations must result from a process that meets the requirements of the specific BRAC legislation. Therefore, metrics developed outside the BRAC statutory process can be used only if authorized in the legislation.

89. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, you have said that you view cyber threats as one of the top security threats to the United States. Yet last year the Air Force cut its cyber research budget, and in the coming year, there is a plan to make the research budget pay for the operating costs at the Air Force Research Lab in Rome, New York. I am very concerned that such steps point to a hollowing out of our cyber preparedness, rather than taking the threat seriously. I hope to work with you to reverse this trend. Even in a budget scarce environment, cyber research pays tremendous dividends. Can I count on your support for increased cybersecurity research?

Mr. HAGEL. In today's complex global environment, cyber threats pose an increasingly serious challenge to national security. DOD organizations, including the Air Force Research Lab, provide for the development of vital capabilities needed for both today's warfighter and for the future strategic environment. If confirmed, I will work with Congress and the Services to ensure that DOD continues to assess and invest in critical cybersecurity research activities.

COORDINATION WITH THE DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

90. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, I am concerned about the transition our warriors face as they leave the DOD and enter the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA). While there have been improvements in the last few years, I am concerned there is still a gap. I am especially concerned about the issues our female warriors face as they make this transition, especially those who have been sexually assaulted while serving. I want to ensure they are getting the information, care, and assistance they need while not being revictimized by the system.

If confirmed, what are your plans for increasing coordination with the VA to ensure our troops, especially women, are getting the important transition information and assistance they need so that no one falls through the cracks?

Mr. HAGEL. I am committed to ensuring every servicemember receives the training, education, and credentials he or she needs to successfully transition to the civilian workforce. I believe we must embed servicemembers' preparation for transition throughout their military lifecycle. I understand that the Department has redesigned the Transition Assistance Program (TAP) to ensure all servicemembers are "career ready" upon separation. The redesigned TAP complies with the VOW to Hire Heroes Act of 2011 that mandates all servicemembers separating from title 10 Active Duty (including reservists and guardsmen) participate in the program to ensure they are better prepared when leaving the military for civilian life.

If confirmed, I will engage Department of Veterans Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki in a specific dialogue on the unique issues facing the transition of our female servicemembers. I will also continue the practice of holding regular Secretarial-level meetings and will closely monitor the progress of the many important joint initiatives between the two Departments.

DIRECTED ENERGY

91. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments recommended last year a much greater investment into directed energy weapons. While DOD has already spent billions of dollars over several decades on science and technology efforts related to directed energy, several recent demonstrations by the Navy using solid state lasers on surface ships indicate that we may be reaching the point where as a Nation we can begin to realize a return on the substantial investment and transition this capability from science and technology to development as a weapon system. I understand that shipboard directed energy weapons could provide an affordable solution to significant capability challenges associated with sustaining our forward presence in strategically critical areas such as the South China Seas, the Sea of Japan, and the Straits of Hormuz. What is your view of current DOD efforts to weaponize directed energy technologies?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that the Department has embarked on a deliberate path to develop the technologies to weaponize Directed Energy. If confirmed, I will continue to push for directed energy and other emerging technologies through robust research and development to continuously improve the capabilities we will field for our forces.

92. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, should the Navy formally consider initiating a development program of record for high energy solid state lasers to improve the affordability and capability of our surface ships?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that the Navy has and will continue to assess the solid state laser research and development efforts to determine transition opportunities given the remaining technical risk, costs and capability limitations that must be addressed prior to establishing a program of record.

93. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, should such a program, if undertaken, include contributions from willing and technically capable allies?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

ASIA PIVOT

94. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, the President had announced an Asia pivot, and between North Korea's missile threats and China's increased aggressiveness with respect to its neighbors, we have a number of challenges to react to. But at a time of declining budgets, how would you balance this pivot against the continuing concerns in the Middle East and the growing threat in Africa?

Mr. HAGEL. As described in the 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance, the Department is rebalancing toward the Asia-Pacific while maintaining focus on the Middle-East. I think that the significant U.S. military presence and activities in Asia are a clear demonstration of the enduring U.S. commitment to the region and to addressing current and emerging challenges in the Asia-Pacific. Moreover, if confirmed as Secretary, I would take every step to maintain the ability of America to conduct successful combat operations in more than one region at a time, ensuring that we have the ability to meet threats around the world, as in the Middle East and North Africa, when they arise. Our global posture, engagement with allies and partners, and investment in flexible defense architectures for high-demand capabilities, such as ballistic missile defense, are of great importance.

95. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, how would this impact decisions over weapon systems and force structure?

Mr. HAGEL. While rebalancing, it will be important for the Department to protect new capabilities and investments to respond to the changing character of warfare; to preserve lessons, capabilities, and expertise built over the past 10 years; and to maintain a technological edge to meet future challenges.

CUTTING FORCES/HOLLOW FORCE

96. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, you have stated that a hollow force is one that has been rendered incapable of performing the mission that we expect it to conduct. With a hollow force, units do not have the resources, personnel, equipment, and training necessary to make them capable or ready to execute the defense strategies that secure our country. As the military draws down after a decade of war, what strategic approach would you implement to ensure we retain the appropriate balance of training, readiness, and modernization to prevent the force from becoming hollow?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that last year the President approved the Department's Strategic Guidance which provided priorities as well as force sizing direction. This was designed to ensure the Department could meet the missions we foresee and respond to the unexpected in a balanced way. However, any dramatic changes to the resources of the Department, such as with sequestration, would force military and civilian leaders to reevaluate that strategy.

97. Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Hagel, as conventional warfare becomes more technology-based, how do you believe that we should retain talent, especially in the fields of information technology and cyber warfare when the technology sector is able to provide pay and benefits that far exceed what the Government can offer?

Mr. HAGEL. Maintaining personnel critical technical skills will be an increasingly important challenge for DOD. Although the private sector may be able to offer better pay and benefits in some cases, my experience with DOD personnel has shown me again and again not only their talent but their commitment to their national security mission. In order to recruit and retain these talented individuals in information technology and cyberspace, I will use every tool I have afforded by OPM. In addition to many opportunities that the private sector cannot offer, DOD can focus on new ways to recruit, train, and retain talented cyber professionals. These include scholarships, partnerships, ensuring that technical people stay in mission essential technical jobs, and working creatively with the National Guard and Reserve components. If confirmed, I will work with DOD and congressional leaders to address this challenge.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATORS KIRSTEN E. GILLIBRAND AND RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

AUTISM

98. Senator GILLIBRAND and Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, we have worked very hard this year to pass a bipartisan, bicameral provision funding autism services under TRICARE. Unfortunately we only funded a 1-year project. We understand that you were also supportive of early intervention and treatment of autism. We'd like to work with you to find a way to permanently fund Tricare's coverage of autism services.

Mr. HAGEL. As I understand it, the TRICARE program provides medical benefits under the basic program and provides non-medical support benefits (including respite care) to Active Duty Families under the Extended Health Care Option (ECHO).

TRICARE has always covered medical benefits such as speech and physical therapy, to individuals with an Autism diagnosis under the medical benefit. In addition, TRICARE has implemented coverage of Applied Behavioral Analysis (ABA) as a medical benefit, and is reviewing additional provider treatment options for medical care. This medical care will be provided by authorized TRICARE providers who are licensed or certified to provide ABA therapy. If I am confirmed, I look forward to working with you on this important issue that affects so many families.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

VIETNAM ERA VETERANS

99. Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, an estimated 70,000 veterans who served in the Vietnam war suffered from undiagnosed at the time Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) during their service and were given less-than-honorable discharges. I understand that less than 2 percent of those who have applied for discharge upgrades have been successful before the Army's records correction boards. In contrast, today's military personnel are properly and, if appropriate, given a medical discharge, which entitles them to disability compensation, medical care, and support. If confirmed, will you review the decisions and guidance of the Army records correction boards with regards to the denial of Vietnam veterans' requests for discharge upgrades?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I understand that the Boards for the Correction of Military Records all operate under procedures approved by the Secretary of Defense and if confirmed, I will ensure that those procedures protect all veterans suffering from PTSD.

MILITARY-TO-MILITARY RELATIONS

100. Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, as a component of the Northern Distribution Network (NDN), Azerbaijan provides ground and naval transit for roughly 40 percent of the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) coalition's supplies bound for Afghanistan. Azerbaijan has extended important over-flight clearance, landing, and refueling operations for U.S. and NATO flights to support ISAF. In 2012, more than 150 aeromedical evacuation flights of U.S. Air Mobility Command were flown over Azerbaijan, rushing more than 2,200 patients to a higher level of medical care. How do you assess current U.S.-Azerbaijan military-to-military relations and what will be your policy to expand this strategic partnership?

Mr. HAGEL. My assessment is that the U.S.-Azerbaijan defense relationship is strong—but still has room to grow. If confirmed, I will build on existing cooperation and ensure DOD continues to engage in regular consultations at high levels with Azerbaijani counterparts to identify areas where we can strengthen our cooperation and partnership. That growth will be based on shared interests and willingness to cooperate, available resources, and capacity to absorb new programs. I will also continue our engagement with Azerbaijan aimed at supporting Azerbaijan's defense reforms, its ability to interoperate with NATO, to deploy forces in support of coalition operations, and its capacity to address terrorism and other transnational threats and secure its maritime borders and energy infrastructure. I would look for the United States to be Azerbaijan's partner of choice and help Azerbaijan's defense establishment contribute to regional security and stability.

101. Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, in September 2012, Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta invited the Chinese PLA to observe the Rim of the Pacific (RIMPAC) military exercise that will take place in 2014. In 2012, RIMPAC involved participants from more than 20 countries. If confirmed, would you consider extending a similar invitation to observe RIMPAC to Taiwan?

Mr. HAGEL. The United States is firm in its commitment to Taiwan's self-defense needs under the Taiwan Relations Act. That relationship includes defense exchanges and other interactions consistent with our unofficial relationship and as provided for in the Taiwan Relations Act. If confirmed, I will work to identify appropriate exchanges and interactions to assist Taiwan's self-defense capabilities, and contribute to peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

102. Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed as Secretary of Defense, what additional steps would you take to strengthen our military-to-military relationship with Israel?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will consider what additional steps could further strengthen our military relationship with Israel, including but not limited to missile defense, intelligence sharing, counterterrorism, and maritime security. I know that over the past 4 years the administration has taken unprecedented steps to expand our cooperation with Israel. Today, with congressional support, the United States provides Israel over $3 billion annually in Foreign Military Financing (FMF), which is the backbone of our commitment to Israel's defense. This financial support is complemented by extensive military-to-military cooperation, including joint exercises. If confirmed, I will seek to ensure that we build on this cooperation and expand it into new areas as the United States and Israel address emerging threats at this time of historic change in the Middle East. I believe we have a tremendous opportunity for further expansion of our missile defense efforts as well as cooperation in areas like space and cyberspace.

The foundation for successful cooperation is the close personal relationships U.S. military and defense civilian leaders have with Israeli military and defense leadership. Secretary Gates and Secretary Panetta, as well as the Chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have all developed very close relationships with their counterparts. Continuing with this tradition will be one of my highest priorities if I am confirmed. This will be vital to ensuring that we understand Israel's defense requirements, and to finding ways to address mutual threats that meet our common interests.

103. Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, what role does Israel's participation in the Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) program have in maintaining Israel's qualitative military edge in the region?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that the JSF will be a core component of Israel's qualitative military edge (QME). Israel's QME is predicated upon its ability to defend itself, by itself, from any and all threats in the region—whether the threat comes from state or non-state actors or a coalition of states. Air superiority is one of the most important components to Israel's QME, and the unique capabilities of the JSF will ensure Israeli air superiority for decades. Israel will be the only nation in the region with a fifth generation fighter aircraft, and Israel's JSF will be tailored to meet its specific security requirements.

RESERVE COMPONENT MOBILIZATION

104. Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, following the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks against the United States, President Bush issued a partial mobilization of the Reserve components, authorizing the involuntary mobilization of up to 1 million members of the National Guard and Reserves at any one time for repeated service of up to 2 years. National Guard units like the 143rd Military Police Company out of West Hartford and the 1048th Transportation Company out of Stratford have served in Afghanistan for repeated deployments. I know the sustainability of an operational reserve is something that concerns you. In 2007, you introduced an amendment limiting the deployment of servicemembers serving in Iraq to 12 months. While the National Guard and Reserve have served with distinction, the operational reserve has without question had impacts that need to be addressed here at home. What is your vision for maintaining readiness levels within the Reserve component without continued Overseas Contingency Operations (OCO) funding post-2014?

Mr. HAGEL. I appreciate Congress' efforts in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 to increase authorities to fully use the Reserves in a planned and programmed manner. Without OCO, the required Reserve component readiness funding would need to be included in the Department's annual baseline budget to align resources with the Department's long-term mission needs.

105. Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Hagel, what mobilization authority is appropriate to use as we continue our counterterrorism efforts with the Reserve component?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, and in light of the new strategy, I will consider the question of additional mobilization authorities, but at the present time I believe that appropriate policies and procedures are in place and current laws are adequate.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MAZIE K. HIRONO

U.S.-PACIFIC TIES

106. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, given the increasingly complex interrelationships of military, economic, political and diplomatic policies relevant to regional security issues, what is your view on the role for DOD institutes like Hawaii's Asia-Pacific Center for Security Studies (APCSS) in advancing some of the goals of the rebalance to the Pacific and also in accomplishing a U.S. Pacific Command (PACOM) objective of developing professional and personal ties among with our allies throughout the region? APCSS brings together military and civilian representatives of the United States and Asia-Pacific nations to address regional and global security issues through its comprehensive program of executive education and conferences.

Mr. HAGEL. APCSS contributes to advancing America's Pacific rebalance by enhancing professional and personal ties with partners throughout the region, strengthening defense institutional capacity, promoting critical thinking on regional security issues, and providing a venue for communication and exchange of ideas involving military and civilian participants. I agree that APCSS has a unique convening ability to bring together influential civilian and military decisionmakers from governments in the region with business and civil society leaders.

107. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, in your response to an advance policy question concerning additional steps the United States should take to defend against the North Korean ballistic missile threat, you state that the "United States should also seek to enhance bilateral and trilateral missile defense cooperation with our ROK [Republic of Korea] and Japanese allies particularly in the area of information sharing." Last year, the Korean public's opposition, inflamed by heightened tensions with Japan, largely led to the failure of the ROK Government to sign an agreement with Japan that would allow the two countries to exchange key military intelligence. If confirmed, what would you do to enhance bilateral and trilateral defense cooperation with these allies?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will continue to explore ways to deepen our alliance cooperation with Japan and South Korea, emphasize and encourage trilateral cooperation, and, where possible, support efforts to strengthen ties between the two countries. I understand there are significant cooperative efforts already underway, including the Defense Trilateral Talks, which recently were conducted at the assistant Secretary level in Tokyo, and I would continue these initiatives, if confirmed. Deeper trilateral cooperation enhances our Alliance capabilities, sends a powerful message to the region, and serves to reinforce deterrence against possible aggression.

108. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, in your response to the advance policy question on the status of the U.S.-China relationship, you recognize the fact that "China is rapidly modernizing its military and increasingly asserting claims to territory". If confirmed, how should the United States respond to China's increasingly aggressive actions over the Senkaku Islands and what steps will you take to assure our Japanese allies of America's commitments to defend Japanese territory under Article V of the Treaty of Mutual Cooperation and Security.

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will continue our longstanding commitments to all of our Treaty allies, including Japan. My understanding is that the administration has made clear that while the United States takes no position on the sovereignty of the Senkaku Islands, our Treaty commitments apply to all territories under the administration of Japan. I would support continuing this policy and communicate it clearly to all parties involved in this issue. If confirmed, I also would continue U.S. efforts to promote the peaceful handling of the Senkaku Island dispute by all parties while at the same time ensuring that the United States maintains the ability to fulfill all of its security commitments.

109. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, in 2011, while I was attending the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit in Hawaii, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton appeared at the East-West Center in Honolulu and gave an address titled "America's Pacific Century". In her remarks, she stated that the United States has "a strong relationship with Taiwan, an important security and economic partner . . . ." In what specific ways will you build on this existing foundation and further enhance this important relationship as Secretary of Defense?

Mr. HAGEL. The United States is firm in its commitment to Taiwan's self-defense needs under the Taiwan Relations Act. This could include the provision of defense articles and services, consistent with the Taiwan Relations Act, as well as training opportunities designed to improve Taiwan's self-defense capabilities.

110. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, what is your current assessment of our relationships with Japan, South Korea, Australia, the Philippines, and Taiwan? Please describe your goals should you be confirmed as Secretary of Defense for each of these relationships.

Mr. HAGEL. My understanding is that our relationships with these allies and partners remain extraordinarily strong, and, if confirmed, I would ensure that we continue to prioritize our critical alliances and partnerships in the Asia-Pacific region.

Japan is the linchpin of our presence in Asia. Japan is an increasingly critical partner in missile defense, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief, maritime security, and other important areas. If confirmed, I would continue the work of my predecessors to broaden and deepen this critical alliance to ensure that it is capable of responding to the security challenges of the 21st century.

The United States has a similarly robust relationship with the Republic of Korea (ROK). My understanding is that we have a comprehensive agenda aimed at facilitating the smooth transfer of wartime operational control in 2015, and ensuring the ROK Government has the capabilities necessary to defend the peninsula. If confirmed, I would continue these important efforts, and would also continue to stress the importance of trilateral ties between Japan, the ROK, and the United States.

The U.S.-Australia alliance is very strong, reflecting the enduring bonds forged through the sacrifices of United States and Australian forces in every major conflict of the last 100 years. The joint U.S.-Australia force posture initiatives in northern Australia reflect a reality we all recognize: security and prosperity of our two great nations is inextricably linked to the security and prosperity of the Asia-Pacific region. If confirmed, my goal would be to continue to invest in this critical relationship.

I understand that our alliance with the Philippines has matured substantially during the Obama and Aquino administrations. Over the past few years, our defense relationship has developed in many important dimensions. If confirmed, I would continue this trend by exploring options for increased rotational presence for U.S. forces in the Philippines while continuing to support the Philippines' development of a minimum credible defense capability.

The Taiwan Relations Act provides that the United States "will make available to Taiwan such defense articles and defense services in such quantity as may be necessary to enable Taiwan to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability." That policy has contributed to peace and stability in the region for over 30 years and is consistent with longstanding U.S. policy, which calls for a peaceful resolution of the Taiwan issue in a manner acceptable to the people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, the Commander of U.S. Pacific Command, and the Department's interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act.

WOMEN IN COMBAT

111. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, in light of DOD's recent announcement with regard to the role of women in combat, I'd like to ask about the priority you will give to developing implementation plans to move forward with the U.S. NAP on WPS released by the White House in December 2011. It is my understanding that the Department of State and USAID have released implementation plans building on the NAP.

If the White House plan envisions an active role in this regard by DOD, I would be interested in your vision for moving forward in this regard.

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that, in the first year of implementation, the Department made noteworthy progress on the NAP for WPS objectives both internally and with a range of foreign defense partners. First and foremost was Secretary Panetta's decision to rescind the restriction on women in direct combat, a decision I applaud. Externally, in bilateral and multilateral engagements, I am told combatant commands and our Regional Centers are focused on building the capacity of partner militaries to promote and strengthen gender equality.

I understand that the Department is developing a DOD Instruction to institutionalize the NAP's priorities. If confirmed, I would continue this progress in implementing the NAP and ensure the Department continues to lead by example on WPS issues.

FAMILY PROGRAMS

112. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, last year I attended a graduation ceremony at Pearl Harbor-Hickam Air Force Base. The graduates were 4-year-olds from military families involved in a YMCA [Young Men's Christian Association] program. These kids reminded me that when our men and women in uniform are deployed, their families serve too. In the House of Representatives, I was the Co-Chair of the House Impact Aid Coalition. Impact Aid helps support local school districts that educate military-connected children. Please elaborate on how you will work to provide child care and educational opportunities to the children of military families.

Mr. HAGEL. I fully support the Impact Aid program, and these funds are primarily delivered through the Department of Education to local school districts. In addition, DOD has been providing hundreds of millions of dollars to local school districts through a congressionally-directed program to rebuild locally owned schools located on military bases that are falling into disrepair. More directly, DOD has spent billions of dollars on a multi-year program to rebuild Department owned schools that are in failing condition.

I believe that it is the duty of the Department to prepare military families to cope with the challenges that military service brings In order to build and sustain resilient military families, the Department must continue to focus on programs that enhance their social, financial, educational and psychological well-being.

I believe there are opportunities to improve the efficiency and accessibility of the resources and programs that the Department, other Federal agencies, State and local governments, and Department partners like the YMCA provide our servicemembers and their families. If confirmed, I will explore these opportunities and how we can better coordinate efforts to more effectively provide programs to our military families.

RECRUIT READINESS

113. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, recently, a group of retired generals and admirals called Mission Readiness found that 75 percent of young Americans ages 17 to 24 are unable to join the military, primarily because they are poorly educated, physically unfit, or involved in crime. As Secretary of Defense, how will you work with other Federal agencies to combat these problems and improve the pool of potential recruitments?

Mr. HAGEL. Today's enlistment qualification standards are well-defined, supported by years of experience, and have stood the test of time. They are driven by the need to provide the Services with men and women who are prepared to adapt to the rigors of military life and meet performance requirements. It is imperative we maintain the highest standards for these reasons.

If confirmed, I will work closely with organizations such as Mission Readiness, the National Prevention Council and the First Lady's office to address these issues. I will explore opportunities in the Department to pilot healthy initiatives at several military installations to serve as a model for the department, and the Nation.

ENERGY SECURITY

114. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, across the globe resource scarcity, political and social upheaval, and other factors are changing the nature of the threats our Nation faces. These new challenges are particularly pronounced when we consider the global energy markets on which we rely. Prices are set based on global demand—not U.S. strategic and operational concerns—and many of the source nations are not our closest allies. Do you view U.S. energy security as a vital component to our overall national security?

Mr. HAGEL. Energy security is central to national security. DOD can play a role in promoting U.S. energy security in two ways.

First, DOD can improve the energy security of military operations and defense facilities. The Department has a long history of harnessing innovation to meet defense challenges in ways that can benefit the civilian economy, and there is potential for such gains in this case.

Second and more broadly, a core mission for DOD is preventing conflict, through deterrence and forward presence, partnerships with other nations, and a range of other activities. The Department also plays a supporting part in whole-of-government efforts to build peace, stability, and prosperity around the world. I view the Department's shaping and prevention efforts as vital to our overall national security, given the complexity of current and emerging threats and challenges. In that context, energy security is both part of the challenge and the response for DOD.

115. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, what role, if any, do you believe that DOD has in supporting efforts to increase U.S. energy security?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #114.

116. Senator HIRONO. Mr. Hagel, Congress has included provisions in past NDAAs to give the Secretary of Defense the guidance, tools, and support for initiatives intended to improve the military's energy security and reduce fuel costs. These include section 526 of the Energy Independence and Security Act, establishment of an Office of Operational Energy Plans and Programs headed by an assistant secretary, and other provisions. If confirmed, do you intend to continue to encourage the Services to utilize these authorities to meet their operational and installation energy needs effectively?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR TIM KAINE

ATLANTIC-PACIFIC MILITARY PRESENCE

117. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, in 2012, DOD released its new strategy, noting a rebalance to Asia while also maintaining our commitments in the Middle East. This strategy is heavily dependent on the maritime forces of the Navy and the Marine Corps. What is your view on the necessity of maintaining our naval power projection in the Atlantic in order to maintain our presence in the Middle East, especially given the threat of Iran to the region?

Mr. HAGEL. Today, the United States must be able to project naval power globally, with a strategic emphasis on rebalancing to the Asia-Pacific region and maintaining presence in and around the Middle East. Our Atlantic fleet will continue to play a vital role in meeting our global demands. If confirmed, I would work with the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to ensure a strong and sustainable Navy and Marine Corps that can prevail in light of current and projected challenges.

118. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, please describe your view on our naval presence, given the current defense strategic guidance and ongoing conflicts in the Middle East and North Africa region.

Mr. HAGEL. Historically, the Nation has used globally deployable Naval forces to provide presence and power projection capabilities in multiple regions, often shifting between regions on short notice in response to emerging security threats. Naval presence will continue to be vital if we are to rebalance toward the Asia Pacific while maintaining our defense commitments in the Middle East and elsewhere. If confirmed, I would work with the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to ensure a strong and sustainable Navy and Marine Corps that can prevail in light of current and projected challenges.

SHIPBUILDING

119. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, State shipbuilding plans are critical to meet our strategic needs, as well as critical to maintain our defense industrial base and supply chain. Given the affordability challenges facing the defense industry, you have the responsibility to ensure that you set the course for our Navy's force structure and maintain the Nation's security, all while balancing cost and risk of shipbuilding efforts. Would you agree to work closely with me, with this committee, and with this Congress in addressing our shipbuilding needs?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

120. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, will you remain committed to ensuring that the vessels we build for our sailors and marines are the finest this Nation can produce and that they meet military classifications for warships?

Mr. HAGEL. I am committed to ensuring that survivability shall be addressed on all new surface ship, combat systems and equipment designs, overhauls, conversions, and modernizations in order that the design is provided a balance of survivability performance, risk, and cost within program objectives.

121. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, will you agree to analyze all avenues of optimal program management and cost control measures in shipbuilding in order to allow shipbuilders to optimize design and save taxpayers' dollars?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

122. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, numerous studies by the Defense Business Board, GAO, and others point to a need for increased collaboration between industry and DOD. This becomes ever more important as the need for efficiencies increases and the number of industry participants decreases. DOD must provide our servicemembers with the best equipment possible. Enhancing innovation for defense applications through the current acquisition system may be an ongoing challenge in this fiscal environment. How will DOD sustain and improve capabilities that have been developed through collaborative innovation with industry?

Mr. HAGEL. Industry is our partner in defending this Nation and I fully recognize the vital role it plays in our national security. If confirmed, I will assess our current programs regarding collaborative efforts with industry, particularly in the areas of research and development, to leverage the innovation of the private sector.

123. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, what is your assessment of the health of the defense industrial base and areas that require more attention?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe in a strong, healthy industrial base, and I am concerned that changes in the defense market may impact that base. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department has a process to assess fragility of the capabilities needed provide our military with the best equipment in the world.

VETERAN ASSISTANCE

124. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, you noted in your advance policy questions your commitment to improving the care veterans receive as they transition from Active Duty to civilian life. In the past few years, we have seen a high rate of unemployment among veterans, as well as increasing rates of suicide among this population. In your view, what are the most critical areas of improvement for veterans care?

Mr. HAGEL. This is a far ranging issue that will warrant significant attention from me, if confirmed. It is my understanding that our current focus areas are providing: a seamless transition of health information from DOD to the Department of Veterans Affairs, timely processing of disability claims, and transitional support such as employment assistance and related help. If confirmed, I will evaluate the entire domain of veteran's transition for effectiveness and where we need more improvement.

125. Senator KAINE. Mr. Hagel, what are the areas of potential collaboration among public and private sector entities?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that there are numerous areas where public and private collaborations could advance solutions for some of our most pressing issues with veterans care. These include opportunities to collaborate in: scientific research; improving access to mental health care and piloting new and innovative models of care; ensuring that military training in medical triage and care provision translates to employment in the private sector through collaboration with professional organizations, certification bodies, and academic training programs (e.g., medics serving as EMTs); and developing evidenced-based care guidelines and treatment protocols for psychological health and Traumatic Brain Injury.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ANGUS S. KING, JR.

CONCERN ABOUT THE INDUSTRIAL BASE

126. Senator KING. Mr. Hagel, last year, the Chief of Naval Operations (CNO), Admiral Jonathan Greenert, testified before this committee about the consequences of sequestration for shipbuilding. Admiral Greenert said that if sequestration kicks in, we will lose capabilities in some of our shipyards and we would be looking at a fleet of 230 ships compared to the current fleet of 285 ships. He went on to say, "I'm very concerned about an industrial base that would be able to adjust from sequestration. It would be very difficult to keep a shipbuilder that could be efficient in building the types of ships we need." In short, he described the very type of irreversible consequences that we must avoid. I am proud of the workers at Bath Iron Works in my home State, but this issue is larger than that because the six remaining shipyards that build Navy ships are truly strategic assets that once lost, cannot be restored in a timely manner. Do you agree with the CNO's assessment and share my alarm that sequestration will result in greater per unit costs, an unacceptable danger to our industrial base, and a smaller Navy fleet?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, I agree that the industrial base is a strategic asset that needs to be protected and that sequestration may have irreversible impacts in the long term. Sequestration budget cuts would certainly reduce ship procurement and maintenance, impacting fleet size. Sequestration would also implement automatic spending cuts without regard for strategy or priorities, so the Navy would be forced into a position where they could not execute contract options that were negotiated to minimize unit costs and stabilize workload in the shipyards. If confirmed, I will work with Congress to avert sequestration and work with the Navy to protect the industrial base.

DDG–51 DESTROYER PROGRAM

127. Senator KING. Mr. Hagel, the enacted NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 authorized a multi-year procurement of up to 10 DDG–51 destroyers during the next 5 years beginning in fiscal year 2013. The Appropriations Committees of both the House of Representatives and the Senate adopted fiscal year 2013 defense appropriations bills also included funding to support a 10-ship program. Multi-years present unique opportunities to procure required major defense systems more cost effectively than through annual procurements. I realize that enactment of the fiscal year 2013 defense appropriations legislation is required before the Navy can execute this vital multi-year procurement and achieve cost savings while also helping to stabilize our specialized shipbuilding industrial base. Will you let the leadership on both sides of the aisle in the Senate and the House of Representatives know how critical it is that we enact a fiscal year 2013 Defense Appropriations Bill?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will certainly continue to stress to Congress the importance of receiving an enacted fiscal year 2013 Defense Appropriations Bill. A year-long CR reduces the Department's funding flexibility by spending money on last year's priorities not this year's—an untenable position. It also pushes the Department to use month-to-month contracts and prohibits doing "new starts" in military construction or acquisition programs.

BERRY AMENDMENT

128. Senator KING. Mr. Hagel, according to the Berry Amendment, DOD cannot procure clothing items unless they are produced in the United States. Congress first established this domestic preference for DOD procurement in 1941, and for decades the military branches complied by issuing American-made uniforms, including athletic footwear, for our troops. In recent years, however, DOD has circumvented this policy by issuing cash allowances to soldiers for their own purchase of training shoes.

New Balance makes a compliant athletic shoe. New Balance has 5,000 pairs of Berry-compliant footwear sitting on their shelves, as we speak. Next year, enforcing compliance with Berry would actually save money. Currently, the Navy gives a $68 cash allowance to recruits, and Berry-compliant shoes from New Balance cost $68. Next year, the allowance will increase to $74, but the Berry-compliant shoe cost will remain the same. That's a $6 savings per pair of running shoes.

Will you review this policy and work to assure that compliant gear is purchased and U.S. jobs are protected?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will review the Department's policies pertaining to the athletic running shoes provided to military enlisted recruits and will ensure the Department meets its obligations under the Berry Amendment.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

TAIWAN RELATIONS

129. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act and the Six Assurances of 1982 have contributed to the peace and stability of the Asia-Pacific region for the past 3 decades. With the military balance—including air superiority—gradually shifting in China's favor, what are your plans to implement the security commitment the United States has for Taiwan under this framework?

Mr. HAGEL. In my view, the increasing complexity and sophistication of the military threat to Taiwan from China means that Taiwan must devote greater attention to asymmetric concepts and innovative technologies to maximize Taiwan's strengths and advantages. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, throughout DOD, and with our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act.

I believe that we should make available to Taiwan those defense articles and defense services which enable Taiwan to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability, today and into the future. If confirmed, I will look at what specific self-defense capabilities Taiwan needs in light of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait and the evolving military capabilities on the mainland.

130. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, as Taiwan is likely to retire some of its older fighter aircraft in the next 5 to 10 years, do you believe that sales of advanced aircraft are an important next step in this commitment?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #129.

EAST CHINA SEA

131. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, last August, Taiwan President Ma Ying-jeou proposed an East China Sea Peace Initiative to address the ongoing dispute between Japan and China over the Senkaku or Diaoyutai Islands. While Taiwan also claims sovereignty over the islands as part of the Republic of China, it "calls on all parties concerned to resolve disputes peacefully based on the U.N. Charter and relevant provisions in international law." In its proposal, Taiwan goes on to call on all parties to:

1. Refrain from taking any antagonistic actions;
2. Shelve controversies and not abandon dialogue;
3. Observe international law and resolve disputes through peaceful means;
4. Seek consensus on a code of conduct in the East China Sea; and
5. Establish a mechanism for cooperation on exploring and developing resources in the East China Sea.

Do you believe that such an initiative is a constructive and necessary step in resolving the dispute in a peaceful and comprehensive manner?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, working with the Secretary of State and other interagency counterparts, I would carefully consider any initiative that seeks to reduce tensions and facilitate a diplomatic solution to the current tensions.

EAST ASIA

132. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, Myanmar has been invited as an observer to the Cobra Gold exercises in 2013. Do you believe inclusion of the Burmese military is timely?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that plans call for two Burmese military officers to be included in the Cobra Gold Observer Program as a way to promote the Burmese military's exposure to the international community and international norms of behavior. I believe that this step is timely and sensible. I also agree with the current Department stance that future participation should be contingent on continued progress by the Government of Burma in consolidating democratic reforms, improving its human rights record, promoting national reconciliation, and suspending military ties to North Korea.

133. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you envision that the Burmese will be brought into security partnerships with the United States bilaterally or through multilateral arrangements with regional militaries?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the administration's approach of cautious and calibrated engagement with the Burmese military through bilateral and multilateral arrangements. If confirmed, I will consult with Congress regarding the scope and scale of bilateral engagement. I also agree with the current policy that a normalization of defense relations with Burma can only occur if the Government of Burma continues its efforts to democratize, improves its human rights record, implements national reconciliation efforts with its various ethnic groups, and suspends military ties to North Korea. I also support robust multilateral engagement of the United States with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) and its ASEAN Defense Ministers Meeting-Plus (ADMM+) efforts, of which Burma is a member and will be chair in 2014.

134. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, will a reduction of DOD's budget impact security cooperation and regional security in East Asia?

Mr. HAGEL. As the President has stated, the United States is a Pacific power with enduring interests in the peace and security of the region. If confirmed, I will work to uphold and prioritize our security commitments in the Asia-Pacific region. However, sequestration's effects would be disastrous for the Department and would necessitate a review of the new defense strategy.

135. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, will budget cuts impact our ability to perform humanitarian relief missions or participate in military exercises like Thailand's Cobra Gold?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I would continue ongoing efforts to ensure that the United States remains the security partner of choice in the Asia-Pacific region. However, sequestration would necessitate a reevaluation of the U.S. defense strategy and any further reductions could require adjustments to overall implementation of the strategy.

IRAN

136. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the Iranian regime continues to threaten neighbors—our allies in the region like Azerbaijan. There were news reports throughout the past year that Azerbaijan's security services arrested several activists belonging to the Iranian intelligence service and Hezbollah. These operatives were suspected of planning terrorist attacks against foreigners in the capital Baku, including the U.S. and Israeli embassies. The United States has long-term interests in the Caspian region and the South Caucasus. Azerbaijan and the United States cooperate in countering terrorism, nuclear proliferation and narcotics trafficking, and promoting security in the wider Caspian region and beyond. As a key component to the NDN, Azerbaijan provides ground and naval transit for roughly 40 percent of the ISAF coalition's supplies bound for Afghanistan. Azerbaijan expressed its commitment to support U.S. and NATO efforts in stabilizing Afghanistan beyond 2014 and is among first eight non-NATO potential operational partners. Azerbaijan has been extending important over-flight clearance, landing, and refueling operations for U.S. and NATO flights to support ISAF. In 2012, more than 150 aero-medical evacuation flights of U.S. Air Mobility Command have flown over Azerbaijan, rushing more than 2,200 patients to a higher level of medical care. The United States has also energy interests in the region and our energy companies have interests in exploring Caspian Sea oil resources and deliver them westwards to provide for energy security to our European allies.

If confirmed, what do you think DOD should do to strengthen the security of our regional allies, like Azerbaijan, that face pressure and open threats from Iran on a daily basis, and what are the areas you think we should look into to expand security and defense cooperation with Azerbaijan to ensure it has adequate means to defend its territory?

Mr. HAGEL. I have deep concerns about Iran's destabilizing activities and recognize the many shared interests between the United States and Azerbaijan. If confirmed, I would continue the Defense Department's high level engagement with its counterparts in Azerbaijan. In particular, I would seek to strengthen existing areas of partnership and identify new areas of cooperation in support of Azerbaijan's defense reforms, its ability to interoperate with NATO and deploy to coalition operations, its capacity to address terrorism and other transnational threats and to secure its maritime borders and energy infrastructure. I would look for the United States to be Azerbaijan's partner of choice and help Azerbaijan's defense establishment contribute to regional security and stability, such as by continuing to encourage Azerbaijan's significant support to international efforts in Afghanistan.

MILITARY SUICIDES

137. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, I am very concerned about the significant rise in military suicides. According to the most current published DOD Suicide Event Report, 301 suicides occurred among military servicemembers in 2011. DOD recently reported 349 suicides in 2012—more than the total number of deaths incurred in combat. Do you believe DOD is doing all it can to prevent the tragic number of suicides in the Military Services?

Mr. HAGEL. The Department is doing all that it can given the complex nature of suicide and society's limited base of knowledge in this realm. Suicide among our Nation's military is clearly tragic and will require solutions that are informed by evidence of effectiveness. There is some proof that peer support and call lines help. There is also a need to continue the focus on resilience building and leadership education.

138. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what will you do to get this problem fixed?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I am committed to seeing that programs that focus on resiliency and leadership education continue and are further evaluated with additional research. Furthermore, I understand that the Department is in the process of drafting its first comprehensive suicide prevention program policy. It would be a top priority to review and implement this program policy as soon as it is ready.

139. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, is DOD fully funding the Services' suicide prevention programs and research programs that inform us about effective prevention strategies?

Mr. HAGEL. I am not currently familiar with the details of our research program spending in this area, but I share the views of the leadership of the Army and the entire Department that this is a top priority. If confirmed, I will review these research programs for efficiency and effectiveness in identifying strategies to prevent suicides and will work to ensure that sufficient funding is available for this important effort. As with other programs, sequestration could have a damaging impact on our efforts in this area.

140. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, how will you continue to fund these efforts under sequestration and a year-long Continuing Resolution?

Mr. HAGEL. The impact of sequestration combined with a year-long Continuing Resolution will present the Department with very serious funding challenges. I am deeply concerned about the significant rise in military suicides and am firmly committed to ensuring that the Department have the funds necessary to provide high-quality behavioral health care to servicemembers and their families. But protecting these vital personnel programs will require sacrifices in other important areas.

IMPACT OF SEQUESTRATION ON THE DEFENSE HEALTH PROGRAM AND FAMILY SUPPORT PROGRAMS

141. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, in your advance policy questions you agreed with the Joint Chiefs when they said that a full-year Continuing Resolution and sequestration would "damage our readiness, our people, and our military families." Additionally, you stated: "Sustaining family programs in the current fiscally constrained environment will be challenging, but it is of vital importance."

Under sequestration, do you agree that morale will suffer and beneficiaries may not be able to get the health care and support services they need?

Mr. HAGEL. I share the concern of our senior military leaders that the morale of the force will be affected in ways that are unpredictable if sequester goes into effect and disrupts our training, readiness, and family support programs. If confirmed, I will attempt to ensure that reductions do not break faith with our troops and they continue to receive the health care and support services they need.

142. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you ensure that defense budget cuts will not hinder or harm the extraordinary care and support that our wounded warriors and their families receive?

Mr. HAGEL. I want to make it clear that if confirmed I will make it a priority to minimize the impact of sequestration on our wounded warriors and their families. However, sequestration provides no exemption for military health care funding, and across the board cuts to those programs are required by law if sequester takes place. If confirmed, I will seek to protect funding for wounded warrior care to the greatest extent possible, subject to those constraints.

BUDGET

143. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, during a series of video interviews with the Financial Times on August 29, 2011, you were asked about the prospect of sequestration and its impact on DOD. When asked about the impact of an automatic $600 billion cut to DOD (beyond the $487 billion already proposed by the President in April 2011), you appear to disagree with Secretary Panetta's assessment that such cuts would be devastating. Instead you stated that you feel DOD is "bloated" and that "the Pentagon needs to be pared down".

In an exchange with Senator Blunt at your confirmation hearing, my colleague asked you to provide some specific examples of what you were referring to when you identified the DOD budget as being "bloated." During the hearing, you failed to provide any specificity, so please do so now of where you believe defense spending is excessive and what accounts and programs you believe should be cut.

Mr. HAGEL. I have never said that I support sequestration. I do not nor have I ever supported sequestration. I support the 2011 Budget Control Act. I stand by my view that inefficiency and waste exists in DOD that could and should be reduced or eliminated. The record shows, in my view, that both the Department's leadership and Congress have expressed similar views. In his May 2010 speech at the Eisenhower library, then-Secretary Gates launched an effort to cut inefficiency and waste in the Department that had grown up over the previous decade of rising budgets.

As he noted at the time, inefficiency is not just about money. He cited in that speech a "top-heavy hierarchy" in DOD that was out of step with the 21st century. Following that speech, the Department began reducing unneeded senior executive and general officer positions to reduce layers of management.

In the Department's next two budget submissions for fiscal year 2011 and fiscal year 2012, they produced separate justification books, which the Committee has on file, detailing plans to cut inefficiency and lower-priority programs by $178 billion and then another $60 billion, respectively. I believe many of those reductions, in areas such as information technology, smarter acquisition, streamlined management, and reorganizations, are underway but not yet fully realized.

Notwithstanding these efforts by the Department, Congress was able to find additional savings and reduced defense spending below the level requested by the Department in both of these fiscal years by approximately $20 billion per year.

143a. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe military resources should drive strategy or should strategy drive resources?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe strategy should drive our resource decisions, but our strategy must also be realistic and resource-informed.

144. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe that DOD should pursue a National Security Strategy that assumes a relatively high degree of risk for our military?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe the Department has developed a strategy that meets the challenges of the current and future security environment that both minimizes risk and complies with the fiscal constraints imposed by the Budget Control Act (BCA). I also believe that by ending the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and rebalancing to a strategic posture that modernizes alliances, builds partner capacity and maintains a ready, agile and responsive force, we reduce the risk to our military.

145. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, if it is determined that the reductions being proposed need to be revised and that additional resources are necessary to meet our national security needs, do you believe you would have the flexibility to advocate for a decrease in the $487 billion reduction to defense budgets if you determined a significant adverse impact to national security?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will continue to work with OMB and Congress to seek the resources necessary to provide the military capabilities the defense of our Nation requires. However, the mechanism of sequestration enacted in the Budget Control Act and the lack of a full year appropriation are my immediate concerns as they would severely limit the Department's flexibility to ensure the military has the funds it requires to fulfill its mission.

146. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, over the past 4 years this administration has pursued the systematic disarming of U.S. military power under the guise of defense budget cuts in order to maintain significantly higher levels of funding for non-security-related domestic programs. In a letter I sent to Secretary Panetta earlier this month, I reiterated that we are in full agreement that any additional cuts to defense spending, especially those of the magnitude of sequestration, would be unacceptable and will result in serious and lasting harm to the capabilities and readiness of our military. Do you agree that sequestration would have lasting harm to the capabilities and readiness of our military?

Mr. HAGEL. The combined impacts of a Continuing Resolution and Sequestration will have a devastating impact on our readiness, especially given that we have a shorter period of time and limited flexibility to manage where the reductions are taken. Based on my assessment to date, sequestration would harm military readiness and disrupt each and every investment program. Some of the more notable impacts of sequester would be reduced global activities, less training which would decrease readiness, disruption of investment programs, limits on military construction, and forced furloughs and hiring freezes for civilian workers.

147. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree that averting sequestration should be our highest priority?

Mr. HAGEL. Adverting sequestration, as well as providing the Department a fiscal year 2013 appropriations bill, should be Congress' highest priority.

148. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree that Congress and the administration have a shared responsibility in averting sequestration?

Mr. HAGEL. The ability to avoid sequestration and to pass a full-year appropriations bill for DOD is within the power of Congress. It is my desire that Congress and the administration reach an agreement on a balanced package of deficit reductions that leads to detriggering of sequestration and regular appropriation bills.

CYBERSECURITY

149. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, in your advance policy questions you stated that it is "your understanding that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has the lead for domestic cybersecurity." Cyberspace perhaps more so than any other domain is not bound and has little regard to geographical boundaries. When it comes to the defense of the Homeland from a foreign attack what role do you believe DOD should play?

Mr. HAGEL. DOD has the responsibility to defend, deter, and when directed by the President, take action to defend the United States, its allies, and its interests in cyberspace as in all domains. I agree that threats in cyberspace can cross both physical boundaries and particular departmental responsibilities, and, therefore, believe it is critical for the Department to work closely with both the public and private sectors. To support DOD national security responsibilities, I believe that the Department must maintain a close partnership with DHS.

149a. Senator INHOFE. Do you believe DOD should be the principal U.S. Government agency responsible for protecting the United States against foreign cyber-attacks to the Homeland?

Mr. HAGEL. It is my understanding that DOD has the mission to defend the Nation in cyberspace and that DHS should be the lead for coordinating the cybersecurity of U.S. critical infrastructure. I support these roles and relationship.

150. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, I understand there is some confusion over the role DHS would play in such an attack on the Homeland in cyberspace. Do you believe that DHS should have anything more than a supporting role to DOD in a cyberattack against the Homeland?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that DOD has the mission to defend the Nation in cyberspace, and that this includes a close partnership with DHS in its role of leading efforts for the cybersecurity of U.S. critical infrastructure, and non-DOD unclassified government networks. I believe that DHS plays a vital role in securing unclassified Federal civilian government networks and working with owners and operators of critical infrastructure to secure their networks through risk assessment, mitigation, incident response capabilities, and sharing cyber threat and vulnerability information. DOD supports DHS in its domestic role.

151. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, who, in your opinion, should be that principal agency with the responsibility of coordinating the defense of the Homeland from a foreign cyberattack and the response?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the current administration approach, in which DOD has the responsibility to defend, deter, and, when directed by the President, take action to defend the United States, its allies, and its interests in cyberspace as in all domains. I also support DOD's partnership with DHS in its role leading efforts for the cybersecurity of U.S. critical infrastructure.

152. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, capabilities-wise, do you agree that DOD and the National Security Agency have the most comprehensive set of resources to defend the Nation from a foreign cyberattack?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. At the same time, I believe that DOD should work closely with other departments and agencies that have unique responsibilities, capabilities, and expertise, such as DHS and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

153. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree that establishing bureaucracies and duplicative efforts at DHS would be unwise?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree that departments and agencies should not set up unnecessary bureaucracies or duplicative efforts. In the cyber domain, I believe that DOD and DHS should continue to team together to address cyber threats, understanding that each has specific roles and missions, and that DOD has the mission to defend the Nation in cyberspace.

154. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, a recent Wall Street Journal article titled "Banks seek U.S. Help on Iran Cybersecurity" states that "major U.S. banks are pressing for government action to block or squelch what Washington officials say is an intensifying Iranian campaign of cyberattacks against American financial institutions." The article asserts that some of the financial institutions are concerned by the lack of U.S. Government response arguing that the banks "can't be expected to fend off attacks from a foreign government." According to the article, "U.S. officials have been weighing options, including whether to retaliate against Iran."

What role do you believe DOD should play in events such as the recent/ongoing Iranian attacks on the financial sector and do you believe there is an offensive role DOD should be able to utilize via cyberspace?

Mr. HAGEL. Although I am not aware of the specific details of these events, DOD plays a critical role in a whole-of-government effort to address threats to both our national and economic security. The President has made clear that the United States will respond to hostile acts in cyberspace as we would any other threat to our country, and that the United States reserves the right to use all necessary means, including military means as a last resort, to defend our Nation and our interests. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department develops the necessary cyber capabilities to defend and, if directed by the President, conduct offensive operations.

155. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, I was concerned to read in your advance policy questions that you seem to believe that we are deterring and dissuading our adversaries in cyberspace. In a letter sent to Senator McCain last year by General Alexander, the Commander of U.S. Cyber Command, he asked a similar question to which Gen. Alexander simply stated "No . . . much remains to be done across both the public and private sector."

Do you agree with General Alexander's assessment? If not, why not?

Mr. HAGEL. I do believe that the United States has successfully deterred major cyber attacks. However, I agree with General Alexander that there is much more to be done to protect the Nation from cyber threats. If confirmed, I am committed to continuing DOD efforts to strengthen the Department's cyber capabilities and support cybersecurity efforts across the public and private sector. One such opportunity would be to pass legislation that allows for increased information sharing on cyber threats and the development of critical infrastructure cybersecurity standards in partnership with the private sector.

156. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what role do you believe offensive cyber capabilities should play in cyber deterrence?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that an important element of deterrence is to develop and maintain a wide variety of capabilities, including cyber capabilities, that can impose costs on a potential adversary. If confirmed, I will ensure that DOD provides the President with a broad range of military options.

157. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe the mission to defend the Homeland will require both offensive and defensive cyber forces and tools?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I believe the Department must provide a wide range of credible capabilities in all domains, both offensive and defensive, to defend the Nation.

NATIONAL MISSILE DEFENSE

158. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you still support the Missile Defense Act of 1999?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, I co-sponsored the National Missile Defense Act of 1999, and I continue to support the law.

159. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree that protection of the United States from the threat of ballistic missile attack is a critical national security priority?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

160. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree it is necessary to modernize and expand our national missile defense, formally known as the GMD system, to keep pace with the growing threat?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the continued modernization, and expansion if necessary, of the GMD system and the other missile defense efforts that can contribute to the protection of the homeland in the future.

MISSILE DEFENSE IN EUROPE

161. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe the deployment of SM–3 interceptors in Poland and Romania, as currently planned, is provocative for the Russians?

Mr. HAGEL. While the Russians have argued that the later phases of the European Phased Adaptive Approach (EPAA) could undermine their strategic deterrent, the United States has repeatedly stated that the EPAA is not directed at Russia and will not have the capability to undermine Russia's ICBM forces. I agree with this view.

162. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you support President Obama's commitment to deploy SM–3 missiles in Romania and Poland as currently planned?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the President's approach to missile defense in Europe, including the deployment of the Aegis Ashore sites in Romania and Poland as currently planned. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continues to support the implementation of the European Phased Adaptive Approach.

163. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe the United States should provide legal assurances to Russia that would limit U.S. missile defense capabilities?

Mr. HAGEL. The President is on record as saying, and I agree, that the United States cannot accept any limits on its BMD systems.

164. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree to inform this committee about ongoing discussions with the Russians concerning potential limits to U.S. missile defense capabilities or cooperation with Russia in missile defense?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will keep Congress apprised as required by the 2013 NDAA.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

165. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you support modernization of the nuclear triad and the nuclear weapons complex, as per the stated intent of the President in his Message to the Senate on the New START treaty?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the President's commitment to a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent as long as nuclear weapons exist. I believe that modernizing nuclear forces and infrastructure is critical and should be a national priority. I also believe that there is a continuing need to sustain the skilled workforce that underpins deterrence capabilities.

166. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree that restoring NNSA's production infrastructure is necessary to allow excess warheads to be retired along with other potential stockpile reductions to the nondeployed stockpile over time?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that modernizing the nuclear weapons production infrastructure is very important, and that doing so is necessary to reducing the stockpile hedge over time.

167. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe it is important to have the capacity to surge production in the event of significant geopolitical surprise?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that a modernized nuclear weapons infrastructure that would allow production of additional warheads is important to hedge against significant, unforeseen changes in the international security situation.

168. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what do you believe should be the proper role of DOD in determining the annual funding requests for NNSA Weapons Activities?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that the Nuclear Weapons Council (NWC) provides a statutory forum wherein the Department of Energy's National Nuclear Security Administration and DOD come together to make programmatic and funding decisions and, as appropriate, recommendations for the Secretaries to coordinate requirements and expenditures. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the NWC and the Secretary of Energy to best coordinate our requirements in a fiscally responsible manner to continue to meet the Nation's security needs.

ARMS CONTROL COMPLIANCE

169. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree that any outstanding nuclear weapons treaty compliance concerns should be addressed before the United States pursues further nuclear arms reduction negotiations with Russia?

Mr. HAGEL. Compliance with legal obligations is central to the effectiveness of arms control treaties, and concerns about non-compliance must be addressed. If confirmed, I will ensure that DOD works with the Department of State and other interagency partners in assessing and responding to compliance concerns. While resolution of such issues with Russia is clearly important, I do not believe that discussions of possible further nuclear arms reductions need await resolution of all compliance issues.

DOD FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT SYSTEM

170. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, are you committed to modernizing DOD's financial management systems?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I understand that implementation of modern, integrated business systems is well underway and I will continue to monitor and support these efforts. They must contribute to improved efficiency and must also sustain the quality and fidelity of financial information that we need to manage with.

171. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, would you emphasize financial management improvement and audit readiness as a top priority?

Mr. HAGEL. Improving the Department's financial management capability is an important priority and if confirmed, I will ensure that senior leaders are focused on this goal and hold them accountable.

BUDGET CUTS AND OPERATIONAL READINESS

172. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, does the fiscal year 2013 defense budget of $525.3 billion with $88.5 in OCO funding, affect DOD's ability to "respond to every contingency" as you highlighted in your opening statement?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, the Department's ability to respond to contingencies is directly related to the funding it receives which is translated into military capabilities. I believe the Department can implement the administration's present strategy within the budget it has requested. That said, if sequestration occurs, the Department would need to significantly revise the defense strategy and, in all probability, would need to make some hard choices about which of our current national defense capabilities we could afford to retain.

AGING MILITARY EQUIPMENT

173. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the Chief of Staff of the Army, and the Commandant of the Marine Corps have stated that they need at least 2 years of OCO funding after withdrawal from Iraq and Afghanistan in order to reset their equipment. If confirmed, will you be prepared to continue requesting OCO funding until all equipment has been reset?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I believe that it will require considerable time to repair equipment returning from operations in Afghanistan because of the nature of the repairs and difficulty of removing the equipment from Afghanistan.

END STRENGTH REDUCTIONS

174. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do the planned reductions to Army and Marine Corps end strengths affect DOD's ability to "respond to every contingency" as you highlighted in your opening statement?

Mr. HAGEL. Current reductions in the Army and Marine Corps are being carefully managed in order to balance risk with the right mix of capabilities necessary to fulfill all of the missions required by the Defense Strategic Guidance. Currently, reductions are predicated on the U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) plans to continue off-ramping forces heading to Afghanistan. This risk we can manage. However, I am very concerned about the risk to the Nation given the possibility of sequestration and the potential for a full year Continuing Resolution. If not resolved, the fiscal situation could have significant impact on the ability of the Department to do what is required by the Defense Strategic Guidance. It is not the planned cuts to the Army and Marine Corps that cause significant risk, but rather the ones that we may be forced to make due to the uncertain fiscal environment.

DEFENSE BUDGET PRIORITIES

175. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, during your testimony you stated that, if confirmed, you will confine the dollars we are going to spend in the defense budget for defense purposes, in support of the warfighter. Do we also have your assurance that you will submit a budget that reflects this commitment?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe a fundamental foundation of any defense budget submission is to provide the best support we can to our warfighters and ensure their capabilities, readiness and agility are sustained. If confirmed, I will uphold this commitment.

INDUSTRIAL BASE

176. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what is your definition of the industrial base?

Mr. HAGEL. The defense industrial base is a diverse and dynamic set of companies that provide both products and services, directly and indirectly, to national security agencies, including the military. The defense industrial base includes companies of all shapes and sizes from some of the world's largest public companies to small businesses.

177. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, what will be your approach to preserving the industrial base?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continually assesses the health of the industrial base. I will work closely with industry and Congress and will be prepared to act to preserve needed skills and manufacturing capabilities, as resources permit.

ACQUISITION REFORM

178. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, it seems that every time we have a change in administrations or the Secretaries of Defense, another acquisition study is commissioned, usually ignoring the 300 plus studies that have already produced a report. If confirmed, what will be your approach to ensuring the acquisition system produces affordable capabilities that are responsive to the needs of the warfighter?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand the Department has undertaken a series of "Better Buying Power" initiatives as a broadbased collection of comprehensive, detailed, initiatives to improve acquisition practices and ensure the Department is procuring affordable, technically achievable capabilities on cost and schedule. If confirmed, I will examine these initiatives to ensure that they adequately address the problems with the Department's acquisition system.

GREEN AGENDA

179. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, following up on your testimony, you stated in response to questions posed by the committee on your priorities for defense investments in energy technologies that "my broad priorities for defense energy investments will be those that: increase military capabilities, provide more mission success, and lower total cost."

With the budget cuts DOD is facing, how will your priorities impact DOD's current plan to invest $9 billion over the next 5 years on energy technology investments and an additional $4 billion for renewable energy facility projects?

Mr. HAGEL. I have not yet reviewed the Department's budget related to energy technologies. If confirmed, I will ensure that investments in the operational energy area drive enhanced military capabilities, facilitate mission effectiveness, and lower costs.

180. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, what criteria would you establish to focus investments on your priorities?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, my main criteria will be to ensure that DOD investments enhance readiness and warfighting effectiveness and increase our national security.

181. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe that defense funds should be used to develop a commercial biofuels refinery?

Mr. HAGEL. The Nation's long-term energy security would benefit from a competitive, domestic renewable fuels industry; as a major consumer of liquid fuels, the Department would benefit, as well. That said, I am not yet in a position to comment on the trade-offs between the value of this investment and the other priorities of the Department.

182. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe that critical operations and maintenance funds intended for the training, equipping, and readiness of our Armed Forces should be used to pay for alternate fuels that exceed the cost of traditional fossil fuels?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe the Department's primary operational energy goal should be to ensure operational military readiness. I understand that most of the Department's investments in alternate fuels since 2003 have been for the purpose of ensuring that military platforms can operate on a wide range of fuels, providing useful military flexibility if and when they become commercially available and cost competitive with petroleum products.

183. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, will you pledge to work with Congress to ensure that all investments and purchases of renewable energy technologies and alternate fuels are supported by specific congressional authorizations for that purpose?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department's energy investments comply with congressional authorizations.

184. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, according to a recent report by a major oil and gas company, the United States will be energy self-sufficient in 2030. Other reports by respected organizations have agreed. Do you agree that the United States could become energy independent in the next 20 years?

Mr. HAGEL. I am greatly encouraged by the recent developments in the U.S. energy sector and the benefits for our economy.

185. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, how do you foresee this impacting U.S. foreign policy?

Mr. HAGEL. Reducing the Nation's dependence on foreign oil is an important national security imperative. That said, because oil prices are set on a global market and will be for the foreseeable future, the stability of global oil markets will continue to be important for the U.S. economy.

U.S. AFRICA COMMAND

186. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the outgoing Secretary of Defense has been a strong supporter of U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM) and critical engagement and operations ongoing throughout the continent of Africa. AFRICOM has less than 5,000 boots on the African continent to cover 54 countries and over 12 million square miles. Its forces are completely shared with U.S. European Command (EUCOM). How will the United States be able to adequately support AFRICOM operations given the cuts in EUCOM personnel, coupled with additional cuts in DOD funding?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that our low-cost, small-footprint presence and operations in Africa are appropriate to promoting our interests and addressing threats to us and our partners. U.S. forces are managed globally to address ongoing needs anywhere, so forces that operate in and around Africa extend beyond those assigned to EUCOM. Moreover, since the attacks on our diplomatic facilities in Benghazi, I understand that the Department has undergone a rigorous evaluation of our military posture across the region, to including assessing EUCOM and AFRICOM force posture. If confirmed, I would continue to ensure that we appropriately manage the allocation of U.S. military forces across the globe, including in Africa, to ensure we are best positioning ourselves on any given day for contingencies that may arise.

187. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the President's new strategy calls for a "rebalancing" of resources to the Asia Pacific theater, maintaining focus on the Middle East, and "evolving" force posture in Europe. Do you believe the President's new Asia-focused strategy puts our operations at high risk for Africa and South America?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree with the Defense Department's new strategy and move to rebalance to the Asia-Pacific region while maintaining focus on challenges in the Middle East. The strategy also makes it clear that we will still have interests we need to protect in other regions of the world and that we will do so through continued partnership, rotational presence, and smaller foot-print activities. If confirmed, I will make sure that we are always mindful of how we address threats, manage risk, and promote our interests in all parts of the world , and what role the U.S. military and DOD play in that as part of an overall U.S. effort. However, we may have to seek different approaches to pursuing our interests in these other regions if the size of our overall defense budget declines further.

188. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the headquarters for AFRICOM is in Stuttgart, Germany. Would you consider moving AFRICOM out of Germany and somewhere in Africa?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand the Department has just completed a study that compares the costs and benefits of moving the AFRICOM headquarters. In the end Secretary Panetta considered both cost and operational factors and decided to keep the headquarters in Stuttgart, Germany. When assessing possible relocation to the African continent the Department considered the difficulties in determining a representative country on such a diverse continent, diplomatic challenges, high costs of infrastructure, security concerns and mobility and access challenges. It was decided that a move to the African continent was not feasible at this time.

BUDGET CUTS AND OPERATIONAL READINESS

189. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, you stated in responses to questions posed by the committee in regard to the Joint Chief's concerns about a hollow force that "the concerns the Joint Chiefs have expressed about readiness come from a variety of factors, including the challenges of recovering from 10 years of operational stress, of transitioning to a broader range of operations, and of doing all of this in the face of fiscal austerity and budget uncertainty." How do you plan to monitor risk and the potential mismatch between constrained resources and demands of operational plans?

Mr. HAGEL. I am deeply impressed by the caliber and capabilities of our military forces. It is vitally important that they be ready to respond to the Nation's needs, and I am concerned that further budget cuts will negatively affect readiness. If confirmed, I will get regular updates by the Joint Chiefs on where we must devote the Department's attention and resources to ensure the readiness of the force.

190. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe there currently exists a mismatch between readiness requirements and military strategy when assessing the resources available? Please explain.

Mr. HAGEL. Maintaining ready forces is a priority. If confirmed, I will work with the Joint Chiefs to better understand the basis of their assessment and how we can most effectively address the readiness challenges our military faces.

My sense is that the concerns the Joint Chiefs have expressed about readiness come from a variety of factors, including the challenges of recovering from 10 years of operational stress, of transitioning to a broader range of operations, and of doing all of this in the face of fiscal austerity and budget uncertainty. If confirmed, I will carefully monitor how all of these factors are posing risks to readiness and will work closely with the military and civilian leadership of the Department to mitigate those risks to the greatest extent possible.

191. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, as to the mitigation of risk of a hollow force, do you believe the President will provide you the discretion to request higher defense budgets than are currently proposed by the administration over the next 10 years?

Mr. HAGEL. I will always give the President my most honest and informed opinion about all necessary requirements for America's national security.

I understand the administration has developed Strategic Guidance consistent with the funding limits of the budget control act. Any changes to those limits, such as sequestration, will cause a dramatic change in the force and require a different strategy or different resources. Additionally, unexpected demands for forces will likely result in a request for additional funding, as they always have.

GEOGRAPHIC RISK POSED BY THE REVISED MILITARY STRATEGY

192. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, in your response to the committee on a question regarding the revised military strategy announced by the President in the wake of the administration's decision to cut defense budgets by $487 billion over 10 years, you state: "By emphasizing the Asia-Pacific while also focusing on the Middle East, rebalancing will necessarily accept risk in other areas given the resource-constrained environment." How do you believe the President's military strategy is taking risks in regions other than Asia and the Middle East?

Mr. HAGEL. By prioritizing resources for Asia and the Middle East, the current defense strategy accepts some risk in terms of the military's ability to address security challenges elsewhere. I believe this risk is manageable at the levels of defense spending provided for in the Budget Control Act. Regardless of where U.S. military forces may be positioned or stationed, one of the key advantages of our military is that we can bring to bear effective capabilities where needed to address threats to our interests. If confirmed, I would work with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Services to ensure that readiness is one of our top priorities, so that our forces are ready to respond to the full range of contingencies that may threaten our key interests.

193. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what specifically are the risks for Africa and South America?

Mr. HAGEL. In Africa, partner states accept a greater share of the burden to counter the growing capacity of violent extremist organizations and ensure regional stability. While we believe this African-led approach manages the threats to U.S. interests, the limited defense capacities of most African states and the modest investments in the African security sector are a source of risk. In South America, transnational criminal organizations undermine peace and security across the region and into the United States. As in Africa, partner states in South America will accept a greater share of the burden to address transnational criminal organizations.

194. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, why do you believe this risk is necessary?

Mr. HAGEL. Not all problems are best met with military tools. Many of our national security objectives around the world, and notably in Africa and South America, are best secured through diplomacy and economic development. I believe DOD's current strategic approach balances the risk of overwhelming these two regions with U.S. military presence with the need to be ready to respond to crises that may emerge there, using globally agile forces.

195. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what do you believe was lacking in our military strategy for Asia that required a rebalancing?

Mr. HAGEL. As the United States draws down from more than a decade of war in Afghanistan, we face an inflection point allowing for a transition from fighting today's wars to preparing for tomorrow's challenges. The President has been clear that U.S. economic and security interests are inextricably tied to the Asia-Pacific. The emerging economic and political dynamism in the Asia-Pacific requires strong and continuous U.S. commitment and the rebalance is a whole-of-government effort to renew and deepen U.S. engagement throughout the region. The rebalance will inform the allocation of activities and resources to the Asia-Pacific, where the Department will contribute to peace and prosperity in the region. If confirmed, I will continue the Department's efforts and activities to seek greater engagement with allies and partners to build capacity for security cooperation, build mutual trust, understanding, and norms among countries in the region.

196. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what does rebalancing mean for the U.S. military effort in the Asia-Pacific region in terms of force structure changes, additional or modified military capabilities, and defense budget modifications?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will focus on strengthening our relationships, building the capacity of key allies and partners, as well as maintaining the United States' ability to deter conflict and respond to any potential contingencies in the Asia-Pacific region. The rebalance renews emphasis on air and naval forces while maintaining distributed ground forces. The rebalance also requires the Department to develop new capabilities in order to maintain a technological edge, our freedom of action, and ability to project power in the region. I would work closely with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Services, and Office of the Secretary of Defense leadership to assess any additional changes in resources, force structure, equipment, and training.

197. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance says that "our posture in Europe must evolve." What is your assessment of the specific programs and strategic efforts that DOD is executing, or has planned, to evolve our posture in Europe?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the Department's current approach to posture in Europe and its emphasis on maintaining our Article 5 commitments to Allied security and promoting enhanced capacity and interoperability for coalition operations. For instance, I strongly support ongoing efforts related to the European Phased Adaptive Approach, the establishment of an aviation detachment in Poland, and enhanced training and exercises with European allies and partners through rotational deployments from the United States. All of these efforts introduce more modern capabilities appropriate for future challenges and demonstrate our commitment to NATO and the strength of the Alliance.

198. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, how do you believe our evolving force posture in Europe will affect our commitment to NATO?

Mr. HAGEL. The Department's evolving defense posture in Europe focuses on enhancing interoperability and training and introducing modern capabilities more appropriate for future challenges. These evolutions demonstrate our commitment to NATO and the strength of the Alliance. Regardless of the rebalance, NATO is already adapting to meet new and emerging threats, to acquire the core enabling capabilities needed to respond to the full range of contingencies, and to better align U.S. and NATO training and education efforts in order to solidify and maintain the gains realized from having operated together in Afghanistan. As Secretary Panetta has said, "Europe is our security partner of choice for military operations and diplomacy around the world." Our investment in Europe is, therefore, crucial.

IRAN MINISTRY SUPPORT

199. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, Iran's Foreign Ministry was quoted as being hopeful your appointment would improve relations between Tehran and the United States "We hope that practical changes will be created in the U.S. foreign policy and the U.S. officials' approach will change to respect the Nations' rights. We hope that the U.S. officials will favor peace instead of warmongering and recognize the rights of nations instead of interfering in the countries' internal affairs."

You stated in October 2009 that "President Obama's approach to achieving a Middle East peace is connected to other vital regional and global issues—like helping forge an emerging Arab consensus on peace, combating terrorism, and future relationships with Iran and Syria. These issues are all in the long-term interests of Israel, the U.S., the Middle East, and the world."

In describing the President's approach, what specifically were you referring to regarding future relationships with Iran and Syria?

Mr. HAGEL. While I cannot speak to the motivations of the Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson behind making those statements, there should be no doubt that I fully support and—if confirmed—will faithfully execute the President's multi-vector strategy towards Iran. This strategy has included tough-minded diplomacy, crippling sanctions, and serious contingency planning with the objective of preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

My comments in 2009 reflected my support for the President's use of diplomacy as an effective tool of statecraft. This approach allowed the United States to test the intentions of the regimes in Iran and Syria, expose them before the world, and when they failed to seize the opportunities presented to them, build a global coalition against them.

200. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, how would these relationships with these two terrorist regimes be in the long-term interests of Israel and the United States?

Mr. HAGEL. Much has changed since 2009 in Iran and Syria. With that in mind, I believe that only after there is a change in regime in Syria and serious changes in the regime's behavior in Tehran, can we conceivably think about long-term relationships with these two countries that could be beneficial to the interests of the United States and the State of Israel. At the same time, I think the United States should continue to reach out to the people of Syria and Iran—as the best long-term investment for our and Israel's interests. Both societies are tremendously important to the stability of a region that is of great interest to the United States.

201. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, how would you assess the success of the President's approach to date in the region?

Mr. HAGEL. I think the President's approach to the region has had some great success during the first term. President Obama responsibly drew down our presence in Iraq, crippled al Qaeda, isolated and weakened Iran, strongly supported the security of the State of Israel, and focused on transforming our relationship with peoples of the region, while advancing our core interests. That said, much remains to be done during the second term, and—if confirmed—I look forward to advancing our interests in the vitally important region of the Middle East.

NORTH KOREA

202. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, you wrote that "Kim Jon Il's government is a genuinely rogue regime whose nuclear ambitions and capacity for mischief have been more or less contained, though imperfectly, through the U.N. and a mature diplomatic structure that includes the United States, Russia, China, Japan and South Korea."

Given North Korea's ballistic missile launch in December and recent threats to conduct further nuclear testing, do you still think that the diplomatic structure is effectively containing North Korean nuclear ambitions?

Mr. HAGEL. North Korea's December Taepo Dong II missile launch and recent threats to conduct a third nuclear test underscore the growing North Korean threat to international peace and security. U.S. diplomatic efforts following the December missile launch, particularly with China, resulted in U.N. Security Council Resolution 2087, which affirms the international community's opposition to North Korea's provocations. The tightened sanctions in the resolution will help impede the growth of North Korea's weapons of mass destruction program. If confirmed, I will continue to ensure our military provides the deterrence and defense necessary to protect our allies and our interests. This posture is also the best way to create conditions where diplomacy has the best possible prospects to succeed.

203. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you see the future force structure of U.S. forces in Korea decreasing below the current size?

Mr. HAGEL. To secure peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula and in Northeast Asia, it is important that the United States and the Republic of Korea (ROK) maintain a robust combined defense posture. If confirmed, I will work with ROK leadership to ensure that the United States maintains an appropriately sized and ready force to respond to evolving threats in the region.

204. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you think any capabilities need to be added to our force structure in the Asia-Pacific theater to ensure regional stability in light of increased North Korean belligerence?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will maintain the U.S. commitment to the defense of the ROK using globally available U.S. forces and capabilities that can be deployed to augment the combined defense in case of crisis. If confirmed, I would ensure that we have the capabilities necessary to deter, and, if necessary, defeat, North Korean aggression.

TAIWAN

205. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, tensions in the Asia-Pacific have increased significantly due to more aggressive posturing of China in places like Scarborough Reef and the Senkaku Islands as China continues to pursue increased military capabilities. Do you fully support the Taiwan Relations Act of 1979?

Mr. HAGEL. I fully support the Taiwan Relations Act. In my view, the increasing complexity and sophistication of the military threat to Taiwan from China increasingly means that Taiwan must devote greater attention to asymmetric concepts and innovative technologies to maximize Taiwan's strengths and advantages. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, the Commander of U.S. Pacific Command, and our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act.

206. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do you support the sale of F–16C/Ds to Taiwan, why or why not?

Mr. HAGEL. With respect to advanced fighter sales, I believe that we should make available to Taiwan those military capabilities that would allow the Taiwan Armed Forces to execute its missions effectively not only for today, but well into the future. If confirmed, I will look at what specific capabilities those are—or should be—in light of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait and the evolving military capabilities on the mainland. In addition, if confirmed, I will work with the Commander of U.S. Pacific Command to identify appropriate military training and exercise opportunities that will advance U.S. interests, enhance Taiwan's defense capabilities, and contribute to peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

207. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, would you support the sale of F–35s to Taiwan?
Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #206.

208. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, how would you strengthen the U.S. security relations with Taiwan?
Mr. HAGEL. I agree that the Taiwan Relations Act has contributed to peace and stability in the region for over 30 years. In my view, the increasing complexity and sophistication of the military threat to Taiwan from China means that Taiwan must devote greater attention to asymmetric concepts and innovative technologies to maximize Taiwan's strengths and advantages. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, the Commander, PACOM, and our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act. I believe that we should make available to Taiwan military capabilities that would allow the Taiwan Armed Forces to execute its missions effectively not only for today, but well into the future. If confirmed, I will look at what specific capabilities those are—or should be—in light of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait and the evolving military capabilities on the mainland. In addition, if confirmed, I will work with the Commander, PACOM to identify appropriate military training and exercise opportunities that will advance U.S. interests, enhance Taiwan's defense capabilities, and contribute to peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

209. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, does the United States need to maintain a two carrier presence in the Pacific at all times and can this be done if sequestration goes into effect?
Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Navy, Joint Chiefs of Staff, and U.S. Pacific Command to ensure that we allocate our naval resources at the level of presence necessary to support our strategic goals, striking a balance between carrier presence in the Pacific Ocean and other regions. The current budget uncertainty, combined with ongoing high demand in the Gulf, has made sustaining two carriers in the Pacific challenging; further significant cuts in the defense budget would make it, extraordinarily difficult especially if preserving other U.S. interests—particularly Gulf presence.

SUPPORT FOR ISRAELI SECURITY AND REGIONAL STABILITY

210. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, given the high demand and low density of our missile defense assets globally, do you support the allocation of a TPY–2 radar and a BMD-capable ship to the defense of Israel?
Mr. HAGEL. I support strong missile defense cooperation with Israel, including the deployment of the U.S. TPY–2 radar and operational cooperation and support, including ship-based. In addition, the United States and Israel have a long history of cooperative research and development on missile defense. If confirmed, I will continue to support a robust missile defense cooperative relationship with Israel.

IRAN

211. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, will a two-carrier presence in the Gulf be sustainable given expected severe defense budget cuts?
Mr. HAGEL. I believe that it is critical that the U.S. military maintain a robust presence in the region to counter Iran, reassure our partners, and build partner capacity. Our carrier presence is a key element of this presence. If confirmed, I will work with the combatant commanders to revalidate our posture and ensure it best addresses the threats, challenges, and opportunities in the region to preserve all options for the President while balancing other national security needs. Current budget uncertainty and further significant cuts in the defense budget would make sustaining this critical Gulf presence, and preserving other U.S. interests, extraordinarily difficult.

212. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, do we have enough missile defense assets in the Middle East to adequately protect our partners and allies from an Iranian ballistic missile attack?
Mr. HAGEL. I believe the phased adaptive approach takes the appropriate steps to protect our interests in the region. If confirmed, I will make it a priority to assess the adequacy of our missile defense posture in the Middle East to protect our deployed forces, allies, and partners from attack, and will seek adjustments as appropriate. I will also work to strengthen our cooperative relationships in the Middle East, and encourage our partners to continue to make investments in missile defense.

LISTENING TO COMMANDERS ON THE GROUND

213. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, our commanders on the ground in both Iraq and Afghanistan asked for a surge to achieve national security objectives – and you disagreed with both of them.

How much weight will you give your combat commanders on the ground when you make future decisions or recommendations to the President?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I would of course place great weight on the assessments and recommendations of combatant commanders and theater commanders on how best to achieve our military and national security objectives in their theater. If confirmed, it would be my responsibility to weigh their recommendations against global risk and force posture, and to offer that judgment to the President alongside theirs. If confirmed, I will honor the principles, enshrined in law, that allow the Chairman and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to voice their best military advice to the President. I will continue to foster an environment that welcomes critical thinking and diversity of views from theater commanders, combatant commanders, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as better and wiser strategic choices will result.

RUSSIA RESET

214. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, the administration has made major efforts towards resetting our relationship with Russia. However, on major issues such as Syria, Russia remains uncooperative. What is your assessment of the reset with Russia with respect to military-to-military relations?

Mr. HAGEL. Although we do not see eye-to-eye with Russia on every issue, there are many areas of cooperation that have been positive, including transit into and out of Afghanistan, support on sanctions against Iran, and increased transparency on military reform and modernization.

215. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Hagel, what areas do you see for future increased military cooperation with Russia?

Mr. HAGEL. The enhanced bilateral military relationship we have developed with Russia under the reset is worthwhile. If confirmed, I would seek to continue it, while considering what adjustments may be needed. My understanding is that DOD has been pursuing several areas of increased cooperation with Russia, with a focus on developing transparency by providing a reliable and predictable channel of communications between our militaries. If confirmed, I would seek to increase U.S. consultations with Russia on its internal defense reform efforts, such as modern military recruitment, compensation and benefits systems, and developing noncommissioned officers. Assisting the Russian military to enact reforms in these areas will help make it a more confident, secure and stable organization. If confirmed, I would also seek to pursue cooperation with Russia on strategic issues critical to both of our Nations, such as counterterrorism and missile defense.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN

AFGHANISTAN

216. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, in an interview with the Financial Times on August 29, 2011, you are quoted as saying, "I disagreed with President Obama, his decision to surge in Afghanistan, as I did with President Bush on the surge in Iraq." Do you unequivocally stand by your statement that you disagreed with President Obama's decision to surge troops in Afghanistan?

Mr. HAGEL. I did disagree with President Obama's decision to surge troops to Afghanistan. Notwithstanding any past differences in view, if confirmed, I will work with our military commanders and Joint Chiefs to ensure that President Obama has the best possible advice in developing and implementing a strategy that best protects our national interests.

217. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, do you advocate the full withdrawal of U.S. forces by the end of 2014?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the President's plan to transition full security responsibility to the Afghan National Security Forces by the end of 2014, and to retain an enduring commitment in the future. As the President has stated, a residual force after 2014 would focus on two primary missions: to deny safe haven to al Qaeda and its affiliates; and to train, advise, and assist the Afghan forces so they can maintain their own security. I further support the President's position that any residual U.S. force would have to be at the invitation of the Afghan Government and would need to be guaranteed certain legal protections, which will be negotiated under the Bilateral Security Agreement.

SYRIA

218. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, more than 60,000 Syrians have been killed in some 22 months of conflict between the rebels and the Assad regime. You are quoted in an August 29, 2011, interview with the Financial Times, as saying, "I think Syria, the outcome there has far more important consequences for America's national interests than Libya." Should the United States provide at least the same level of support to anti-Assad forces as we provided to anti-Qaddafi forces?

Mr. HAGEL. I continue to believe that the United States has significant national security stakes in the outcome in Syria. I believe that the steps taken by the administration to date, including political, diplomatic and economic pressure, as well as assisting the unarmed opposition, have been appropriate. If confirmed I will support the President's ongoing reassessment of the continuously changing dynamics on the ground in Syria, to determine what additional steps may be appropriate.

219. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, are U.S. forces capable of executing, without operational support from international partners, no fly zones in Syria?

Mr. HAGEL. While I have not been briefed in detail on U.S. capabilities for such a mission, I am confident that the U.S. military could enforce a no-fly zone over Syria. However, because Syria has an advanced air defense network, I understand that such a mission could involve a significant number of and risk to U.S. forces.

220. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, do you believe the United States should deny Assad his use of air power?

Mr. HAGEL. The President has said Assad must go, and a democratic political transition should remain our goal. If confirmed, I will support the current focus on weakening the Assad regime through political, diplomatic, and economic pressure, as well as assisting the unarmed opposition. Regarding any additional options, military and non-military, if confirmed, I will support the President's continuing reassessment of what additional steps may be appropriate.

221. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, do you believe the United States should provide arms, intelligence, or other military support to Syrian rebels?

Mr. HAGEL. I do not believe that providing lethal support to the armed opposition at this time would improve the terrible situation in Syria; however, this question should continue to be re-evaluated over time. The Syrian people are in urgent need of assistance during this difficult period, and the United States is helping to address those basic needs by providing medical assistance, humanitarian assistance, and political support on the international stage.

IRAQ

222. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, do you regard the 2007 Iraq surge as a mistake?

Mr. HAGEL. When former President Bush announced his decision to surge troops to Iraq in 2007, I was against it. I thought the Bush administration had not defined a clear end state for the war in Iraq, and under these circumstances I did not believe that adding more U.S. troops was worth the likely cost in American lives. It is now clear that a combination of steps including the surge, improved counter-terrorism techniques, and the Anbar Awakening, contributed to reducing violence in Iraq. The cost of the surge in American lives was almost 1,200 dead and thousands wounded. What is still not clear, however, is what role the surge played relative to the other steps that we took, or what would have happened if we had not undertaken the surge; those are questions for historians.

223. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, could the other factors that contributed to the stability of Iraq circa 2007, such as the Anbar Awakening, have succeeded without the surge?

Mr. HAGEL. The Anbar Awakening was an important development—along with the Shia militant ceasefire—that was a result of the decision of the Iraqi people to take back their country from extremist forces. Many of the Anbar Awakening tribes fought alongside our troops, and they should be commended for their efforts. Over 100,000 young Sunis were paid by the United States between $350 and $500 per month of helping us. Our troops benefited from the Awakening and in turn the Awakening forces were further bolstered by the support offered by our troops. But ultimately, it is difficult to make a judgment on the causal relationship between the surge and the Anbar Awakening. Again, this will be a question best reserved for history to make an ultimate judgment.

224. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, you advocated the complete withdrawal of all U.S. forces from Iraq by 2011, rather than negotiating an agreement for an enduring presence of U.S. forces. The President ultimately did exactly what you recommended—reportedly against the advice of his military leaders. Do you believe that Iraq is more stable and better off today as a result?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, I fully supported the withdrawal of all U.S. combat forces from Iraq by December 2011 in accordance with the November 2008 U.S.-Iraq Security Agreement. It was the right decision and it gave the Iraqis the chance to take full ownership and responsibility for their country. Iraq is better off today because of it. The drawdown has allowed us to chart a new path in our strategic partnership with a sovereign Iraq based on mutual interests and mutual respect.

While Iraq is a better place today, it is clear that Iraq has a long way to go to move beyond a history of violence and instability. Iraq continues to face security challenges, but our focus must be on the future. A normalized relationship between our two countries, based on mutual respect and mutual interests, is the best way to advance U.S., Iraqi, and regional interests. If confirmed, I will continue Secretary Panetta's work to strengthen our military-to-military relationship with Iraq, and further its re-integration into the region.

DOD BUDGET

225. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, if additional resources are necessary to meet our national security needs, would you advocate for a restoration of some of the $487 billion the President plans to cut from future defense budgets?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will work with the President, OMB, and Congress to provide the military capability necessary to defend our Nation. I recognize that the Budget Control Act of 2011 requires that to be done within constrained resources. I believe we can defend the Nation within those limits. If confirmed, I would expect to consult with the President and Congress as circumstances change. However, I do believe that if significant multi-year reductions in funding take place (such as those required by sequestration), the Department would need to revise the defense strategy.

226. Mr. Hagel, do you agree with former Secretary of Defense Robert Gates that a 10 percent, or approximately $50 billion, cut to defense spending in 1 year "operationally would be catastrophic"?

Mr. HAGEL. As both Secretaries Gates and Panetta repeatedly stated, sequestration—both the size and the arbitrary manner of these cuts—would be devastating to the Department. It would harm military readiness and disrupt each and every investment program. Based on my assessment to date, I share their concern. I urge Congress to eliminate the sequester threat permanently and pass a balanced deficit-reduction plan.

FORCE STRUCTURE AND END STRENGTH

227. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, do you support the President's plan to reduce military force structure over the next few years, including reducing Army end strength to approximately 490,000 soldiers by 2017?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will be committed to maintaining the best Army in the world—capable and ready—an Army that will support the mission requirements associated with our defense strategy. In the future our Army will not be sized for large-scale, long-duration stability operations, but instead have the agility to respond where the Nation needs it. I support an Army that is sized according to the defense strategy and the mission requirements that support that strategy.

228. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, given our poor track record of predicting future requirements for ground forces, what do you believe to be the justification for reducing the size of the Army and Marine Corps so dramatically?

Mr. HAGEL. Our force structure and end strength levels should support the overall national security and defense strategies. The defense strategy places emphasis on a smaller, leaner force that is agile, flexible, and ready to deploy quickly; not a force that is sized for large, protracted stability operations. You are right that we have a poor track record in predicting the future. But we have shown that we can rapidly grow our ground forces, if necessary. We also plan to preserve readiness in our Reserve Forces.

229. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, the President has exempted military personnel accounts from cuts related to budget sequestration. Do you agree that cutting training and equipment funding without proportional cuts to military personnel accounts will lead to a hollow force?

Mr. HAGEL. In general, I agree that we must maintain the right balance of end-strength, modernization, and training to guard against a hollow force. However, in the case of the blunt instrument of sequestration, I support the President's exemption of military personnel accounts in fiscal year 2013 due to the fact that across-the-board reductions would be inadvisable for the morale of the force and not cost-effective.

230. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, in the context of overall budget reductions, not specifically budget sequestration, would you recommend curtailing civilian personnel by amounts proportional to cuts made to the military personnel accounts?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that Secretary Panetta has directed an internal scrub to see where savings can be made in civilian personnel accounts. To me this is a prudent review, and something the Department should do continuously. However, it is not clear that a reduction of a certain percentage of uniform personnel can be met with a corresponding reduction in civilian personnel. The two serve different functions, and in some cases, for example cyber efforts, we foresee a growth in civilian personnel. But if confirmed, this is an area I intend to look at closely.

231. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Hagel, do you intend to comply with section 955 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, which directs savings in civilian personnel and service contractor workforces of DOD?

Mr. HAGEL. If I am confirmed, I will ensure the Department complies with section 955.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

GULF REGION MILITARY POSTURE

232. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Hagel, in hindsight it appears your assessment was wrong on both the effectiveness of the Iraq surge and on our method of withdrawal. Some argue that our departure from Iraq and our subsequent disengagement have opened the door to greater Iranian influence in Iraq and strengthened Teheran's position in the Middle East. What alterations, if any, are necessary to our military force posture in the Gulf Region to deter Iranian regional ambitions and support international diplomatic efforts to stop Iran's effort to acquire nuclear weapons?

Mr. HAGEL. In my view, our military posture in the Middle East region remains strong and is a critical component of the President's multi-vector strategy to ensure Iran does not acquire a nuclear weapon. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Joint Chiefs and the CENTCOM Commander to ensure that the Department is fully prepared and adequately postured for any military contingencies in this critically important region, particularly with respect to Iran and the President's firm commitment to prevent it from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

MILITARY READINESS DEPOTS

233. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Hagel, Georgia is home to two of our critical defense depots—Warner Robins Air Logistics Complex and Marine Corps Logistics Base-Albany. One sequestration scenario directs the Military Services to cancel vital 3rd and 4th quarter depot-level maintenance activities. This will have an immediate and lasting impact on military readiness and make it difficult to recover a force that has seen combat for the better part of 2 decades. Furthermore, thousands of highly-skilled workers would lose their jobs; and thousands of hours would be lost for flight time, drive time, and repairs that would ensure our military's equipment is ready when the Nation calls upon them. Describe in detail how you will ensure that depots accomplish their mission and not lose the continuity that is vital to the success of our force readiness if sequestration occurs.

Mr. HAGEL. The work done by the skilled workforce at our defense depots is critical to the Defense Department. I agree with Secretary Panetta that the effects of sequestration will be devastating and will lead to a decline in military readiness. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretaries of the Military Departments, Joint Chiefs, and Military Services to sustain readiness as best we can. However, this will be extremely difficult given the impact of sequestration, especially when combined with the effects of a year-long Continuing Resolution. If sequestration occurs, it will likely not be possible to keep our depots fully operating, and this will impact our future readiness.

GENERAL/FLAG OFFICER REFORM

234. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Hagel, historically, during military draw-downs, enlisted personnel percentages take the brunt of the attrition while a disproportionate amount of general and flag officers remain in place. It seems we have an excessive number of general officers in the ranks. If confirmed, will you take a closer look at the number of general/flag officer authorizations in the military and the size of their support staffs?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that the Track Four Efficiency Study, initiated by Secretary Gates and continued by Secretary Panetta, identified both Service and joint general and flag officer positions for elimination, realignment, or reduction. Execution of these modifications is planned to continue over the next 2 years.

If confirmed, I would support continued efforts to ensure we maintain the appropriate level of leadership across our joint force, seeking efficiencies as mission and force structure changes allow.

DOD FINANCIAL ACCOUNTABILITY

235. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Hagel, in the current fiscal environment it is imperative that we maintain proper financial accountability in DOD. DOD is required to have an auditable financial statement by 2017, an objective that Secretary Panetta accelerated to 2014. What specific steps would you take for DOD to reach this goal by that date?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree financial management improvement is an important priority and support the Department's current plan to have the budgetary statement ready for audit by 2014 and the full set of statements ready by 2017. If confirmed, I intend to review the Department's progress with my senior leadership team on a regular basis and work through them to remove any institutional barriers to achieving this goal.

POST-2014 AFGHAN BILATERAL SECURITY AGREEMENT

236. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Hagel, under the strategic partnership agreement signed by the United States and Afghanistan in May 2012, both countries are obligated to negotiate a bilateral security agreement within 1 year. The talks will set conditions for U.S. forces in Afghanistan after 2014 as part of a train, advise, and assist mission. Oversight is key for this process to be successful. We owe it to our military forces to have an organized, methodical plan in order to not squander the incredible effort expended by the United States in Afghanistan. Will you ensure that Congress is involved in the development process with the bilateral security agreement so that the administration is not planning in a potentially disastrous vacuum?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree on the importance of the Bilateral Security Agreement (BSA) for setting the parameters for our forces in Afghanistan after 2014 and with the need to maintain regular communication with Congress as the BSA negotiations proceed. If confirmed, I will support the administration's sustained engagement with Congress throughout the Bilateral Security Agreement negotiation process.

237. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Hagel, from your viewpoint, what conditions need to be set in a post-2014 Afghanistan with U.S. and coalition involvement for the Afghanistan Government to continue to be successful?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that improvements in security conditions, enabled by continued development of the Afghan National Security Forces, will continue to be critical. Good governance, including sustained efforts to end corruption, is also important to ensure that security gains result in sustainable Afghan self-reliance and governance. Regional peace and deepened cooperation between Afghanistan and its neighbors will also be important for long-term success. If confirmed, I will monitor conditions in and around Afghanistan closely and will continue to assess progress in consultation with commanders on the ground and the Joint Chiefs, to ensure that we are helping to set the conditions for continued success in Afghanistan beyond 2014.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ROGER F. WICKER

USE OF MILITARY FORCE

238. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, in your responses to the advance policy questions, you state that one of the key lessons learned from the Iraq war is the need to think more carefully before using military force, especially regarding the need to plan for all phases of operations before beginning a preemptive conflict.

You have stated repeatedly that the United States should keep all options on the table, to include the use of preemptive military force, to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons. Some military theorists argue that such an attack, even if successful, has the potential to result in a variety of reactions from Iran, including direct attacks on U.S. and allied military forces, attempts to interrupt the flow of commerce through the Strait of Hormuz, and the use of Iranian special operations forces and proxies to conduct destabilizing operations in vulnerable regional countries. Arguably, the second and third order effects of such an attack would be far more widespread than those resulting from the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003.

You also noted in your answers to the advance policy questions that you do not feel knowledgeable enough about how the U.S. military has implemented the lessons learned in Iraq and Afghanistan to make recommendations on additional changes. Why do you believe an attack on Iran is now a viable option, whereas in 2006, you felt differently?

Mr. HAGEL. I am fully committed to the President's policy of preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, and believe all options should be on the table to achieve that goal. A military attack on Iran would most likely have significant consequences, as you have described. But as I've also said, the military option should be the last option considered. However, a nuclear-armed Iran would have far-reaching and unacceptable consequences on regional stability, and on the security of the United States.

239. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, do you feel the U.S. military is adequately prepared to deal with the repercussions from a strike against Iranian nuclear facilities? If not, what changes would need to be implemented?

Mr. HAGEL. While I do not currently have access to the information needed to answer this question, I have great confidence that General Mattis, the Joint Chiefs, and Secretary Panetta have ensured that the U.S. military is prepared to deal with any repercussions from a strike against Iranian nuclear facilities. If confirmed, I will work with the CENTCOM Commander to refine planning as necessary over time, to ensure that our forces remain ready to take any actions the President directs and to defend themselves and the United States.

240. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, how would you engage regional partners to limit the potential destabilizing effects of a strike on Iranian nuclear facilities?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will continue to promote and advance the Department's military-to-military and defense relations with our key partners in the region. These relationships are critical to advance U.S. strategic interests, including preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, supporting the security of the State of Israel, and building the capacity of partner nations to meet common challenges and address future contingencies, if required.

241. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, do you believe you possess the requisite knowledge about the state of the U.S. military and our allies and that you are ready now, given the current state of affairs with Iran, North Korea, and China, to effectively advise the President on the employment of U.S. military forces towards achieving U.S. strategic objectives?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. If confirmed, advising the President regarding the employment of military forces will be my most important duty. I believe I currently have the judgment and experience necessary to advise the President on such matters and have a clear understanding of the role of our military and alliances in achieving national security objectives. If confirmed, I will ensure that my first priority and responsibility is to match this prior experience with deeper knowledge of the current plans and capabilities of our military.

U.S. SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

242. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, would you agree to work closely with this committee and with this Congress in addressing the urgent need to increase our shipbuilding rates?
Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

243. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you remain committed to ensuring that the vessels we build for our sailors and marines are the finest this Nation can produce and that you will never agree to procuring vessels that do not meet the current military classifications for warships?
Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I am committed to ensuring the Navy's fleet is appropriately sized and possesses the capabilities necessary to fulfill its role in defending U.S. interests both in peace and wartime. Recognizing the challenges faced within the Department of Navy to build and maintain an affordable and balanced fleet, I am committed to ensuring that survivability shall be addressed on all new surface ships, combat systems and equipment designs, overhauls, conversions, and modernizations in order that the design is provided a balance of survivability performance, risk, and cost within program objectives.

244. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you agree to analyze all avenues of cost reduction in shipbuilding, including multi-year procurements, block buys of material for multiple ships, and level loading the funding profiles to allow shipbuilders to optimize design and material procurement prior to the start of construction?
Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

245. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, can you provide a rationale for the Defense Logistics Agency's (DLA) move toward a proposed noncommercial model?
Mr. HAGEL. I don't have insight into the specifics of what the DLA proposed model is; however, it is my understanding that the DLA is looking at ways to strengthen its relationships with suppliers to mitigate contract risks. If confirmed, I will be able to look into the details of the specific objectives and actions.

246. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, what additional oversight would such a model provide to ensure the prevention of waste, fraud, and abuse?
Mr. HAGEL. At this time I don't have insight into the DLA model. However I believe it is important that we have transparent contracting practices that reduce risk and prevent fraud, waste, and abuse.

TAIWAN AND U.S.-CHINA RELATIONS

247. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, during an official visit to China in September 2012, Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta extended an invitation to his Chinese counterpart, General Liang Guanglie on the People's Liberation Army's (PLA) participation in the biennial RIMPAC in 2014. RIMPAC is the world's largest international maritime warfare exercise, which in 2012 involved over 40 ships and submarines, more than 200 aircraft, and 25,000 personnel from more than 20 countries from the Pan Pacific region.
The Taiwan Strait has long been a potential flashpoint in the region. Taiwan, one of America's important strategic allies in the region, has been constantly under the threat of a growing PLA. If the PLA is to be invited to RIMPAC, I believe we should consider involving Taiwan as well. Would you consider inviting Taiwan's navy to participate in RIMPAC?
Mr. HAGEL. The United States is firm in its commitment to Taiwan's self-defense needs under the Taiwan Relations Act. That relationship includes defense exchanges and other interactions consistent with our unofficial relationship and as provided for in the Taiwan Relations Act. If confirmed, I will work to identify appropriate exchanges and interactions to assist Taiwan's defense capabilities, and contribute to peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

248. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act and the Six Assurances of 1982 have contributed to the peace and stability of the Asia-Pacific region for the past 3 decades. With the military balance—including air superiority—gradually shifting in China's favor, what are your plans to implement the security commitment the United States has for Taiwan under this framework?
Mr. HAGEL. In my view, the increasing complexity and sophistication of the military threat to Taiwan from China means that Taiwan must devote greater attention to asymmetric concepts and innovative technologies to maximize Taiwan's strengths and advantages. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, throughout DOD, and with our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act.

249. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, as Taiwan is likely to retire some of its older fighter aircraft in the next 5 to 10 years, do you believe that sales of advanced aircraft and submarines are an important next step in this commitment?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that we should make available to Taiwan those defense articles and defense services which enable Taiwan to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability, today and into the future. If confirmed, I will look at what specific capabilities those are—or should be—in light of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait and the evolving military capabilities on the mainland.

EXPORT CONTROL REFORM

250. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, during his tenure as Secretary of Defense, Robert Gates championed export control reform. Specifically, he called for streamlining the foreign military sales, release, and disclosure processes. It is vital that our partners and allies have more certainty of timelines for delivery of critical defense articles and services; however, this is not always the case when our processes get bogged down. Is this something you will also champion if confirmed as Secretary of Defense?

Mr. HAGEL. I fully support the reform efforts because I believe they are absolutely necessary to meet 21st century national security challenges. Secretary Gates played a key role in setting the administration's export control reform objectives: a single list, a single licensing agency, a single primary enforcement coordination agency, and a single U.S. Government-wide information technology licensing system. The administration has made progress in this reform effort, but the work continues. DOD has been fully engaged in revising the U.S. Munitions List and I understand that it plans to continue to focus on completing this important work with our interagency partners to produce a list that is more transparent and predictable for government and industry and which focuses on protecting the most important technologies.

I also fully support ongoing efforts within the Department to streamline and improve U.S. technology security and foreign disclosure processes so that decisions are made in a timely fashion and enable us to focus on the protection of the technologies that are most important, while providing important capabilities to our allies and partners. Finally, if confirmed, I would support implementation of the steps that the Department has taken to continue to improve the Foreign Military Sales process.

ENERGY CERTIFICATION

251. Senator WICKER. Mr. Hagel, section 2830 of the Military Construction Authorization Act for fiscal year 2012 requires DOD to submit to Congress a report on the cost effectiveness of certain green building standards. Part of the report by DOD found that the adoption of Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design certifications by certain departments of DOD is not the most cost effective practice for energy and water savings. As Secretary of Defense, what policies would you implement to ensure that DOD's green building policies meet the military's primary missions of energy and water savings and do not arbitrarily discriminate against American products such as domestic wood?

Mr. HAGEL. While I am not completely familiar with the different green building standards that are available, I do think we need to adhere to the general philosophy of minimizing life-cycle costs and incorporating features in building construction that result in reduced operating costs and lower utility bills. I will support policies to this effect. I will not support policies that arbitrarily discriminate against American products.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

MEDIUM EXTENDED AIR DEFENSE SYSTEM

252. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, section 221 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 prohibits the use of any funding for Medium Extended Air Defense System (MEADS). Are you aware of this provision?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

253. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you ensure that DOD fully complies with this law?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department fully complies with this law.

254. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, how much fiscal year 2012 MEADS funding remains unobligated and how much has been obligated/expended for MEADS under the terms of the Continuing Resolution?

Mr. HAGEL. It is my understanding that of the $390 million in the U.S. fiscal year 2012 funding provided to the NATO management office for MEADS, a total of $335 million has been fully obligated to fund data analysis, archiving the technology and design, capturing performance results, formal contract closeout; and if necessary for termination liabilities for contracts and/or subcontracts. $55 million of fiscal year 2012 funding was also provided to the U.S. Army for management and oversight of sensitive technologies in MEADS. The Department is consulting with our partners, Germany and Italy, in order to complete as much of the remaining design and development effort as possible while allowing for contract closeout. I understand that $210 million of the total fiscal year 2012 funds has been expended as of February 1, 2013. No fiscal year 2013 funds are authorized and none have been obligated or expended under the CR.

255. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, for what purpose were these funds obligated?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #254.

JOINT LAND ATTACK CRUISE MISSILE DEFENSE ELEVATED NETTED SENSOR SYSTEM

256. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, can you provide an update on the deployment status of Joint Land Attack Cruise Missile Defense Elevated Netted Sensor System (JLENS)?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand JLENS is still in development, and that the Department recently completed a study on JLENS location and operational use. It is my understanding a JLENS deployment site was selected and planning is underway for preparing the site. If confirmed, I will review the status of these preparations with the Secretary of the Army and the Commander of U.S. Northern Command.

257. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you commit to ensuring that JLENS will be deployed in a timely fashion?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #256.

258. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what combatant commands have a validated requirement for JLENS or have expressed an interest in JLENS?

Mr. HAGEL. It is my understanding that because of the unique capabilities of JLENS to detect a range of air threats, CENTCOM, U.S. Southern Command, U.S. Pacific Command, and U.S. Northern Command have expressed interest in this capability.

F–35 JOINT STRIKE FIGHTER

259. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what is your assessment of China and Russia's development of fifth generation fighters?

Mr. HAGEL. I have not reviewed the breadth of the programs in detail, but both China and Russia are pursuing advanced fighter aircraft. We are examining ways to respond to these efforts to upgrade their capabilities.

260. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe the F–35 JSF is necessary in an increasingly contested operating environment?

Mr. HAGEL. My view is we cannot let any nation achieve parity with the United States in our ability to control the air. I understand the F–35 will bring advanced capability to the warfighters in a contested environment and ensure the United States can act in our national interest around the globe.

261. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you continue the development and procurement of the fifth generation JSF, including the Marine Corps variant?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will review the F–35 program, to include the Marine Corps variant, to ensure the aircraft are delivered with the capability we need and at a cost we can afford.

BALLISTIC MISSILE THREATS

262. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, analysts have estimated that Iran may be capable of striking the CONUS with a ballistic missile by 2015. Do you agree with this assessment?

Mr. HAGEL. It is clear that Iran continues to pursue longer-range missiles and develop technology that could allow Iran to deploy an ICBM in the future. I believe that U.S. missile defenses must be prepared to defend the United States today and in the future against any potential threat posed by countries like Iran and North Korea.

263. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, in light of this analysis, Congress included section 221 in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013. This section requires the Secretary of Defense to conduct a study that evaluates three possible additional locations in the United States, including two on the east coast, for future deployment of an interceptor to protect the Homeland against missile threats from countries such as North Korea and Iran. Are you aware of this reporting requirement?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

264. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, do you pledge to have the results of this study delivered to Congress within the timeframe outlined in section 221, as required by law?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the study is delivered on time and that Congress remains informed about the Department's decisions about how to best protect the U.S. Homeland from this threat.

SUBMARINE REQUIREMENTS

265. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe the Virginia payload module will mitigate some of the anticipated gap in undersea strike volume?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, although I understand that the cost to include this capability in the Virginia-class is a challenge to available shipbuilding resources.

266. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what percent of combatant commander attack submarine requirements were met by the Navy in 2012?

Mr. HAGEL. I have been informed that the Navy has met approximately 60 percent of the combatant commanders' total attack submarine requirements and 100 percent of the Secretary of Defense-approved Global Force Management Allocation Plan adjudicated requirement for Navy support since 2010. The Global Force Management process allows Navy to meet the combatant commanders' highest priority needs as determined by the Secretary of Defense and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

267. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, do you support Congress' intent to build two Virginia-class submarines in 2014?

Mr. HAGEL. Submarines are critically important to our strategy and future; therefore, resources permitting, I would support plans to build two Virginia-class submarines in 2014.

ELECTRONIC WARFARE

268. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what is your view on the future of electronic warfare/electronic attack?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe the Electronic Warfare/Electronic Attack (EW/EA) will play an increasingly important role in future military operations. It is both an enabler of U.S. operations and a capability that potential adversaries will exploit to counter the longstanding U.S. technological edge in weapon systems. Potential adversaries are pursuing more advanced battlefield systems, including EW/EA, to deny U.S. power projection capabilities and curtail our ability to maneuver, conduct precision strikes, and communicate effectively in a conflict scenario. Continued U.S. investment in EW/EA will be critical to ensuring that the United States can achieve its operational objectives in a timely manner and with a minimum of losses; EW/EA systems will also contribute to the deterrent effect that highly capable U.S. forces exert on potential adversaries.

269. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, do you believe it still plays a vital role in our national security?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #268.

U.S.-RUSSIAN RELATIONS

270. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, do you agree that the United States should not initiate negotiations with Russia for a new arms treaty unless and until we can confirm that Russia is fully honoring existing arms treaties with the United States?

Mr. HAGEL. Compliance with legal obligations is central to the effectiveness of arms control treaties, and concerns about non-compliance must be addressed. If confirmed, I will ensure that DOD works with the Department of State and other interagency partners in assessing and responding to any compliance concerns. While resolution of such issues with Russia is clearly important, I do not believe that discussions of possible further nuclear arms reductions need await resolution of all compliance issues.

271. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, is Russia fully honoring all existing arms treaties with the United States?

Mr. HAGEL. I do not believe that the Russian Federation is fully honoring all of its obligations under existing arms control treaties. For example, Russia ceased implementing the Conventional Armed Forces in Europe Treaty in 2007.

PATRIOT MISSILE SYSTEM

272. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, section 226 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 requires the Secretary of the Army to submit a prioritized plan to Congress for the modernization of the Patriot missile system. Are you aware of this requirement?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

273. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you ensure that the Army delivers this plan within the timeframe outlined in section 226, as required by law?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Army to ensure the Army delivers this plan as required by law.

OVERSEAS CEMETERIES

274. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, are you aware that section 2857 in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 requires DOD to designate a Federal or private agency to maintain base cemeteries before closing overseas military bases?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

275. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you ensure that this provision is adhered to, as required by law?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will carry out the direction given to the Department in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013.

MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES

276. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, are you aware that section 206 in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 authorizes a DOD program to enhance DOD's research, treatment, education, and outreach initiatives focused on addressing the mental health needs of members of the National Guard and Reserve members?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

277. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, do you share my belief that DOD must address these needs?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I am deeply concerned about the mental health issues faced by our servicemembers and their families. If confirmed, I will be committed to providing the highest quality of mental health care and will comply with the provision in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013.

BUDGET AUDITABILITY

278. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, section 1005 in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 that requires DOD to complete a full statement of budget resources by 2014, with the ultimate goal to be full auditability by 2017. Are you aware of this requirement?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes. I understand that those commitments in our current plans have been included in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013.

279. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, do you commit to meeting this statutory requirement and to doing all that you can to promote good financial stewardship and financial transparency at DOD?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree financial management improvement is an important priority and support the Department's current plan to have the budgetary statement ready for audit by 2014 and the full set of statements ready by 2017. If confirmed, I will be committed to achieving this goal and will ensure that senior leaders remain focused on this goal and hold them accountable.

WOMEN IN SELECTIVE SERVICE

280. Mr. Hagel, would you support requiring women to register for the Selective Service? Please explain your response.

Mr. HAGEL. I strongly believe all Americans should be able to serve in our Armed Forces to their maximum abilities. The Selective Service Act is administered by an agency outside of DOD. If I am confirmed, I will look forward to participating in any interagency consideration of selective service registration that may occur. We currently have an All-Volunteer Force that is the finest military in the world. I do not want to suggest that it would be necessary or advisable to restore the draft.

PROSTHESES FOR SERVICEMEMBERS

281. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, are the prostheses that our servicemembers are receiving after a severe injury the most advanced available on the U.S. market?

Mr. HAGEL. The care and support provided to our wounded, ill, and injured are key focus areas for the Department. I understand that the Department supports, along with the Department of Veterans Affairs, an Extremity Injury and Amputation Center of Excellence and that the standard and quality of care regarding prosthetics meets or exceeds what is provided in the private sector. I also understand that the Department supports a variety of research to ensure cutting edge technology is incorporated into addressing the issues for servicemembers with extremity amputations. This includes advanced research into tissue engineering and transplantation. If confirmed, I will continue to support these collective efforts to improve care.

282. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if not, what actions are being taken to gain access to these prostheses for our servicemembers?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #281.

NATIONAL GUARD YOUTH CHALLENGE PROGRAM

283. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, the National Guard Youth Challenge Program (NGYCP) works to intervene in and reclaim the lives of at-risk youth by enhancing their skills, education, and self-discipline. The program has distinguished itself as an effective intervention in the lives of troubled young men and women. Over 110,000 students have graduated from 33 programs nationwide and a majority of these graduates earn their GED and are actively employed following graduation.

The outstanding success enjoyed by the NGYCP is largely a result of the leadership and unique advantages the National Guard brings to the program. The program has also been successful because of the National Guard's emphasis on quality training for the staff.

A 2012 RAND Corporation study highlighted the value of continued investment in the NGYCP. According to the report, the program earned $2.66 in social benefit from students graduating and becoming productive citizens for every $1 spent. Yet, only two cents of that original investment was spent on training the program staff.

Based on the critical role training has played in this essential program's success, if confirmed, do you commit to examining funding for the NGYCP staff training to determine how it has changed over time and whether it is sufficient to maintain the quality of the program?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that training plays a large part in the success of the 100,000 cadets who have successfully completed this program. The Department continues to review ways in which to further improve the NGYCP's performance nationwide, including staff training. If confirmed, I will work closely with Reserve component leaders to evaluate funding for training and other resources.

GUARD AND RESERVES

284. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what is your view of the appropriate role of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Mr. HAGEL. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau serves as a full member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and as the principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense, through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, on matters involving non-Federalized National Guard forces.

285. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what is your assessment of the Reserve and how it will fit into this new strategy of smaller, more lethal forces rotating into and out of many locations of strategic interest?

Mr. HAGEL. The Reserve components have served with distinction over more than a decade of war and continue to be a relevant and cost effective part of the Total Force. In a time of declining budgets and complex contingencies, I believe that the Department will continue to call on both Active and Reserve components to accomplish the domestic and overseas requirements of the new strategy. We are still in the process of finding the proper Active component/Reserve component mix that will most effectively accomplish our new strategy in a constrained fiscal environment.

286. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what is your understanding of the appropriate size and makeup of the Reserve components in light of the current defense strategy and our constrained defense budget?

Mr. HAGEL. The Services each have different requirements for their Reserve Force in their role as force providers. The Service internal force management processes will continue to refine the size and capabilities of each Reserve component to accommodate changes to the defense strategy and reduced budget.

287. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what is your assessment of advances made in improving Reserve and Guard component mobilization and demobilization procedures, and in what areas do problems still exist?

Mr. HAGEL. The Department has made great improvements to the mobilization and demobilization procedures over the past decade. Over 850,000 Reserve and National Guard members have been effectively mobilized to support contingency and support operations. If confirmed, I would expect the Services to continue to review procedures in order to keep faith with our Reserve component members, their families, and civilian employers and make necessary adjustments as needs are identified.

288. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what do you consider to be the most significant enduring challenges to the enabling of an operational reserve aimed at ensuring Reserve component and Guard readiness for future mobilization requirements?

Mr. HAGEL. The Reserve components currently serve in an operational capacity-available, trained, and equipped for predictable routine deployments. With the projected defense budget, the most significant enduring challenge will be sufficient funding to sustain the operational experience of the Reserve components gained over the past decade of utilization.

289. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, do you see a need to modify current statutory authorities for the mobilization of members of the National Guard and Reserves or to further enhance their ability to perform various national security missions?

Mr. HAGEL. At the present time I believe that appropriate authorities are in place to access the National Guard and Reserves across their full spectrum of mission assignments.

290. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, when will dwell time objectives be met for the Reserve components?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand the vast majority of dwell time goals for the Reserve components are currently being met. As we continue the draw-down in Afghanistan these numbers should continue to improve and it is expected that dwell time objectives will be fully met during the last stages of operations there.

291. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what effect would an inability to meet dwell time objectives have on your decision to implement the planned end strength reductions?

Mr. HAGEL. The ability to meet dwell time objectives will be one of the many factors taken into account when determining proper end strength requirements to meet our emerging strategy. Meeting dwell time objectives is an important factor in keeping faith with our All-Volunteer Force and their families but cannot be the sole factor when considering planned end strength requirements.

292. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what is your understanding and assessment of the current size and structure of the Army's Reserve component?

Mr. HAGEL. The Army Reserve component is currently organized with 350,200 soldiers in the Army National Guard and 205,000 soldiers in the Army Reserve. Any changes to the size or force structure capabilities for the Army Reserve components will be analyzed within the Total Force requirements of the Army and will reflect the projected changes in budget and defense strategy.

293. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, what size or force structure changes, if any, would you propose for either the Army Reserve or the Army National Guard?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #292.

INVOLUNTARY SEPARATION

294. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, are you aware of section 525 in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 conference report regarding reports on involuntary separation of members of the Armed Forces?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes.

295. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you comply with this law?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will make certain the Department complies with the provisions of NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013.

SIZE OF THE NAVY

296. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, are you aware of section 1015 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 conference report related to the size of the Navy?

Mr. HAGEL. Yes, I am aware of the reporting requirement in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 related to the size of the Navy. My understanding is that the Navy has complied with the law and submitted the report to Congress on 1 February 2013. The report was submitted as an unclassified document, and additional information about the Force Structure Assessment was also submitted in a classified document.

297. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed, will you comply with this law?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #296.

GLOBAL ZERO REPORT

298. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Hagel, what specific portions of the May 2012 Global Zero report that you authored do you believe should not be implemented?

Mr. HAGEL. In the Global Zero report we took a longer term view of what might be possible under different circumstances, and the report's illustrative reductions to nuclear forces were just that—intended to provide a stimulus to national debate about how many nuclear weapons are enough and to illustrate a possible pathway forward. If confirmed, I will focus on implementing the recommendations of the 2010 NPR, while also considering what additional steps may be appropriate, and will consult with Congress on the way forward.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR LINDSEY GRAHAM

ISRAEL

299. Senator GRAHAM. Mr. Hagel, you were one of four Senators not to sign a bipartisan letter (dated October 12, 2000, circulated by Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott and Senator Tom Daschle) to President Clinton expressing the Senate's solidarity with the State of Israel, at a time when both Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority failed to restrain or comment on violence by Palestinians in violation of the peace process. If you had a chance to reconsider your decision, would you now choose to sign the letter?

Mr. HAGEL. With respect to this specific October 2000 letter, I wholeheartedly agreed with the objectives at the time—expressing solidarity with Israel at a time of crisis—as I do today. Yet, as the AIPAC Press release of October 13, 2000 states,

I was unable to be reached by the deadline in order to sign the letter. The October 13, 2000 press release explicitly states that while two Senators refused to sign the letter (Senators Abraham (MI) and Byrd (WV)), "Senators Hagel and Gregg (NH) could not be reached" by the deadline.

Although the circumstances and leaders have changed significantly since the letter you referenced was sent in 2000, I continue to support the substance of the letter—expressing solidarity with Israel at a time of crisis—and I will continue to express this solidarity and support as I work with my Israeli counterparts if confirmed as Secretary of Defense. The President has said we have Israel's back, and I agree.

As my record in the Senate, my public speeches, and writings in my book demonstrate, I have always been a strong supporter of the U.S.-Israel relationship and of Israel's right to defend itself. Additionally, I was a cosponsor of and voted in favor of a number of pieces of legislation condemning terrorism against Israel, including the Palestinian Anti-Terrorism Act of 2006. The Palestinian Anti-Terrorism Act of 2006 not only condemned Palestinian terrorism, but also placed restrictions on U.S. assistance to the Palestinian Authority (PA) unless the PA, and all components within it, accepted the quartet principles of renouncing violence, abiding by previous agreements, and recognizing Israel's right to exist.

NATIONAL GUARD

300. Senator GRAHAM. Mr. Hagel, the Reserve Forces Policy Board recently issued a report on the fully burdened and lifecycle cost of military personnel and found that a Reserve component member (National Guard or Reserve) when not activated is one-third the cost of an Active component servicemember. In an era of declining budgets, how do you envision leveraging the cost-effectiveness of the National Guard and Reserve Forces to meet our Nation's security needs?

Mr. HAGEL. The highly cost effective National Guard and Reserve have served the Nation well both in peacetime and war. During the last 12 years their service has been particularly admirable both overseas and in reacting to many emergencies here at home. Although I have not analyzed the Reserve Forces Policy Board report you cite, I do believe the Guard and Reserve are less costly in a part time status, and clearly provide highly trained ready assets with a high degree of long-term cost efficiency to significantly help sustain the All-Volunteer Force. If confirmed, it would be my intention to maintain a strong Guard and Reserve, and to take advantage of their skills and efficiencies as we structure an affordable military force in an era of challenging budgets.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR DAVID VITTER

TAIWAN RELATIONS

301. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act and the Six Assurances of 1982 have contributed to the peace and stability of the Asia-Pacific region for the past 3 decades. With the military balance—including air superiority—gradually shifting in China's favor, what are your plans to implement the security commitment the United States has for Taiwan under this framework?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree that the Taiwan Relations Act has contributed to peace and stability in the region for over 30 years. In my view, the increasing complexity and sophistication of the military threat to Taiwan from China means that Taiwan must devote greater attention to asymmetric concepts and innovative technologies to maximize Taiwan's strengths and advantages. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, throughout DOD, and with our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act.

302. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, as Taiwan is likely to retire some of its older fighter aircraft in the next 5 to 10 years, do you believe that sales of advanced aircraft are an important next step in this commitment?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will look at what specific capabilities will help Taiwan meet its self-defense needs in light of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait and the evolving military capabilities on the mainland.

303. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, Secretary Leon Panetta previously extended an invitation to China to be part of RIMPAC last year. Do you believe that as one of the U.S. strategic partners in the region it is important to include Taiwan into the RIMPAC exercises? If so, what is your plan to implement this?

Mr. HAGEL. The United States is firm in its commitment to Taiwan's self-defense needs under the Taiwan Relations Act. That relationship includes defense exchanges and other interactions consistent with our unofficial relationship and as provided for in the Taiwan Relations Act. If confirmed, I will work to identify appropriate exchanges and interactions to assist Taiwan's defense capabilities, and contribute to peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

MILITARY STRATEGY

304. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, our military leaders have stated that the United States and its military is at a strategic crossroads marked by significant challenges. We have done a remarkable job over the last 12 years at catching up to an enemy that we were largely unprepared for: political Islam and those radical Islamists who seek to impose their ideology in order to rule others—to govern political, social, and civic life, as well as religious life. However, we are currently facing a damaging sequester, additional proposed Navy, Army, and Air Force cuts, while engaging in a shift of U.S. strategy towards Asia that seeks to downplay the difficulty associated with the Middle East and Africa. The report calls for a scaling back of stability operations while suggesting that operations carried out using special operations units and drone strikes be increased or sustained. How do you see the military maintaining its joint readiness training aspects as it draws down from two wars when our strategy appears to be heading down a dangerous road?

Mr. HAGEL. Maintaining ready forces is a priority. If confirmed, I will work with the Joint Chiefs to better understand the basis of their assessment and how we can most effectively address the readiness challenges our military faces.

My sense is that the concerns the Joint Chiefs have expressed about readiness come from a variety of factors, including the challenges of recovering from 10 years of operational stress, of transitioning to a broader range of operations, and of doing all of this in the face of fiscal austerity and budget uncertainty. If confirmed, I will carefully monitor how all of these factors are posing risks to readiness and will work closely with the military and civilian leadership of the Department to mitigate those risks to the greatest extent possible.

305. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, what impact do you think current force posturing will have on our ability to deploy to address potential threats that are posed by North Korea, Iran, and around the globe?

Mr. HAGEL. As described in the 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance, the Department is rebalancing toward the Asia-Pacific while maintaining focus on the Middle-East. I think that the significant U.S. military presence and activities in Asia are a clear demonstration of the enduring U.S. commitment to the region and to addressing current and emerging challenges in the Asia-Pacific. Moreover, if confirmed as Secretary, I would take every step to maintain the ability of America to conduct successful combat operations in more than one region at a time, ensuring that we have the ability to meet threats around the world, as in the Middle East and North Africa, when they arise. Our global posture, engagement with allies and partners, and investment in flexible defense architectures for high-demand capabilities, such as ballistic missile defense, are of great importance.

North Korea's December Taepo Dong II missile launch and recent threats to conduct a third nuclear test underscore the growing North Korean threat to international peace and security. U.S. diplomatic efforts following the December missile launch, particularly with China, resulted in U.N. Security Council Resolution 2087, which affirms the international community's opposition to North Korea's provocations. The tightened sanctions in the resolution will help impede the growth of North Korea's weapons of mass destruction program. If confirmed, I will continue to ensure our military provides the deterrence and defense necessary to protect our allies and our interests. This posture is also the best way to create conditions where diplomacy has the best possible prospects to succeed.

With respect to Iran, I believe that it is critical that the U.S. military maintain a robust presence in the region to counter Iran, reassure our partners, and build partner capacity. Our carrier presence is a key element of this presence. If confirmed, I will work with the combatant commanders to revalidate our posture and ensure it best addresses the threats, challenges, and opportunities in the region to preserve all options for the President while balancing other national security needs.

306. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, you stated in responses to advance policy questions in regard to the Joint Chief's concerns about a hollow force that: "the concerns the Joint Chiefs have expressed about readiness come from a variety of factors, including the challenges of recovering from 10 years of operational stress of transitioning to a broader range of operations, and of doing all of this in the face of fiscal austerity and budget uncertainty."

Successfully meeting our national security strategic objectives with a smaller, overall force will require us to improve our focus on training our servicemembers from the separate branches effectively. Last year General Ray Odierno, USA, Chief of Staff of the Army spoke to this committee about the importance of a joint force that is flexible and adaptive to the challenges of the new environment. Could you please provide assurances that vital training will not be walked away from, training such as Joint Readiness Training Centers where the Air Force and Army conduct training operations that hugely effect fundamental joint operations?

Mr. HAGEL. Maintaining ready forces is of highest priority, especially in a world of ever changing challenges and threats. If confirmed, I will work with the Joint Chiefs to better understand the basis of their assessment and how we can most effectively address the readiness challenges our military faces. The highest yield training exercises will be revisited frequently to ensure that our forces remain flexible and adaptive to meet our new challenges.

307. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, how do you plan to monitor risk and the potential mismatch between constrained resources and demands of operational plans?

Mr. HAGEL. I am deeply impressed by the caliber and capabilities of our military forces. It is vitally important that they be ready to respond to the Nation's needs, and I am concerned that further budget cuts will negatively affect readiness. If confirmed, I will get regular updates by the Joint Chiefs on where we must devote the Department's attention and resources to ensure the readiness of the force.

NUCLEAR DETERRENT

308. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, in the Global Zero report, within the context of rebalancing nuclear deterrence you state, "new opportunities will emerge for cooperation with allies and other countries with common security interests." In your 2008 book you stated that, "the world needs to establish a new global consensus on nuclear disarmament and nonproliferation . . . as the world's largest nuclear power the United States has a responsibility to lead in that effort . . . " and that "we must once again convince the world that America has the clear intention of fulfilling the nuclear disarmament commitments that we have made."

There are nine nuclear powers who are out there and a number of others who are pursuing nuclear capabilities. Do you believe the elimination of the U.S. nuclear triad or Global Strike Command as an independent command will increase the security of the United States and lead to a more peaceful world?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe in the President's long-term vision of a world without nuclear weapons. It is a vision shared by nearly every President since Eisenhower, including Ronald Reagan. I also support the President's commitment that the United States will not disarm unilaterally. If confirmed, I look forward to leading DOD in supporting the President's objectives to reduce the number of nuclear weapons and their roles in national security policy and to create the conditions that will allow others to join with us in this process. Our efforts to modernize the nuclear deterrent and build a responsive infrastructure go hand-in-hand with efforts to reduce the world's nuclear dangers. The United States must have a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent so long as nuclear weapons remain. If confirmed, I will work to ensure the needed leadership focus on this issue and that institutional excellence for nuclear deterrence remains a part of the President's comprehensive approach to nuclear security.

309. Senator VITTER. Mr. Hagel, the Global Zero report would seriously limit B–52s and U.S. nuclear deterrent. Please share your thoughts on how you balance your previous position with your statements that you support our nuclear deterrents.

Mr. HAGEL. In the Global Zero report we took a longer term view of what might be possible under different circumstances. The report's illustrative reductions to nuclear forces were just that—intended to provide a stimulus to national debate about how many nuclear weapons are enough and to illustrate a possible pathway forward. If confirmed, I will focus on implementing the recommendations of the 2010 NPR, while also considering what additional steps may be appropriate, and will consult with Congress on the way forward.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ROY BLUNT

JOINT PROFESSIONAL MILITARY EDUCATION

310. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, do you believe Joint Professional Military Education (JPME) helps ensure that the individual Services and other agencies that play a role in national security cooperate effectively?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe JPME, as established under the Goldwater-Nichols Act, has been central to strengthening and integrating the Joint Force. It is my understanding that the JPME system is fundamentally designed to foster cooperation and jointness among the members of the different Services. I also understand that members of the interagency, as well as international partners, attend JPME. As the last decade of war has shown, jointness among our servicemembers and their civilian partners is critical to success.

311. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, if so, what would you do as Secretary of Defense to continue to expand and improve our JPME culture and programs?

Mr. HAGEL. I am not yet familiar with the scope of current JPME programs. If confirmed, I will work with civilian and military leadership to assess the effectiveness of these programs and propose any changes that are deemed necessary.

DEFENSE BUDGET AND NATIONAL MILITARY STRATEGY

312. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, given the potential severe cuts that could be imposed upon the defense budget due to sequestration, how will you put a process in place to ensure a strategy-driven QDR process that produces recommendations "fully independent of the budget"?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will work with the Department's leadership team to ensure that the QDR starts with an assessment of the opportunities and challenges that the Nation faces in the emerging global security environment, and then identifies priorities based on our national security interests for defense policy and force planning. The assessment of threats, risks, and opportunities, along with the identification of national security interests, would be undertaken fully independent of the budget. Prioritization of objectives and identification of approaches would follow and be resources informed in order to ensure they are realistic and appropriate.

CYBER SECURITY

313. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, what should be the DOD's role in protecting the United States against foreign cyber-attacks to the Homeland?

Mr. HAGEL. DOD has the mission to defend the Nation in cyberspace and to support a whole-of-government effort to address cyber threats. I support this approach. This mission includes a close partnership with DHS in its role of leading efforts for the cybersecurity of U.S. critical infrastructure, and non-DOD unclassified government networks.

314. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, what should be the DOD's role in protecting the United States against Iranian attacks on the financial sector?

Mr. HAGEL. While I cannot speak to the details of any specific attacks, I believe that DOD should contribute its capabilities to support a whole-of-government effort to address cyber (and other) threats to U.S. national and economic security. The President has made clear that the United States will respond to hostile acts in cyberspace as we would any other threat to our country, and that the United States reserves the right to use all necessary means, including military means as a last resort, to defend our Nation and our interests. I support this approach.

315. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, are we adequately deterring our adversaries in cyberspace?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that a number of important steps have been taken to deter malicious activity in cyberspace, but that the United States must do more to protect public and private networks from cyber threats. DOD should continue to develop its cyber capabilities and expertise, and it should work closely with its public, private, and international partners to deter and discourage malicious behavior. I also believe that legislation providing for increased information sharing on cyber threats and the development of critical infrastructure cybersecurity standards, in partnership with the private sector, would help reduce vulnerabilities and protect our national and economic security.

316. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, are you worried that America's use of cyberwarfare capabilities—such as the famous STUXNET attack on Iran—is setting a dangerous precedent for others?

Mr. HAGEL. I am not able to comment on STUXNET or who was responsible for it, but I do think that the increased frequency of disruptive cyber activities is a clear national security concern. Recent such examples of destructive attacks, such as the Shamoon virus that virtually destroyed 30,000 computers at Saudi Arabian State Oil Company Aramco, are a significant escalation in the cyber threat.

317. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, given our growing dependence on computer networks, should we pursue some sort of a global regime to limit this danger?

Mr. HAGEL. I agree with the President that longstanding norms guiding state behavior, including the law of armed conflict, also apply in cyberspace. I also believe we should continue to press for the development of international cyberspace norms that build upon common principles for responsible state behavior.

TAIWAN

318. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, in accordance with the Taiwan Relations Act, the 113th Congress will likely advance commercial relations with and foster future defense sales to Taiwan. However, as China's naval, air, and missile capabilities increase, defending Taiwan will become increasingly difficult. Please describe your security commitments to Taiwan as they relate to the sale of advanced aircraft to the Taiwan Government.

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that the Taiwan Relations Act has contributed to peace and stability in the region for over 30 years. In my view, the increasing complexity and sophistication of the military threat to Taiwan from China means that Taiwan must devote greater attention to asymmetric concepts and innovative technologies to maximize Taiwan's strengths and advantages. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, throughout DOD, and with our interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act. If confirmed, I will look at what specific capabilities self-defense capabilities Taiwan needs in light of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait and the evolving military capabilities on the mainland.

U.S. POLICY IN THE CAUCASUS

319. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, how do you assess U.S.-Azerbaijan relations and what will be your policy to expand this strategic partnership?

Mr. HAGEL. I recognize the many shared interests and current cooperation between the United States and Azerbaijan across the foreign policy, economics, energy, and cultural spheres. In particular, the U.S.-Azerbaijan defense relationship is strong, with room to grow. I understand that DOD engages in regular consultations at high levels with Azerbaijani counterparts to identify areas where we can strengthen our cooperation and partnership.

If confirmed, I would continue this senior level engagement with Azerbaijan and continue the Department's commitment to supporting Azerbaijan's defense reforms, ability to interoperate with NATO and deploy to coalition operations, and capacity to address terrorism and other transnational threats and secure its maritime borders and energy infrastructure. I would look for the United States to be Azerbaijan's partner of choice and help Azerbaijan's defense establishment contribute to regional security and stability, such as with Azerbaijan's significant support to international efforts in Afghanistan.

320. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, how should the United States respond to the continued presence of Russian military forces inside internationally-recognized Georgian territory?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that the United States should continue to support Georgia's territorial integrity within its internationally recognized borders, and remain steadfast in non-recognition of the occupied territories of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. We should continue to object to Russia's occupation and militarization of Georgian territory. If confirmed, I would speak out in support of Georgia's territorial integrity and to call on Russia to fulfill its obligations under the 2008 ceasefire agreement, including withdrawal of its forces to pre-conflict positions and free access for humanitarian assistance. I would continue to support the U.S. role as an active participant in the Geneva discussions, working with the co-chairs and others in pursuit of a resolution to the conflict.

We should continue to fully support Georgia's sovereignty and territorial integrity as we seek to work on practical steps with Russia to promote stability and security on the ground and ultimately, a peaceful resolution of the conflict.

321. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, how do you assess the current U.S. military relationship with countries in the Caucasus region, specifically Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan?

Mr. HAGEL. I believe DOD has fostered strong relations with Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan to strengthen each nation's political independence and contributions to broader regional security and stability. I understand that there are regular senior level consultations with each of these partners, in support of defense reforms, interoperability with NATO and support to coalition operations, and building capacity to address the range of transnational threats in the region. I believe that these defense partnerships have produced notable successes, including the significant contributions made by each country to NATO operations. In Afghanistan, Georgia has deployed two battalions of soldiers. Armenia and Azerbaijan have each supplied a company to the NATO International Security Assistance Force (ISAF). Georgia and Azerbaijan provide key transit access into the Afghanistan theater. In Kosovo, Armenia has deployed a platoon of soldiers under U.S. command to the NATO Kosovo Force (KFOR).

Our defense partnerships should take into account the many political and security challenges the region faces, among them the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict and the occupied territories in Georgia. We should design our engagement deliberately so that it carefully contributes to regional stability rather than enflaming existing tensions.

322. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, should the United States deepen its military ties with these nations?

Mr. HAGEL. The United States has a shared interest with Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan to partner on the development of each nation as a contributor of security and stability to the broader region. If confirmed, I would continue to engage these nations and seek areas to deepen these partnerships in ways appropriate to our shared interests, political will, available resources, and capacity to absorb new capabilities and missions.

323. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, how will these ties impact U.S. relations with Russia?

Mr. HAGEL. It is prudent to give consideration to how improved ties with one country might affect the broader region. If confirmed, I would support DOD efforts to seek and provide transparency in our defense cooperative relations in the region. I would look for Department engagement to be guided by principles that strive to enhance regional security, the strengthening of responsible defense reforms, and adherence to the rule of law. These principles must also strengthen sovereignty and independence-the United States should continue to emphasize its desire to cooperate and assist, not to dominate or impose. If confirmed, I would support engagement with key states throughout the region, including Russia, and strive to ensure all recognize that U.S. cooperation with one is not at the expense of the cooperation with or security of another.

324. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, do you believe that NATO should expand?

Mr. HAGEL. I support the administration position that NATO's door remains open.

325. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, please describe how U.S. defense policies can ensure the sovereignty and political independence of our regional partners such as Azerbaijan and Armenia.

Mr. HAGEL. The objective of our relations with Azerbaijan and Armenia should be to strengthen each nation's political independence and contributions to broader regional security and stability. We should continue to seek regional stability through our bilateral and multilateral engagement. DOD has an important role to play in those regards, supporting overall U.S. engagement objectives.

U.S. AFRICA COMMAND

326. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, undoubtedly, radical fundamentalism and terrorism continues to spread in Northern Africa. What is U.S. Africa Command's (AFRICOM) role in responding to and preventing the spread of terrorism in Mali, Nigeria, Somalia, Libya, and now Egypt?

Mr. HAGEL. Countering terrorism in Africa, just as elsewhere in the world, is a multi-faceted problem requiring a whole-of-government solution. DOD contributes to the counterterrorism mission in Africa primarily by strengthening the defense capabilities of African states and regional organizations, and by working to support African-led operations, such as the African Union Mission in Somalia. AFRICOM is responsible for implementing DOD's counterterrorism and partner capacity-building missions throughout the African continent through military-military exchanges, exercises, and security cooperation on the African continent. When directed, AFRICOM is also prepared to conduct military operations in order to deter and defeat terrorism and other transnational threats, and to provide a security environment conducive to good governance and development.

MOVEMENT OF TROOPS TO AUSTRALIA

327. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, please describe the nature, purpose, and strategic importance of our "permanent and constant" commitment to a U.S. military presence in Australia as it relates to countering China's influence and reasserting U.S. interests in the region.

Mr. HAGEL. In 2010, the Prime Minister of Australia and President Obama agreed to establish a rotational U.S. Marine Corps presence in northern Australia. The first rotation of approximately 200 U.S. marines took place from April through September 2012. In addition, closer cooperation between the Royal Australian Air Force and the U.S. Air Force has resulted in increased rotations of U.S. aircraft through northern Australia. These two initiatives further enhance the capabilities of both countries by increasing opportunities for combined training and enabling more effective pursuit of common interests in the Asia-Pacific region. Building on the interoperability developed through joint operations over the past decade in Iraq and Afghanistan, these initiatives will help us deepen that interoperability long after the wars are over. The United States will not build any U.S. bases in Australia. U.S. forces will rotate in and out of Darwin and will be co-located with Australian forces on existing Australian military bases.

Our military cooperation with Australia helps the United States rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific region and specifically supports efforts to become more geographically distributed and operationally resilient in the Pacific. U.S.-Australian force posture initiatives are not aimed at any one country. I believe that the U.S. rotational presence in northern Australia and our strong alliance with Australia will lead to further cooperation with a variety of nations. The United States sees many shared regional challenges in the Asia-Pacific, including responding to natural disasters, countering extremism, ensuring freedom of navigation, and enhancing regional stability.

SATELLITE AND RADIO SYSTEMS

328. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, DOD's satellite and radio systems are essential to our national security. However, some of the spectrum that DOD currently controls is well-suited for use for commercial mobile broadband services. In fact, the 1755–1780 MHz band, which DOD holds the license for, is particularly well suited for mobile broadband because it is already being used for this purpose internationally. Additionally, the administration has a stated priority, as part of the National Broadband Plan, of making more spectrum available for auction to commercial providers for consumer use. Ostensibly, this plan would include both the reallocation of some broadcast spectrum and of some spectrum licenses held by government users. Can you provide the cost estimate for relocating DOD operations off of the 1755–1780 MHz band?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand that DOD and the other Federal agencies are working through National Telecommunication and Information Agency's (NTIA) established processes to support the President's goal to make 500 MHz available for commercial mobile broadband use. As part of that process, the Department has conducted a detailed study of the cost and operational feasibility of reallocation of the entire 1,755–1,850 MHz band, which is used by the Department to meet mission requirements. The NTIA has reported that it would cost nearly $13 billion for DOD to vacate the entire 95 MHz, and $18 billion to cover non-Department systems as well, and that alternate spectrum and adequate time to transition to that alternate spectrum would need to be provided. If I am confirmed, I will direct the Department to consult with NTIA about whether it would be useful for the NTIA to initiate a detailed study of vacating just the lower 25 MHz.

BASE REALIGNMENT AND CLOSURE COMMISSION

329. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, what is your position on the establishment of a new BRAC Commission to oversee additional domestic base closures?

Mr. HAGEL. I understand Congress did not accept that the administration's proposal for two rounds of BRAC. However, I think it is necessary for the Department to examine its infrastructure and eliminate excess. While the BRAC process is not perfect, it is the best process identified to date, and I believe a fair and comprehensive way to right-size the Department's domestic footprint. If confirmed, I would have to look at the need for BRAC in the future and would work with Congress on any such proposal.

TACTICAL AVIATION COMPETITION

330. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, DOD faces an upcoming challenge to maintain a competitive and innovative defense industrial base to meet the Nation's tactical aviation needs. The fiscal year 2013 President's budget demonstrates a near-term shift to a single manufacturer for tactical aircraft. This outcome will have significant consequences: with a single-source option for tactical aircraft programs, DOD will lose vital competition that can help drive down costs, leading to potentially more expensive, less capable systems; investment in innovative technology and engineering for tomorrow's capabilities will suffer without a balanced, diverse tactical aviation base; and a limited manufacturing capability will struggle to be flexible to cope with changing demand and there will be no way to manage risk for future developing programs. Today, the F/A–18 program provides DOD with a highly capable, affordable, and available manufacturing line that promotes competition and drives innovation into tactical aviation. It is the only current American tactical aircraft that can fill operational gaps or address the Navy's tactical aviation shortfall. All F/A–18 aircraft—the F/A–18E/F Block II Super Hornet and EA–18G Growler—continue to be delivered on-cost and ahead of schedule. Can you please discuss the importance of maintaining competition in tactical aviation production?

Mr. HAGEL. I recognize that competition in all acquisition programs, including tactical aviation production, is key to affordability, to innovation, and to a strong industrial base. I intend to fully support the continuation of appropriate competition.

331. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, if confirmed as Secretary of Defense, what can DOD do to ensure that the F/A–18 line isn't ended in the near-term, both for the purposes of filling potential operational gaps and managing risk of future tactical aviation programs?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will assess the balance of strike fighter capability, and the state of the F/A–18 production line. I will also ensure the Department supports international sales of the F/A–18.

INTERNATIONAL SALES

332. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Hagel, in your testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, you discussed the need to protect the core defense industrial base, even during a time that budget challenges will lead to some necessary cuts in spending. One particular way to support the Nation's defense infrastructure is to support international sales of American defense manufacturing. International sales help keep manufacturing facilities alive while ensuring that the engineering expertise and workforce are retained for additional domestic production. Your predecessor, Secretary Panetta, took this responsibility very seriously, advocating for American defense platforms vigorously as they competed against other international options in campaigns abroad. The Military Services can also be strong advocates, although not all demonstrate the same level of commitment to international campaigns. If you are confirmed as Secretary of Defense, can you describe your role—both personally and as a broader policy within DOD—to support international sales of eligible American defense programs? Please discuss on how DOD and the individual Services might better promote American products abroad.

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that international sales help to sustain the defense industrial base, and strengthen our relationship with allies and partners.

If confirmed, I would work closely with the Secretary of State and Congress to shape international sales planning and to support the timely transfer of capability. I would also meet with defense industry leaders to identify areas where foreign sales opportunities exist that would help sustain needed industrial capabilities.

Furthermore, if confirmed, I would continue to build on the foundation established by both Secretaries Gates and Panetta to streamline the Department's foreign military sales process.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MIKE LEE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

333. Senator LEE. Mr. Hagel, nuclear deterrence has been a successful element of our national defense posture for decades. What is your position on and rationale for the number of nuclear warheads and their disposition among the three forms of delivery in order to maintain a credible and successful nuclear deterrent posture for our Nation?

Mr. HAGEL. America's nuclear deterrent for more than 60 years has played a central role in ensuring global security. If confirmed, I will be committed to maintaining a safe, secure, and effective nuclear arsenal. I believe that a triad of ICBMs, SLBMs, and nuclear-capable heavy bombers continues to support U.S. national security interests under New START limits.

334. Senator LEE. Mr. Hagel, what do you see as the future of Minuteman III?

Mr. HAGEL. With regard to Minuteman III, I am aware that the NDAA for 2007 requires sustaining the Minuteman III weapon system through 2030. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department continues to assess the whole Minuteman system and its components to be sure that this system is sustained through at least 2030.

F–35

335. Senator LEE. Mr. Hagel, the Air Force has retired nearly 1,900 aircraft over the past decade, the majority of which have not been replaced. Fighter inventories have been reduced by almost 25 percent and F–22 production was truncated to well below original Air Force requirements. While newer aircraft tend to be more capable than those they replace, even a more capable aircraft can only be in one place at one time. The F–35 is now the sole remaining fighter modernization program in DOD. What is your position on the need for this aircraft and how will you ensure we continue to modernize an aging fighter force?

Mr. HAGEL. My view is we cannot let any other nation achieve parity with the United States in the ability to control the air. My understanding is that other nations are developing modern fighters that will challenge our existing fighters and that the F–35 is needed to maintain our advantage. If confirmed I will review the health of the F–35 program to ensure the aircraft are delivered with the capability we need and at a cost we can afford. I will also examine our options for continued modernization in this critical area.

DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

336. Senator LEE. Mr. Hagel, DOD relies on our Nation's defense industrial base to provide and support the equipment needed by our military to fulfill its role in our national defense. What steps would you take to ensure that we have a robust defense industrial base, both public and private, that can reliably and affordably provide and support our military equipment in a timely manner in the future?

Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will place a high priority on ensuring the continued viability of the industrial base. I will assess the programs the Department has already authorized and that are underway to ensure they meet that goal.

Working closely with the Military Services and industry, I will ensure early identification of those skills and manufacturing capabilities that are both critical and increasingly fragile, and take appropriate actions necessary to preserve those few capabilities.

U.S. ROLE IN THE UNITED NATIONS

337. Senator LEE. Mr. Hagel, what role should the United States play within the U.N. peacekeeping missions?

Mr. HAGEL. The United States has historically played an important role in guiding and supporting U.N. peacekeeping missions, and I believe that this approach continues to make good sense. As a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, we should continue to exert leadership across the full spectrum of peacekeeping activities—from mission inception and establishment, through various phases of operations until mission closure. In such diverse venues as Haiti, Liberia, Sudan and South Sudan, U.N. peacekeeping is making vital contributions to peace and stability in the face of enormous challenges. It will not always make sense for the United States to provide "boots on the ground" to U.N. peacekeeping missions, but I do believe there are likely to be cases where U.S. direct involvement will be in U.S. national interests.

338. Senator LEE. Mr. Hagel, do you still feel that the United States should deploy ground troops as U.N. peacekeepers in a non-militarized Palestinian state? If not, what has changed?

Mr. HAGEL. I support a two-state solution, with two states living side-by-side in peace and security: the Jewish State of Israel and an independent Palestinian State; each state enjoying self-determination, mutual recognition, and peace. The arrangements necessary to achieve a lasting and effective peace can only by determined by the parties through negotiations. In addressing the specific security arrangements, these details will also need to be determined by the parties, along with the other final status issues. Israel must be able to defend itself—by itself—against any threat. The security provisions in a final peace deal must be robust enough to prevent a resurgence of terrorism; to stop the infiltration of weapons; and to provide effective border security. The United States, and the international community, should be prepared to support these security requirements as requested by the parties.

MILITARY INVOLVEMENT IN ASIA

339. Senator LEE. Mr. Hagel, in your opinion what effect will the recent shift to the Pacific bring to Asian countries? What will the shift mean for: Russia, China, North Korea, Japan, and the Republic of China?

Mr. HAGEL. The President has said that the rebalance to the Asia-Pacific is a whole-of-government effort to renew and deepen U.S. engagement throughout the Asia-Pacific. This policy is not a new shift, but an increased assertion of this region's relative economic, political, and security importance—one with which I agree. A key tenet of the rebalance should continue to be modernizing our alliances and deepening partnerships, especially through increased regional engagement and capacity building, bilaterally and multilaterally.

Japan is the linchpin of our presence in Asia. Japan is an increasingly critical partner in missile defense, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief, maritime security, and other important areas. I would continue the work of my predecessors to broaden and deepen this critical alliance to ensure that it is capable of responding to the security challenges of the 21st century.

The United States has a similarly robust relationship with the Republic of Korea (ROK). My understanding is that we have a comprehensive agenda aimed at facilitating the smooth transfer of wartime operational control in 2015, and ensuring the ROK Government has the capabilities necessary to defend the peninsula. I would continue these important efforts, and would also continue to stress the importance of trilateral ties between Japan, the ROK, and the United States.

The Taiwan Relations Act provides that the United States "will make available to Taiwan such defense articles and defense services in such quantity as may be necessary to enable Taiwan to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability." That policy has contributed to peace and stability in the region for over 30 years and is consistent with longstanding U.S. policy, which calls for a peaceful resolution of the Taiwan issue in a manner acceptable to the people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait. If confirmed, I would work closely with Congress, the Commander of U.S. Pacific Command, and the Department's interagency partners to ensure the continued effective implementation of all of the relevant provisions of the Taiwan Relations Act.

Our relationship with China will be critical in the rebalance. We will continue to build our partnership with China based on practical steps to address shared challenges and interests in the region while also monitoring the rapid modernization of China's military and assertion of territorial claims in the region.

Through the rebalance we will work with our partners to deter destabilizing and provocative behavior by North Korea, including its proliferation activities, ballistic missile program, and nuclear program which continue to present a serious threat to the United States, our regional allies, and the international community. We will also ensure that we can deter and, if necessary, defeat North Korean aggression.

The United States will work to build trust and understanding with Russia in areas of mutual interest in Asia and encourage it to be a contributor across a broad range of issues in the region.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR TED CRUZ

IRAN SANCTIONS

340. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, you claim to have voted against the renewal of the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA) in 2001 because "I thought there might be other ways to harness our vast power and that of our allies." Please specify what other ways would have been more effective than the sanctions imposed by ILSA.

Mr. HAGEL. I believe that multilateral sanctions against Iran, backed by a unified world community, are the most effective sanctions. For example, the multilateral sanctions implemented in U.N. Security Council (UNSC) Resolution 1929—which resulted from President Obama's work in 2010 to cement the Permanent 5 UNSC members in unanimously supporting multilateral efforts—are the most crippling sanctions against Iran in history. Continuing to maintain the international community's unified stance to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon—to include further sanctions if necessary—is more effective than implementing unilateral sanctions. However, times and circumstances have changed significantly since 2001 and I agree that Iran's continued pursuit of a nuclear weapon means that further sanctions, both multilateral and unilateral, may be necessary.

341. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, after receiving criticism for your record on sanctions, you wrote in a letter to Senator Barbara Boxer that you now "agree that with Iran's continued rejection of diplomatic overtures, further effective sanctions, both multilateral and unilateral—may be necessary . . . " In your advance policy questions, you also compliment the President's strategy on Iran, and acknowledge that it has "included the application of smart, unprecedented, and effective sanctions against the Iranian regime . . . " The sanctions the President has utilized include unilateral sanctions. Why do you now feel you can support unilateral sanctions, when for years in the Senate you opposed their use?

Mr. HAGEL. I continue to fully support President Obama's policy with respect to sanctions on Iran. While there are some circumstances in which unilateral sanctions are effective, I believe that multilateral sanctions against Iran are the most effective approach. For example, the multilateral sanctions implemented in UNSC Resolution 1929—which resulted from President Obama's work in 2010 to cement the Permanent 5 UNSC members in unanimously supporting multilateral efforts—are the most crippling sanctions against Iran in history. Continuing to maintain the international community's unified stance to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon—to include further sanctions if necessary—is more effective than implementing unilateral sanctions.

That said, now that we have built international support for sanctions against Iran, unilateral sanctions are more likely to have a crippling effect. As I wrote to Senator Boxer, I agree that with Iran's continued pursuit of a nuclear weapon may make further effective sanctions, both multilateral and unilateral, necessary.

342. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, in your advance policy questions, you also state that the President's strategy on Iran "smartly . . . made clear that all options are on the table" and that you "agree with the President that the United States should take no options off the table in our efforts to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon." You then promise that, if confirmed, you "will focus intently on ensuring that the U.S. military is, in fact, prepared for any contingency." Yet in 2010 you told a forum at the Atlantic Council that you were "not so sure it is necessary to continue to say all options are on the table" with respect to Iran. You wrote in your 2008 book America: Our Next Chapter that, "the genie of nuclear armaments is already out of the bottle, no matter what Iran does," and went on to imply that sovereign nation states possessing nuclear weapons could be excepted to respond with "some degree of responsible, or at least sane, behavior." Please clarify your view on whether or not the military option should remain on the table with Iran.

Mr. HAGEL. Let me be clear: I support the President's policy on Iran of prevention, not containment. We must prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. I have never advocated for a policy of containment nor have I ever stated the United States could live with a nuclear Iran. In order to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, we must keep all options on the table, including the military option. If confirmed as the Secretary of Defense, I will—as stated previously—ensure that the U.S. military is planning and prepared for all contingencies. I have consistently argued in favor of keeping all options on the table, including in my September 28, 2012 Washington Post op-ed co-authored with two former CENTCOM commanders, where we said, "Our position is fully consistent with the policy of presidents for more than a decade of keeping all options on the table, including the use of military force, thereby increasing pressure on Iran while working toward a political solution."

343. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, in regards to the quote in your book, why would you feel that a military option would be necessary, when you seem to believe that the United States and our allies could live with a nuclear Iran?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #342.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

344. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, you are a signatory of Global Zero, an initiative dedicated to the elimination of all nuclear weapons. You were also a member of the six-person Global Zero U.S. Nuclear Policy Commission, headed by retired U.S. Marine Corps General James Cartwright. As a result, your name appears on the Commission's May 2012 report, which calls for cutting deployed U.S. nuclear warheads from 1,550 to 450 strategic weapons by 2022. In your testimony, you insisted this report was merely illustrative and had no relevance to your actual policy on our nuclear arsenal. Yet in your 2008 book America: Our Next Chapter, you wrote with respect to nuclear disarmament: "As the world's largest nuclear power, the United States has a responsibility to lead in this effort. There is no other way. In particular, we must once again convince the world that America has the clear intention of fulfilling the nuclear disarmament commitments that we have made." Please explain specifically how you will fulfill the responsibility you believe we have to lead the effort on nuclear disarmament.

Mr. HAGEL. I believe in the President's long-term vision of a world without nuclear weapons. It is a vision shared by nearly every President since Eisenhower, including Ronald Reagan. I also support the President's commitment that the United States will not disarm unilaterally. If confirmed, I look forward to leading DOD in supporting the President's objectives to reduce the number of nuclear weapons and their roles in national security policy and to create the conditions that will allow others to join with us in this process. Our efforts to modernize the nuclear deterrent and build a responsive infrastructure go hand-in-hand with efforts to reduce the world's nuclear dangers. The United States must have a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent so long as nuclear weapons remain. If confirmed, I will work to ensure the needed leadership focus on this issue and that institutional excellence for nuclear deterrence remains a part of the President's comprehensive approach to nuclear security.

NEGOTIATING WITH RUSSIA

345. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, you have insisted that you have always been a strong proponent of bilateral arms control agreements, and you have spoken warmly in the press (Interview on the Riz Kahn Show, Al Jazeera, 3/21/09) of former President Dimitri Medvedev as a youthful leader with a strong commitment to nuclear arms reduction. Going into the new round of arms talks with Russia that was announced this week, do you consider President Vladimir Putin a similarly reliable negotiating partner?

Mr. HAGEL. While there has been no announcement of new arms control talks, if there are such talks in the future, I would expect President Putin to come to the table as a reliable negotiating partner. Of course, being a "reliable" partner does not mean that President Putin, or any negotiator, will agree with U.S. positions or perspectives. But I expect that he would enter into negotiations as a reliable negotiating partner.

346. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, Senator Kerry was asked during his confirmation hearing about our relationship with Russia and if he would recommend entering into any new arms control measures until all compliance and verification issues regarding existing agreements were fully settled. Would you recommend any new arms control agreements if there are existing verification and compliance issues with current agreements?

Mr. HAGEL. Compliance with legal obligations is central to the effectiveness of arms control treaties, and concerns about noncompliance must be addressed. If confirmed, I will ensure that DOD works with the Department of State and other interagency partners in assessing and responding to compliance concerns. While resolution of such issues with Russia is clearly important, I do not believe that discussions of possible further nuclear arms reductions need await resolution of all compliance issues. If confirmed, I would have the Department work with the interagency to address any compliance concerns through the existing arrangements established by the respective treaties for that purpose. If resolution in that manner is not possible, the administration should raise the issues with the Russian Federation government at higher levels, including up to the ministerial or presidential level if necessary.

347. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, how specifically would you address these issues?
Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #346.

348. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, should any new arms control agreements be negotiated, would it be your policy that they will occur through the treaty power and come to the Senate for ratification?
Mr. HAGEL. If confirmed, I will consult closely with Congress regarding any additional arms control agreements—and whether they should occur through the treaty power and come to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification.

ISRAEL

349. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, in a number of statements (for example your July 28, 2006, speech to the Brookings Institution), you have spoken highly of the 2002 Beirut Declaration by the Arab League as a "squandered" diplomatic opportunity for both the United States and Israel. Do you believe Israel should be prepared to accept the "achievement of a just solution to the Palestinian refugee problem to be agreed upon in accordance with U.N. General Assembly Resolution 194" as per the Declaration?
Mr. HAGEL. I continue to believe, as I did when I cosponsored and voted for the Palestinian Anti-Terrorism Act of 2006, that any partner for peace must renounce violence, abide by previous agreements, and recognize Israel's right to exist. Negotiations between the parties are the only viable path to peace and the two-state solution, with two states living side by side in peace and security: the Jewish State of Israel and an independent Palestinian State.
With those goals in mind, the Arab Peace Initiative is a step in the right direction toward a comprehensive peace in the Middle East. I do not believe that Israel or the Palestinians should have an agreement imposed on them. The details included in the Arab Peace Initiative, like all details of a peace agreement, will need to be negotiated by the parties. Other Arab states seeking normalization with Israel, as suggested in the Arab Peace Initiative, is an aspirational goal for a comprehensive peace in the Middle East.
All sides seek a just and lasting peace that will ensure Israel's security. If confirmed as Secretary of Defense, I look forward to working with Secretary Kerry to assist the administration's efforts toward peace.

350. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, your 2006 comment to Aaron David Miller about how "The Jewish lobby intimidates a lot of people up here" remains troubling. Do you think that people who advocate for a strong U.S.-Israel relationship—whether you call them part of the Jewish lobby or the Israel lobby—are advancing the interests of a foreign government, namely Israel, above those of the United States?
Mr. HAGEL. In conjunction with his interview with me in 2006, Aaron David-Miller also wrote that, "Hagel is a strong supporter of Israel and believer in shared values."
As I have stated many times, I regret my unfortunate choice of words regarding the Jewish lobby to describe the pro-Israel lobby. I believe one of the essential elements of our democracy is that every American has the right to express their views to their elected officials. In fact, in that same interview with Aaron Miller, I also said that "Everyone has a right to lobby; that's as it should be. Come see your Senator, your Congressman, and if you can get the guy to sign your letter: great, wonderful." I know that the pro-Israel lobby includes Jews and non-Jews whom are all Americans supporting Israel because it is in the interest of the United States. I consider myself to be a pro-Israel American and have supported Israel throughout my career because of our shared values and ideals of democracy.
On expanding U.S.-Israel cooperation, if confirmed, I intend to continue to strengthen our bilateral defense relationship in a number of ways. These include, but are not limited to, missile defense, intelligence sharing, counterterrorism, and maritime security. I know that over the past 4 years the administration has taken unprecedented steps to expand our cooperation with Israel. Today, with congressional support, the United States provides Israel over $3 billion annually in Foreign Military Financing (FMF), which is the backbone of our commitment to Israel's defense. In addition, President Obama, Secretaries Gates and Panetta have worked to provide extensive support of over $270 million to Israel for the Iron Dome counter rocket system. As Iron Dome has proven itself very well in the field and saved many Israeli lives, I intend to continue such support.

This financial support is complemented by extensive military-to-military cooperation, including joint exercises. If confirmed, I will seek to ensure that we build on this cooperation and expand it into new areas as the United States and Israel address emerging threats at this time of historic change in the Middle East. I believe we have a tremendous opportunity for further expansion of our missile defense efforts as well as cooperation in areas like space and cyberspace.

Finally, the foundation for successful cooperation is the close personal relationships U.S. military and defense civilian leaders have with Israeli military and defense leadership. Secretary Gates and Secretary Panetta, as well as the Chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have all developed very close relationships with their counterparts. Continuing with this tradition will be one of my highest priorities if I am confirmed. This will be vital to ensuring that we understand Israel's defense requirements, and to finding ways to address mutual threats that meet our common interests.

351. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, if not, why did you say that you would support the positions of what you called the "Jewish lobby" if you were an Israeli Senator, but that you couldn't since you were a United States Senator who had taken an oath to the United States?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #350.

352. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, how does that not imply that only people loyal to Israel could support the positions of the Jewish lobby?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #350.

353. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, given your disavowal of this remark in your testimony, can you specify how you intend to "expand the depth and breadth of U.S.-Israel cooperation" as you pledged in your January 14, 2013, letter to Senator Barbara Boxer?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #350.

354. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, you have been widely linked in the press with your Atlantic Council colleague Charles W. Freeman, who has been a vocal supporter of your nomination. Please review paragraph 5 from Mr. Freeman's May 4, 2011, speech to the Palestine Center in Washington, DC. (the transcript and video of the speech are available here, if you would like the full context http://www.thejerusalemfund.org/ht/display/ContentDetails/i/29130/pid/897):

"Similarly, the cruelties of Israelis to their Arab captives and neighbors, especially in the ongoing siege of Gaza and repeated attacks on the people of Lebanon, have cost the Jewish state much of the global sympathy that the Holocaust previously conferred on it. The racist tyranny of Jewish settlers over West Bank Arabs and the progressive emergence of a version of apartheid in Israel itself are deeply troubling to a growing number of people abroad who have traditionally identified with Israel. Many—perhaps most of the most disaffected—are Jews. They are in the process of dissociating themselves from Israel. They know that, to the extent that Judaism comes to be conflated with racist arrogance (as terrorism is now conflated with Islam), Israeli behavior threatens a rebirth of anti-Semitism in the West. Ironically, Israel—conceived as a refuge and guarantee against European anti-Semitism—has become the sole conceivable stimulus to its revival and globalization. Demonstrably, Israel has been bad for the Palestinians. It is turning out also to be bad for the Jews."

Do you consider Mr. Freeman's statement to be an expression of mainstream thinking on Israel?

Mr. HAGEL. As I told you at the hearing, I have not spoken with Mr. Freeman in several years and do not support his comments. The views expressed in the speech by Chas Freeman that you reference are his own, and, in my opinion, not accurate.

I am pleased that Israeli and U.S. leaders agree that the U.S.-Israel Defense relationship is stronger than ever. I intend to work to continue to strengthen the relationship and am looking forward, if confirmed, to working closely with my Israeli counterparts.

As I have said consistently throughout my career, Israel has a right to defend itself. Israeli efforts to protect its citizens against the actions of terrorist organizations, including Hamas and Hezbollah, are part of Israel's right to self-defense. Palestinians will not achieve peace or prosperity if Hamas insists on a path of terror and rejection, and Palestinians will never realize their independence through unilateral actions. I continue to believe, as I did when I cosponsored and voted for the Palestinian Anti-Terrorism Act of 2006, that any partner for peace must renounce violence, abide by previous agreements, and recognize Israel's right to exist. Negotiations between the parties are the only viable path to peace and the two-state solution, with two states living side by side in peace and security: the Jewish State of Israel and an independent Palestinian State.

355. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, would you affirm that if confirmed, you will not recommend the nomination or appointment of Mr. Freeman to a position in DOD?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #354.

U.S. TROOPS TO U.N. MISSION

356. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, in a 2009 report that you co-authored for the U.S./Middle East Project, you advocated for the deployment of U.S. grounds troops as U.N. peacekeepers in a "non-militarized Palestinian state." That same year, in a piece for the Atlantic Council, you wrote, "No country today has the power to impose its will and values on other nations." These statements seem to hearken back to 2003, when you stated that the United States "must be careful to avert the perception that we are charting a unilateralist course in our foreign policy." Do you believe the United States needs a "permission slip" from the U.N. or another international body before it can engage in military operations—how would you address this concern?

Mr. HAGEL. I do not believe we need a permission slip from the United Nations before we can engage in military operations. The United States will always remain committed to protecting its national security interests whenever necessary. I believe the United States is strongest when we act alongside our partners, with whom we share common interests. I also believe the United States should, and will, act unilaterally when we must, as we did with the Osama bin Laden raid. In every case, we will act in accordance with the standards that govern the use of force, which requires a basis in domestic law and compliance with international law.

PLOUGHSHARES FUND

357. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, you currently sit on the board of the Ploughshares Fund. Among the groups that Ploughshares has supported is the National Iranian American Council (NIAC), headed by Trita Parsi. Are you aware that the Ploughshares Fund has given more than $600,000 to NIAC?

Mr. HAGEL. I completely support one of the primary objectives of the Ploughshares Fund: preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon.

I was not aware that Ploughshares provided financial support to the NIAC. The Ploughshares Fund is committed to full transparency, publishes all of their funding decisions and complies with all applicable laws and best-practices for a 501(c)3 organization.

My understanding is that the case you referenced focused on a libel lawsuit brought by the NIAC and its president, Trita Parsi, against writer Seid Hassan Daioleslam. Records of the case do not include the phrase "deep and incontrovertible ties" to high-level agents of the Iranian regime. In fact, Judge John Bates did not analyze or provide judgment on any NIAC ties to the Iranian Government. In his judgment, Judge Bates explicitly wrote that, "Nothing in this opinion should be construed as a finding that defendant's articles [about NIAC ties to the Iranian Government] were true. Defendant did not move for summary judgment on that ground, and it has not been addressed here."

358. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, are you aware that NIAC has ties to the Iranian Government?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #357.

359. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, are you aware of the September 13, 2012, decision rendered by Judge John Bates in the U.S. District Court in Washington, which exposed NIAC's "deep and incontrovertible ties" to high-level agents of the Iranian regime?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #357.

CUBA

360. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, in 2002 you referred to Fidel Castro as a "toothless old dinosaur" and praised former President Jimmy Carter's recommended policy of relaxed sanctions and diplomatic engagement as "exactly right". In 2008, you were a signatory to a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging the U.S. relax sanctions and engage Cuba due to Castro's "imminent departure". As of February 1, 2013, the Castros have not departed Cuba or shown any indication that additional concessions from the United States would modify their repressive regime. An American contractor, Alan Gross, languishes in a Cuban prison. Do you still believe Mr. Carter's recommended policy towards Cuba is "exactly right"?

Mr. HAGEL. I support President Obama's Cuba policy which is focused on supporting the Cuban people's desire to freely determine their future, reducing their dependence on the Cuban state, and pursuing the widely shared goal of a Cuba that respects the universal human rights of all its citizens. The President's actions to facilitate family travel, people to people travel, the flow of remittances into private hands, and information to, from, and within Cuba have contributed to this objective. I share the President's view that the Cuban Government must change its outdated political model to reflect the commitments undertaken by other governments in the Hemisphere to promote and defend representative democracy. Policy matters and other diplomatic issues involving Cuba are led by the State Department.

361. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, would relaxing sanctions and engaging with the Castros be the hallmarks of your policy towards Cuba, should you be confirmed?

Mr. HAGEL. See answer to Question #360.

NORTH KOREA

362. Senator CRUZ. Mr. Hagel, in a 2003 interview with PBS, you declared that isolating North Korea was the last thing the United States should do. Despite a decade at attempted engagement and negotiations, North Korea remains overtly hostile to the United States and is actively pursuing weapons targeted at us and our allies. Given North Korea's dismal record on negotiating in good faith, how specifically would the additional outreach you advocated in 2003 have improved our position in relationship to North Korea today?

Mr. HAGEL. Since my interview with PBS in early 2003, diplomatic efforts through the Six-Party Talks led to the September 2005 Joint Statement, under which the Six Parties reaffirmed the goal of verifiable denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula, and North Korea committed to abandoning all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs. In February 2007, the Six-Party process resulted in North Korea's agreement to shut down its Yongbyon nuclear facility in exchange for heavy fuel oil and talks aimed at normalization of relations with the United States and Japan. President Obama extended his hand to North Korea at the start of his administration in 2009. Although these engagement efforts have not significantly diminished North Korea's belligerence or pursuit of nuclear weapons, they have united the international community, including China, against North Korea's irresponsible behavior.

If confirmed, I would continue to support diplomatic engagement and ensure that our military provides the deterrence and defense necessary to create a stable regional environment where diplomacy can succeed. If confirmed, I will also ensure that we have the capabilities necessary in the Asia-Pacific theater to deter and, if necessary, defeat, North Korean aggression.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. The committee meets today to consider the nomination of former Senator Chuck Hagel to serve as the next Secretary of Defense.

We received Senator Hagel's nomination 3 weeks ago. We held a hearing on the nomination 12 days ago. Senator Hagel has provided the personal and financial information required by the committee. He has received letters from the Director of the Office of Government Ethics and the Acting Department of Defense (DOD) General Counsel certifying that he meets our ethics and conflict of interest standards.

He has responded to our advance policy questions and our questions for the record, and for these reasons I believe the time has come for the committee to act on this nomination.

Senator Hagel has received broad support from a wide array of senior statesmen and defense and foreign policy organizations. At our January 31, 2013, nomination hearing, Senator Hagel was introduced and endorsed enthusiastically by two former chairmen of this committee, Senator Sam Nunn and Senator John Warner. Senator Hagel's nomination has been endorsed by five former Secretaries of Defense who served under both Democratic and Republican Presidents: Bob Gates, Bill Cohen, Bill Perry, Harold Brown, and Melvin Laird.

He has been endorsed by three former Secretaries of State and by six former National Security Advisors. He's received letters of endorsement from 9 former ambassadors who worked with him on Middle East issues, from 11 retired senior military officers, and from 50 retired ambassadors and national security officials.

He's been supported by the major groups of American veterans, including the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, AmVets, Vietnam Veterans of America, and the American Legion. He's received support from the Military Officers Association of America, the Foreign Area Officer Association, and the Non Commissioned Officers Association.

Senator Hagel's credentials are underscored by his service in war and in peace. As a young man, Senator Hagel enlisted in the Army and served in Vietnam where he received two Purple Hearts, the Army's Commendation Medal, and the Combat Infantryman Badge for his service. Senator Hagel served as Deputy Administrator of the Veterans Administration (VA) during the Reagan administration, and was twice elected to the U.S. Senate where he served on the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.

Since he left the Senate 4 years ago, Senator Hagel has served as chairman of the board of directors of the Atlantic Council. The Atlantic Council counts among its other directors and honorary directors, seven former Secretaries of State and four former Secretaries of Defense, along with numerous other senior officials from the administrations of both parties. The Atlantic Council is very much a part of the mainstream of American foreign policy establishment.

Much of the time and attention in our committee hearing was devoted to a handful of statements that Senator Hagel made over the course of his career that raised questions about his views on Iraq, Israel, and other issues. Senator Hagel explained or clarified these statements and placed them in context. He apologized for one remark and told the committee that he would say other things differently if he had the chance or were making them over.

Senator Hagel was clear and firm in the positions that he takes today and that he will, if confirmed, take as Secretary of Defense. In particular, Senator Hagel stated forcefully and unequivocally that, first, "Iran poses a significant threat to the United States, our allies, and partners, and our interests in the region and globally. Iran continues to pursue an illicit nuclear program that threatens to provoke a regional arms race and undermine the global nonproliferation regime. Iran is also one of the main state sponsors of terrorism and could spark conflict, including against United States personnel and interests."

Second, he is, "fully committed to the President's goal of preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon." All options "must be on the table to achieve that goal," and his policy, if confirmed, will be "one of prevention, not of containment."

Third, while he believes engagement is clearly in our interests, engagement is not negotiation. He stated, "I've never thought engagement as weakness. I never thought it was surrender. I never thought it was appeasement. I think it's clearly in our interest. Get the international sanctions behind you, keep military options on the table, and if the military option is the only option, it's the only option."

Finally, he is "a strong supporter of Israel," and believes that "we have a special relationship with Israel," and if confirmed, he "will ensure our friend and ally, Israel, maintains its qualitative military edge in the region, and will continue to support systems like Iron Dome, which is today saving Israeli lives from terrorist rocket attacks."

Senator Hagel has also recognized the very real risks posed to our national security as a result of the unique budgetary pressure arising out of cuts previously agreed upon by Congress, the budgeting by Continuing Resolution, and the impending threat of a sequester. This is what Senator Hagel told the committee: "Sequestration, if allowed to occur, would damage our readiness, our people, and our military families. It would result in the grounding of aircraft and returning ships to port, reducing the Department's global presence and ability to rapidly respond to contingencies. Vital training would be reduced by half our current plans, and the Department would be unable to reset equipment from Afghanistan in a timely manner."

He continued: "The Department would reduce training and maintenance for non-deploying units and would be forced to reduce procurement of vital weapons systems and suffer the subsequent schedule delays and price increases. Civilian employees would be furloughed for up to 22 days. All of these effects also negatively impact long-term readiness. It would send a terrible signal to our military and civilian workforce, to those we hope to recruit, and to both our allies and adversaries around the world."

Some members of this committee strongly oppose President Obama's foreign policy, but regardless of how we may feel about the President's policies, our vote on Senator Hagel's nomination will not change those policies. If there is a risk here, it is that the defeat of this nomination will leave the Department of Defense leaderless at a time when we face immense budgetary challenges and our military is engaged in combat operations overseas. Such an absence of senior leadership would be unlikely to benefit either our national defense or our men and women in uniform.

I would add, given the recent explosion of a nuclear device by North Korea, the delay in adopting this nomination and approving it, I think, will send the exact wrong message to North Korea.

The President needs to have a Secretary of Defense in whom he has trust, who will give him unvarnished advice, a person of integrity, and one who has a personal understanding of the consequences of decisions relative to the use of military force. Senator Hagel certainly has those critically important qualifications, and he is well-qualified to lead the Department of Defense.

Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me first of all say I have said many, many times, going back to my first meeting with Senator Hagel when he was first elected, how much I admire his service to his country, the job that he did, his Purple Hearts, and all of that. The question is, in my mind, is that and that alone, enough justification for confirming him to the nomination for the Secretary of Defense.

Now, I also listened, Mr. Chairman, and what you said was accurate in terms of what he said now during these hearings. My problem is that is not what he lived in the past.

I guess I was the first one who decided that I was going to oppose him, his nomination, and that was before we knew nearly as much as we know today. At that time, I was aware that he was one of two Senators who voted against sanctions against Iran. He was one of four Senators who voted against labeling or declaring the Iranian Revolutionary Guard (IRG) as terrorists. He was one of four who did not sign a letter, and I remember that because I helped take the letter of solidarity around to the various Senators. He was one of only four who did not sign that.

I was also concerned about the Global Zero Movement. It sounds real good. We want a nuclear-free world. The problem is, and I have heard all of his answers to this, but the group that he is a part of is for, if necessary, unilaterally doing away with our nuclear capability. I was concerned with the fact that arguably you could say that Iran could be one of the most severe of the terrorist type of states. They have said things like, "we want to wipe Israel off the map. Israel is a cancerous tumor in the heart," and "America is rotten from the bottom up," all these things. Yet they, that country, is endorsing his confirmation.

Lastly, I have mentioned this several times. It was Senator Cruz who showed us, Mr. Chairman, and I want to tell you how much I personally appreciate your bending the rules a little bit to allow him to put the Al Jazeera video up, where he agreed with Al

Jazeera's comments about Israel committed war crimes, Israel committed sickening slaughter, and America is the world's bully.

I just cannot for those reasons—and others have other reasons, but those are the reasons that I opposed him. I still oppose his confirmation. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe. Now, what we are going to do is give everybody an opportunity to make a statement. We will then vote. The time of the vote will be determined by how many of us want to make statements. I cannot set that time yet until we get a feel for how many members want to make statements. What I will do, and I have not had enough chance to chat with Senator Inhofe on this in terms of the specific time, but my inclination is to say that we should make statements within a time limit of 8 minutes. Would that sound fair?

Senator INHOFE. Very fair.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. I am not urging everybody to speak or to use their 8 minutes, by the way. That I hope was not implied by my decision. After we get a feel again for about how many want to speak, then we will try to set a fixed time later on this afternoon so that everybody will be given perhaps 20 minutes or so warning at least as to what that fixed time is.

We will do the best we can, and now call upon Senator Reed.

Senator REED. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will try to set the example by taking much less than 8 minutes.

As you pointed out, some of the most respected experts on foreign policy and national defense policy in the United States, who have served both Republican and Democratic presidents, are strongly and enthusiastically supportive of Senator Chuck Hagel's nomination to be Secretary of Defense: Bob Gates, Bill Cohen, Madeleine Albright, Bill Perry, Brent Scocroft, Ryan Crockett, and Thomas Pickering.

These ladies and gentlemen have represented the United States' interests through a lifetime of service. They are, I think, some of the strongest evidence of the support and the confidence that they have and we should have in Senator Hagel's nomination to be the Secretary of Defense.

There has been a lot of discussion particularly about his approach to our strong historic partnership with the state of Israel. I was particularly struck by the words of Deputy Israeli Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon. He is the former ambassador to the United States. He is now one of the senior members of the foreign ministry. He has said, "I have met him," Senator Hagel, "many times, and he certainly regards Israel as a true and natural U.S. ally." That is coming from someone who is a serving member of the Israeli Government. I think that is the case, and that is what his lifetime of effort as a Senator, as an individual, as a business leader points out.

I would just conclude by echoing the point that the chairman made. This is a very dangerous moment—I do not have to remind anyone in this room—for us. We are facing budget issues. We are facing national security issues. We are in the process of our retrograde operations in Afghanistan. Just within hours ago, the North Koreans detonated a nuclear device.

This is a time that the men and women of the Department of Defense need a Secretary of Defense. I would urge our strong support of Senator Chuck Hagel. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Reed.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I believe that Senator Hagel, as far as I can determine, has complied with the requirements or the parameters for the information that needs to be disclosed to this committee.

I am somewhat disturbed to hear that today there are two more speeches that he had not reported that maybe have just surfaced. Yet at the same time, I believe he has complied.

I do not believe that we should move forward with his nomination until questions are answered that Senator Graham, Senator Ayotte, and I have asked to be answered.

For the first time in my political career, I found myself in agreement with Mr. Robert Gibbs, who stated on a Sunday television show that Senator Hagel's performance before the Senate Armed Services Committee was the most unimpressive and unfocused that he had ever observed. I agreed with him. It was the most unimpressive performance that I have seen in watching many nominees who came before the committee for various positions. He did not even know that our policy toward Iran is not one of containment, had to be corrected by the chairman of the committee. Of course, his failure to answer specific questions that I asked is very disturbing.

Let me point out that the surge was an issue of the lives of thousands of American service men and women who are serving in Iraq. Senator Graham and I and others, not many, were harshly critical of the Bush administration, called for the resignation of Secretary Rumsfeld when he said that there was only a few dead-end kids left in Iraq, and took on our own administration, our own President, our own Secretary of Defense.

Then Senator Hagel also thought we were losing, and then when the surge was implemented, gave a statement that the surge was the worst blunder since Vietnam, and then went on with some nonsense about whether Lyndon Johnson was in Cambodia or not. He continued to oppose the surge and said that it would fail.

I think we are all responsible for our record. I will be glad and have quite often been pointed out where I have been wrong. But for him to fail to agree that what was clearly and obviously a success, to me indicates that he really did not want to be forthcoming to this committee. I do not think he complied with the requirements of answering the questions for members of this committee.

I am aware that some think that it became rather tense. We are talking about thousands of young Americans who had their lives on the line in Iraq, including some people that—well, Senator Hagel's judgment was wrong, continues to be wrong, and he refuses to admit that he was wrong on this issue and many other issues.

His gratuitous attacks, for example, saying that President Bush was the worst President since Herbert Hoover, of course, were just gratuitous attacks on the President of the United States.

But you can only judge somebody by their past performance in order to predict what their future performance will be. His performance before this committee was the worst that I have seen of any nominee for office. He refused to answer a simple, straightforward question as to whether the surge was a success or not, and whether he supported it or not. That was a key moment in the history of this country.

So, Mr. Chairman, I hope that we will get the answer that Senator Ayotte, Senator Graham, and I have asked to be answered. I hope that will happen. But I cannot vote to report out Senator Hagel's nomination favorably.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator McCain.

On this list now in order of appearance, Senator Hagan is not here. Senator Shaheen, do you wish to make a statement?

Senator SHAHEEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I think, while I appreciate the concerns that have been raised about Senator Hagel, and I certainly would like to have seen him be much feistier at his hearing, I do think for anybody to suggest that he is not qualified, they have not really looked at what his background has been.

He was the Deputy Administrator of the VA. He managed a quarter of a million employees during the Reagan years. He turned around the United Service Organization when it was in financial difficulty. We all know much about his record as Senator when he helped to shepherd the 9/11 GI Bill through the Senate. He has served on the Defense Policy Board at the Pentagon, as co-chairman of the President's Intelligence Advisory Board, not to mention all of the things that have been said about his service in Vietnam and his heroism as an enlisted man.

I understand that people disagree with his position on certain issues, and, therefore, everybody has the right to vote in the way that they say. But the concern that I have is the suggestion that this man who has served his country really since he was a young man and enlisted in Vietnam, is not qualified to be the Secretary of Defense, I think is just not accurate and reflects certainly a different understanding of his background and his experience than I have.

So I intend to vote for him. I think he will be an excellent Secretary of Defense. I hope that we will confirm him.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Shaheen.

Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank the members of the committee.

First, let me just say upfront that I think all of us deeply respect Senator Hagel's service to his country in Vietnam and his service in this body. We know that there are always difficult decisions that you have to make, and I certainly respect that service that he has given to our country.

In thinking about this nomination, I certainly come at it from a perspective which I understand that the President deserves a certain level of deference with respect to who serves on his Cabinet. In fact, that is why I voted, for example, for my colleague, Senator Kerry, who had an overwhelming vote in the Senate, even though he and I probably vote very differently on many issues. But certainly he was confirmed overwhelmingly in this body.

I find myself on this nomination in a very different place. I very much agree with my colleague, Senator Reed, who was here, as he described the state of our country, and the state of our national defense, and the challenges we face around the world right now. It is a very difficult time and a dangerous time around the world.

One of the first challenges that we face, and I think one of the greatest national security threats that we face, is the march of Iran toward obtaining a nuclear weapon. I find myself in reviewing Senator Hagel's record and also what he said when he appeared before us in a very lengthy hearing before the committee, to be very much at odds with him on this issue. I think also some of his prior positions are at odds with members of both sides of the aisle.

For example, as has been mentioned previously by Senator McCain, I was very troubled that he did not clearly know what our position was when it came to containment, particularly since I believe everyone in this room voted, except for the newer members. We recently voted in a vote of 90 to 1 in the U.S. Senate explicitly rejecting a policy of containment toward a nuclear-armed Iran. Yet, Senator Hagel seemed to believe in his first statement that the President had a strong position of containment toward Iran. Then he switched his position to say that we do not have a position on containment. Finally, of course, the chairman corrected him to let him know what our position was on containment.

This is one example, I think, of many within the hearing where there were some issues that I felt that he needed to give us answers on. This is one of the biggest threats facing the world right now. I was deeply troubled by his statements with regard to containment. Also, I think if you look at his prior history of when he served in this body where he has been on sanctions, as has already been described, I think all of us here hope that we can stop Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon short of military actions.

But if you are going to do that, the only way we can do that is through sanctions. Yet, when he was in this body, he was one of two Senators to oppose sanctions in 2001, again in 2008 in the Banking Committee. He was one of two Senators to oppose sanctions. Then when I asked him during the hearing, Senator Reid, the Majority Leader, came to the floor on October 2, 2008, and brought forward an Iran Sanctions Act that is very similar to the one that we have passed since I have been here, he blocked unanimous consent for consideration of that before this body.

I think it is important to note that a similar Iran Sanctions Act was co-sponsored by Secretary Kerry, Secretary Clinton, and then Senator, now President, Obama. This is an issue that we have been strongly on that he is really to the fringe, I think, of both parties of where we have been on sanctions. That troubles me given the threats we face around the world right now.

Of course, he also voted against the Sense of the Senate in designating the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps as a terrorist organization, and as he told us during the hearing, because it was part of an elected legitimate Iranian Government. I do not think that the people who rose up in 2009 in the Green Movement, who were persecuted and shot at by the Iranian Government, would call that government a legitimately-elected government, nor would, at the time that he voted against designating the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps a terrorist organization, at the time they were assisting those in Iraq that were murdering our troops. So that troubles me that he would not think of designating the Guard Corps at that time a terrorist organization.

Two other issues I would like to talk on, and that is we are facing grave budget challenges right now. I remember when Senator Blunt asked him about a prior statement that he made after the Budget Control Act was passed. He was asked about the across-the-board cuts made to our military, and he said, different than what our Secretary of Defense Panetta has said now, that he felt that the Pentagon was bloated and needed to be pared down. During our hearing, he said that those were statements he made prior to the Budget Control Act being passed, but that was not the case. That was later corrected.

In terms of shepherding the Pentagon, I certainly do not think that we want to be in a position of thinking, especially in light of the testimony we heard this morning, that the Pentagon is bloated or needs to be pared down. I think all of us agree here that there are things that we could do better in the Pentagon. I know that many of us have worked on things that we could do better and more efficient in the Pentagon. But sequestration is not the answer to that.

Finally, hours ago, as Senator Reed mentioned, the North Koreans have detonated a nuclear device. Yet a year ago, Senator Hagel was a signatory to a report that essentially would eliminate a portion of our nuclear triad. We have three legs to our nuclear triad, and he was a signator on a report that recommended that that would be a manner in which we could eliminate a leg of our nuclear triad.

It seems to me with the North Koreans testing, with Iran marching toward a nuclear weapon, that is a deep concern that our Secretary of Defense less than a year ago would sign on to a report that would state that position.

Now, during his hearing, he tried to claim that this was just an illustration, but that is actually different than what the report itself says. The report itself says on the first page that these are next steps, are possible and desirable. So I was not satisfied with his explanation of this being an illustration during the hearing, and I am concerned that is really where his viewpoints are. I am concerned that those viewpoints will drive the recommendations that he makes to the President as the Secretary of Defense.

So for all those reasons, respectful of his service to our country, I just think that with the challenges we face around the world right now, I judge him based on his record. I respect his service. But also I have to judge him based on his performance before us in the Senate Armed Services Committee, and I cannot support his nomination.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Hagan.

Senator HAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you for the fair, open, transparent process that this committee has followed as we have considered this important nomination. After spending several weeks of closely reviewing his qualifications, meeting with him personally, participating in the nomination hearing, I will vote for his nomination to become our country's next Secretary of Defense.

Senator Hagel certainly has shared my concerns about the serious negative consequences that sequestration would have on North Carolina. As we heard at the hearing this morning, it is important that our next Secretary of Defense be strong, be an advocate for stopping these cuts that would be devastating to our military strength.

I also believe that Senator Hagel will continue to look for ways to enhance our military and our intelligence collaboration with Israel, one of our most important allies. I appreciate and respect Senator Hagel's service to our country as an enlisted soldier in Vietnam. It is my hope and expectation that this perspective that he has will aid in the support of the many servicemembers and their families who call North Carolina home, and certainly all of our other States.

I was pleased to hear his assurances that he will monitor and be a helpful partner in getting the answers about the water contamination at Camp LaJeuene. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Hagan.

Senator Fischer.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, Ranking Member Inhofe.

For the past several weeks, I have carefully reviewed Senator Hagel's record. I know Senator Hagel. I met with him privately and participated in the committee's hearing, questioning in both rounds. Ultimately, while I respect his military service, I do not believe he is the right choice for this job.

I am concerned by Senator Hagel's record on important topics, and his testimony before this committee did nothing to clarify those questions. As many of you have said, this is a very dangerous moment for our country. The next Secretary of Defense will likely make critical decisions with respect to budgeting for national defense that will define its future for decades to come: confronting a pre-nuclear Iran, dealing with an increasingly belligerent nuclear armed North Korea, and a bellicose China. I do not believe he will chart the right course for our country, and the effect of his decisions on these topics will last for decades.

I do appreciate the President will nominate candidates that hold very different views than I do. My support for Senator Kerry's nomination indicates this. But I cannot support a candidate whose views are so far afield. As the Washington Post editorial board indicated, these positions are far to the left of those held by President Obama.

For those reasons, I cannot support his nomination. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Fischer.

Senator Donnelly is not here at the moment.

Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member, and colleagues. I am honored to serve with you on this committee. One of my personal and political heroes, former Senator John Warner, appeared and talked about his committee service in a most glowing way. He was a decorated war veteran of two Service branches, the Navy and the Marine Corps, and he was a Secretary of the Navy. But he said his proudest public service was his service as a committee member, both as chair of this committee and ranking member. I have tried to approach this question thinking about Senator Warner and the way he approached his job.

I am going to vote for Senator Hagel's nomination to be Secretary of Defense for three reasons. First, the standard I think we should apply; second, aspects of Senator Hagel's experience and character; and finally, some thoughts about the inquiries and objections that others have raised that I have taken seriously.

With respect to standard, I echo the point that Senator Ayotte made earlier. I think we owe deference to a President for choices to executive positions, and I think that is a very important thing to grapple with. When the American public chooses someone to be President, they are giving that individual a mandate to govern, and that mandate includes the assembly of a team that the President feels is the appropriate team. Deference is not a rubber stamp. Deference does not mean that you cannot vote no. But I think that deference is an important thing, and I approach any executive nomination with that in mind.

Moving particularly to Senator Hagel from his experience, I view his enlisted service and the fact that he would be the first former enlisted man to be Secretary of Defense is an incredibly important thing. I want our Secretary of Defense to go to sleep every night and wake up every day worrying about our men and women, and especially those who enlist. I have no doubt, and I do not think that anyone on this committee would have any doubt, that that would be his overriding concern. I want that to be an overriding concern. He has been a powerful veterans advocate in his position with the VA and in his service to help revive the United Service Organizations.

His role in the Senate is very important. This is a job that is not an internal management job, but it helps someone to have that understanding of the different branches of government and the relationship that is the appropriate one between the executive and the legislature. I think Senator Hagel will bring that to the table.

Finally, he has private sector leadership, experience in a variety of ways, both in a for-profit and the nongovernmental organization world. He truly has a well-rounded base of experience to bring to the job.

On the character side, Senator Hagel has shown it again and again that he is willing to sacrifice and that he has courage. Sacrificing in service, sacrificing for his country again and again. He is willing to step up and do it again, and I give him credit for that. I think he has shown courage, including the courage to say "I was wrong." That is something that is hard for me to do in public life. I think it is hard for a lot of us to do public or private. But Senator Hagel has had the courage and the independence to acknowledge that he was wrong when he felt that he was.

I think what he owes to the President, what any Cabinet Secretary owes to the President, is the best advice they can give at the time. The President will make the call, but I do not want Cabinet Secretaries who are going to be hedging their advice based on what they think will be popular or what the President will like. I do not have any doubt that Senator Hagel will be giving the advice as Secretary that he thinks is the right thing, and then trusting the chain of command and our Commander in Chief to make the call.

Finally, on a matter of character, I think that Senator Hagel's philosophy is one that understands America's role in the world. Our strength is not just military strength. Ever since Teddy Roosevelt won the Nobel Prize for brokering the end of the Russo-Japanese War, America has played a big role on the stage of the globe and an important one. We are exceptional, and we are exceptional in the role we play in the world. But we get it right when we appropriately balance military strength, diplomatic strength, economic strength, and strength of the moral example. I think Senator Hagel understands that those all have to be in balance, and I appreciate it.

Finally, a number of tough questions and objections were raised, and they were all fair. Senator Hagel said the same thing at the hearing, that he did not mind answering for anything he had said. Much as I would say he could see some things that he might have said better, I feel that pretty much every day in public life I can see things that I might have said better.

But while the questions were fair, I think the fair answer to them is review the entire record.

When you first hear that the Senator voted in the Senate against the designation of the IRG as a terrorist organization, it does make you sit back and wonder why. The day we were together, he explained why. Many Senators voted against that designation because they believed that there was a potentially perilous consequence to designating a department of a government as a terrorist organization, that that could, in fact, lead to an executive overreach, and potentially be a preliminary step toward hostilities or even warlike activity without appropriate consultation with Congress.

I am going to be an incredible stickler on the need for an executive to consult with Congress. Things that might serve as pretext for executive action need to be avoided. That is why a number of other Senators, including Senator Webb, my predecessor in this seat, voted against the same IRG designation. When that was explained in the context of the committee hearing, it made a lot of sense. We might have voted differently on it, but he had a credible rationale.

Finally, I did not view the back and forth over containment as Senator Hagel saying that he wants to have a containment policy vis-a-vis Iran. We were talking containment and prevention shorthand on the floor, and he said he supported the President's ideas, policy views about containment. We all know the President's policy about containment is we are not about to contain a nuclear Iran because a nuclear Iran would jeopardize Israel, and would also inspire the very kind of arms race in the Middle East that the President and Senator Hagel have always been against.

I think a fair read of that discussion was that he understood what the President's policy was. If you read Senator Hagel's writings, I think he has been very clear about that, that we have no containment policy, that the answer we have to containment is we are going to prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon, and I believe he will do it.

The questions and objections I think are fair. I think they were answered. I am going to support his nomination.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Kaine.

Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am often asked what has happened to the committee. Nothing. We just disagree on occasion. [Laughter.]

This is a good committee, and we have a good chairman. We have a good ranking member. I like my colleagues.

It is the times in which we live. The Democrats are going to get almost universal support by Republicans, and the Republicans are going to get almost no Republican support. [Laughter.]

How is that? John Kerry is a good friend, so is Chuck Hagel. I find myself disagreeing with Senator Kerry on occasion, but I think he is in the mainstream of thinking. I think he will do a good job for the country.

I do not vote against nominees very often. Senator Obama, if we use his standard, I think we would all be in pretty good shape over here to vote just the lot. No, but we are not.

At the end of the day, it is just not the one vote about the IRG. It is a series of votes and statements that paint an unusually disturbing picture. There is the left lane in politics, the right line, and the middle lane, and when it comes to some of the Iranian-Israeli issues, there is the Chuck Hagel lane. He is in a league of his own. There is nobody with this kind of series of votes and these series of statements. It is just not one thing. I say dumb things every day, but it is a series of things, a series of votes, and an edge about him that makes many of us very unnerved about his selection at a time when the world is on fire.

Syria is a contagion that is going to take the King of Jordan down, and if these press reports are true about our policy in Afghanistan, we are going to have 8,000 troops left behind, 41 percent below the commander's recommendation. We are telling the enemy we will be down to 1,000 by 2017. Afghanistan will fall apart in 18 months.

The next Secretary of Defense is going to have to deal with a world on fire, and I just believe that the testimony of Senator Hagel was not reassuring. I do not think he came across clear and convincing, that he understood our policies toward Iran. The fact that you do not understand why and you cannot clearly articulate the bad news for America if the Iranians get a nuclear capability, sharply and to the point, is unnerving for the times in which we live in.

This committee has a bipartisan reputation of holding Presidents accountable. I joined with the chairman and Senator McCain and many others to look into the abuses of the Bush administration when it came to interrogation techniques. I hope my colleagues on the other side will hold the Obama administration accountable for what I think was a complete breakdown of leadership when it comes to Benghazi. We just cannot investigate Republicans. We are going to have to hold both parties accountable and both Presidents accountable, regardless of party.

Mr. Chairman, you are a good chairman. This committee will get over this aberration and we will get back to doing business. We will find common ground regarding sequestration, I hope. But the reason I am voting against Senator Hagel's nomination is that there are very few people with his voting record when it comes to Iran and Israel. There are very few people who have been this wrong about so many different things.

I cannot in good conscience support this nomination because I think it is sending the worst possible signal to our friends and our enemies alike. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Graham.

Senator King.

Senator KING. Thank you, Senator. As I think about this, I approach it as if we are doing a hiring exercise. The President, of course, makes the nomination, but we are acting in an impartial capacity.

When I hire somebody, the first thing I look at is experience, and as I mentioned at the hearing, I think Senator Hagel's experience as an enlisted man is important, particularly when we are going into an era where a lot of the responsibility of the Defense Department is going to be dealing with people returning from combat, dealing with soldiers—men and women—who have been in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan. I think having somebody in the position that he has been nominated for, who has been there, who has been on the front lines and understands the stresses and the pressures, I think it is important. I think it is important for the morale of the entire enterprise.

In addition, he has experience here in the Senate. He has experience in managing large organizations. He has experience in ongoing questions of public policy. So that is where I start, is his experience, look at the resume.

Second, the next thing I do when I hire somebody is check references. The references that you, Mr. Chairman, read at the beginning of the meeting, the list of people that are supporting him from both sides of the aisle, former Secretaries of Defense, people that are a who's who of national security policy in the United States, have supported him. These are people that know him better than I do, and I put a lot of weight on that. When I see people like Bill Cohen, Secretary Gates, and Secretary Perry, that carries a lot of weight with me. Those are serious people who we know put the interests of the United States at a very high level, and they would not be recommending someone that they did not feel confident in.

The third thing, of course, in a process is the interview. I think the interview was the confirmation hearing. We had an opportunity to question him, and I think Senator Shaheen used the word "feisty". I think he was not as forceful as he might have been. I am not sure how all of us would have done in a 9-hour hearing or whatever it was. It was a pretty long day that day.

I would say, parenthetically, I remember the containment mistake. I remember the moment he made it, and it was a mistake. He knew the policy is prevention, not containment. The word popped out. He used the wrong word. It was not a deliberate statement of a policy difference with the President. I would characterize it as a slip of the tongue. The same thing on the legitimacy of the Iran Government.

The point he was making was it is an established government. He used the word "legitimate", not in the sense that it was duley elected and met our standards, but it was an established government. As Senator Kaine indicated, I think he had a rationale/reason for taking that position because he was afraid if he took that vote, as Senator Webb said, it would have been used as a license by the administration to take aggressive action toward the nation of Iran. I think that was a rational policy.

Another thing I always look for when I am looking to hire somebody is character, and this man has character. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the hearing, you used the phrase, "He would give the President unvarnished advice with integrity." That is a very high quality, very high on my list. That is what the President needs is unvarnished advice, not somebody who is always going to agree with him, but somebody who is going to give him his best judgment and has absolute integrity.

I think it would have been very easy for him to agree with Senator McCain in the hearing and avoid that contretemps, but was not there, and he did not do it. That shows me some integrity.

Finally, I agree with what other people that have already stated. I think our role is not to substitute our judgment for the President, not to say this is who we would have necessarily hired, but the deference goes to the President to build his team. I happen to think Chuck Hagel is a man of great integrity, great intelligence, and is the kind of person that, I think, will be a strong leader for the Department of Defense, and particularly for the men and women who are actually the warfighters.

So I intend to vote for his nomination with confidence and enthusiasm.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator King.

Senator Vitter.

Senator VITTER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I am really concerned about process. I am really concerned that this committee vote and this entire nomination is being rushed, and that we are being asked to vote, maybe forced to vote, before all reasonable requests for information have been received.

I am concerned about two categories, in particular. One is financial disclosure and information. I will leave the details of that to Senator Cruz because he has been very focused on that, but I certainly echo his concerns.

I want to focus on speeches. One clear category of the normal precedent of what the committee asked is speeches the nominee has made in the last 5 years. That is standard. That is not anything outside the norm. Senator Hagel in response to that said he "conducted an exhaustive search for all of my speaking engagements over the past 5 years".

After that so-called exhaustive search, he identified 80 speeches, 29 we have texts for, 51 we do not. So one flag is 51 speeches he has identified we do not yet have the substance. But that is not the biggest flag for me.

The biggest flag is that we have found six outside speeches that he never identified. Our staff has found them. We have a lot less information to go on than he did, and we have found six additional speeches. Five of those we have just recently gotten text or video, and have not been able to review them. We have literally gotten those in the last 24 hours. For one of those we know video exists. It is the June 13, 2008, keynote speech to the Arab-American Anti-Discrimination Committee. We know the video exists, but we do not have it yet.

So my request is pretty simple, that we get that video and that we have some reasonable amount of time to review text or video of these six speeches and any others that surface. That is squarely—squarely—within the information the committee always requires. We are just delayed because Senator Hagel did not disclose it. We had to find it. So that should not penalize us, and we should not reward him.

Again, my request is simple. We have five speeches, have them, but have not reviewed them yet. Gotten them in the last 24 hours. One we know a video exists. We do not have it yet. So I would like to be able to review that with others before this committee vote, and I think that is a pretty darn reasonable request. I would ask for unanimous consent to submit for the record the information regarding these speeches.

Chairman LEVIN. It will be accepted.

Senator VITTER. Mr. Chairman, could I just ask for your response to that request?

Chairman LEVIN. The question is that we ask of all nominees, "provide the committee with two copies of any formal speeches that you delivered during the last 5 years of which you have copies," and he answered that question.

Senator VITTER. Mr. Chairman, my point is pretty obvious. He answered it.

Chairman LEVIN. He did not have copies. He gave us copies of everything that he had. You have apparently been able to find transcripts of speeches from the organizations to which he spoke informally, and that is fine. But he answered the question, and there is no reason to believe he did not answer it accurately.

Formal speeches, two copies, last 5 years of which he had copies. Unless you believe he had copies and did not provide them, then your document will be accepted for the record. But that is it.

Senator VITTER. Mr. Chairman, he also identified a total of 80 speeches, including speeches which he did not have copies of.

Chairman LEVIN. That is correct.

Senator VITTER. My point is these 6 speeches were not on the list of 80.

Chairman LEVIN. Then he did not remember those speeches. He is not trying to hide speeches if he gave us 80 speeches. I could not give you a list of every speech I have made in the last 5 years, particularly informal speeches. There is no way. If I gave you a list which had 90 percent of the speeches that I had, I would be doing pretty well. So unless you think that he intentionally misled this committee and have any evidence of that, we will accept your list for the record.

Senator VITTER. Putting aside whose fault it was or what his intent was—I cannot tell you what his intent was. I can just tell you the facts.

Putting that to the side, is it not reasonable for us to review these six speeches we now know about before we vote?

Chairman LEVIN. You will have time in the next 24 hours. I do not know when the Leader is going to bring this to the floor, but you will have time to review any speeches that you have access to. But those speeches—you can continue—if there is 80 out there that he has spoken to—80 organizations, after these 6 come in, then you may discover, hey, there are 2 other organizations on that 80 that have found transcripts. This could go on forever.

We need a Secretary of Defense. We have had the use of a nuclear weapon in North Korea. We have made every single effort to provide all the information which this committee ever requires. He has answered this question. Unless you have evidence that he has not answered it honestly, we are going to proceed.

Senator VITTER. Just in closing, I think that request is very reasonable. I am sorry it is being denied.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Manchin.

Senator MANCHIN. I want to thank the chairman and thank the ranking member for having this, and I want to confirm everything that has been said here. I think that it has been a thoughtful process, even though we might disagree. It is amazing this process that we are going through right now.

I had some concerns because I had not known or had met Senator Hagel before he was presented. So I heard all the different rhetoric that was going on, and I wanted to find out for myself. I asked the same question as I am sure most of my colleagues had. I wanted to make sure this was a person that would not hesitate to defend our country under any circumstances.

I then looked at his character, too, and I remember he and I are from the same era. I remember the Vietnam War very well at that time and the fear in young people in college about getting drafted by the hundreds every day. I remember losing some of my classmates. They would go out one time and 6 months later be coming back in a box. I remember all that.

Here is not only a person that didn't wait to get drafted, he enlisted. Not only did he enlist, he asked to go to the fight. I think that told me right there everything I needed to know, that he would not hesitate to defend this country.

Also, it was said that his testimony, and I was there, and I started thinking about the things that we have talked about here, it was less than a stellar performance. I am thinking if we were all judged on our less than stellar performances as a Senator, would we be a Senator today? If it has been a bad day, we have all had maybe a less than a stellar performance if that is what we are looking at.

The other thing is, in an executive I know as governor and I know most of you all putting your offices together, you are going to choose a person that you know that you have confidence in, that you believe in, that would follow the orders that you are giving. There is nothing that leads me to believe that he would have been nominated by the President if the President did not have complete trust that he would do that.

With all of that in mind, and also I asked the question directly about Israel because I believe very strongly they are truly the greatest ally and the only ally we have in that part of the world. I wanted to make sure that his commitment to Israel, and I felt very comfortable with his answer, and standing by Israel. Also, his commitment that we would do whatever we could to prevent Iran from having a nuclear weapon. I have no doubt to believe.

I would say to all of us on this committee, we would have to think that either the President or the commitment we have made to this date would not be followed through, the thinking that he would not follow through on his orders that would be given to him. I have not found any reason why I would not support Senator Hagel.

Also, the endorsements that were mentioned. So many people from both sides of the aisle came up. If it was going to be a political difference that we had on party lines, you would have thought that he would have only had maybe Democrats, or if it was on the other side, only Republicans, that would have been speaking for him. But when I saw Senator Warner come into that hearing, and the respect I have for Senator John Warner, a Republican from Virginia, I think one of the great Senators, that gave me a little bit more confidence, let's put it that way.

I have watched that, the eloquent speeches that have been given here. He is an independent thinking Senator, and a lot of the things he said, as things that we say, as Senators that are elected and represent our States, but to speak our mind. He did that, and it seems like now that is being held against him. I felt that was unfair.

So for this commitment, his enlistment, his bravery, his willingness to not only fight, but willing to put his life on the line. When I look around, how many of us have really had that opportunity or privilege of serving in the military, let alone being at war and putting ourselves, making the supreme sacrifice if called upon.

Senator McCain, I have the greatest respect, and you know that, for you and the service you have given to this country, and any of the other members of this. But I would say the minority of us have had that opportunity that you had in the service and that you have given to this country. That weighs heavily on me, too, making that commitment to vote for Senator Hagel who has done that.

So I would hope it does not become a political vote, if you will. I would like to see a bipartisan vote, and I intend to support him. I appreciate the opportunity to be able to speak upon that.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Manchin.

Senator Cruz is next. I do not know—Senator Wicker, I am sorry. Did you—were you here after Senator Cruz?

Senator WICKER. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. Senator Sessions, were you—did I——

Senator SESSIONS. I am not sure about that.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. Senator Sessions——

Senator SESSIONS. I am happy to defer to the senior Senators. [Laughter.]

Chairman LEVIN. You are ahead of Senator Wicker, but not ahead of Senator Cruz. Okay. We are going to call on your side. It is going to be Senators Cruz, Wicker, and Sessions.

Senator Cruz.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and you are going to get me in trouble cutting in line in front of——

Chairman LEVIN. Better you than me. [Laughter.]

Senator CRUZ. Let me say it is a true honor to have the opportunity to serve on this committee which has a long tradition of bipartisan cooperation, working in the interest of this Nation's national security. I think there are few, if any, decisions that will have a greater import than this committee's decision confirming or not confirming the Secretary of Defense and the potential impact on the national security of the United States.

What I would like to address is my views on the merits of Chuck Hagel's nomination, and then also my views on his failure to disclose what I think are very relevant financial disclosures.

On the merits, I would like to say at the outset that my foreign-policy views are considerably less hawkish than some members of this committee. I have real concerns about the United States acting as the world's policeman, and I take seriously George Washington's admonition that we beware foreign entanglements.

That being said, I also agree strongly with the doctrine of peace through strength. I think the surest way to avoid military conflict is for the United States to stand strong against those who would initiate hostilities, potentially, against us.

Senator Hagel, although I very much respect his personal heroism and character and service, putting his life on the line defending this Nation, his foreign-policy views laid out over 2 decades put him, in the words of the Washington Post, no conservative publication, near the "fringe of the Senate".

In fact, his long articulated views in the Senate have consistently made him the Senator who has expressed the greatest degree of antagonism to the Nation of Israel of any member of this body and the greatest degree of skepticism toward sanctions, toward any firm response to Iran, to Hamas, to Hezbollah, to those terrorist organizations that would seek to harm or to murder innocent Americans.

Indeed, we saw with his nomination something truly extraordinary, which is the Government of Iran formally and publicly praising the nomination of a Defense Secretary. I would suggest to you that, to my knowledge, that is unprecedented to see a foreign nation like Iran publicly celebrating a nomination.

On the merits, in my view, if Chuck Hagel is confirmed, it will make military conflict in the next 4 years substantially more likely, because, in my view, Chuck Hagel's being confirmed will only encourage the nation of Iran to continue and accelerate its program to develop nuclear weapons capacity. If that occurs, the chances are far greater that our young men and women will be sent into harm's way.

I don't want to see that happen. I think encouraging those who would do harm to this country is not, ultimately, in the interest of this Nation.

That is on the merits. I would also like to address the procedural issues.

Twice, Senator Hagel has been asked to provide additional financial disclosures. I would like to focus in particular on one request. Senator Hagel was asked to disclose all compensation that he has received in excess of $5,000 over the past 5 years. That was a request that initially came from six Senators. In response to that request, he flatly refused.

Now, I would like to point out that information is entirely within his control. There are no legal impediments to his disclosing the compensation he personally has received. Yet, he flat-out refused.

The next iteration, he received a letter from 25 Senators. It included every Republican member of this Armed Services Committee. It also included the minority leader and the minority whip.

That letter stated that, in our collective judgment, this committee should not vote and the full Senate should not vote on his confirmation, unless and until he discloses his personal financial compensation over the last 5 years.

I will confess, Mr. Chairman, I was surprised by his response. I fully expected him to provide some attempt at adequate disclosure in response to that request, and that very clear statement that, in the absence of that disclosure, it was the judgment of a large number of Senators in this body that his confirmation should not come to a vote.

His letter came back, and it again flatly refused to comply. It gave no reason other than that he is not legally obligated to turn it over, and, therefore, he will not.

I will point out that, right now, this committee knows absolutely nothing about the personal compensation Chuck Hagel received in 2008, 2009, or 2010. We do not know, for example, if he received compensation for giving paid speeches at extreme or radical groups.

Now, in my view, given the two letters he received, it is a fair inference to assume that he and those handling his nomination assembled that information, assembled his compensation. The only reasonable inference, I think, is when they assembled it, there was something in there that they did not want to make public.

It may be that he spoke at radical or extreme groups or anti-Israel groups and accepted financial compensation; we don't know. It may be that he received extraordinary payments from defense contractors, which I would suggest is a matter of conflict of interest this committee and this Senate would be interested in.

We don't know what it was, because he simply said: No, I will not tell you the compensation I personally received.

I will point out, on this question, I agree with Senator Harry Reid. When it came to the nomination of John Bolton, and a number of members of this body asked for additional disclosures from John Bolton, and those disclosures were not forthcoming, Harry Reid said the following, "The administration's stonewalling has not only had the effect of slowing down the confirmation process, it has also put a further cloud over this individual and has—perhaps unnecessarily—raised the impression that the nominee and the White House have something to hide."

I don't know if Mr. Hagel has received funds directly or indirectly from foreign sources, from extreme sources, but his refusal to provide disclosure, I think, is highly troubling. I would suggest every member of this committee and every member of this body should stand together in at least insisting on adequate disclosure.

I will make one final point: Some have asked, would you make this same request of a Republican nominee? I will point out to you, Chuck Hagel is a Republican. I don't know him personally, unlike many members of this committee. I simply know his record. I can tell you this, whether this nominee were nominated by a Democrat or a Republican President, I would be very interested to know, and I think the American people would be very interested to know, whether a nominee for Secretary of Defense has received substantial funds directly or indirectly from foreign nations, foreign lobbyists, foreign corporations, or foreign individuals. I would certainly ask that of either party.

In fact, I suspect, had Mr. Hagel been nominated by a Republican President, there might be considerably more agreement on that point.

So I would ask each of us just to give serious thought to our constitutional responsibility to advise and consent. I would urge this committee, and the Senate as a whole, not to march ahead with such speed that there is not sufficient time to assess this nominee.

Just today, we discovered speeches that he had given that he had not disclosed.

It is a quite mild threshold to ask what compensation has he personally received and deposited in his personal bank account in the last 5 years. I would suggest that should be a relevant concern for every one of us.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Cruz.

As I mentioned before, my answer to the letter on this subject is now part of the record.

The first point that you raise, I said the following, that with regard to the demand that Senator Hagel disclose all compensation over $5,000 that he has received over the past 5 years, the standard financial disclosure form, which the committee requires all nominees to provide, calls for the disclosure of all entities from which the nominee has received compensation in excess of $5,000 during the previous 2 years.

Now, you may want to change the committee's questions. They are standard questions. You can take that up at any appropriate time with the committee if you want, but it is not going to be a separate rule for Senator Hagel than it is for all the other nominees. The 2-year disclosure requirement that has been consistently applied by the committee is established in section 102(b)(1)(A) of the Ethics in Government Act. It applies not only to all nominees for Senate-confirmed positions, but also to all candidates for Federal-elected office.

My comments about your request for foreign funding are also part of the record. They go way beyond what anybody has ever requested. I think it is not even feasible, in many of the requests that you have made, to answer them.

But the question that we do ask in part E of the form that we ask all nominees to fill out is the following: During the past 10 years, have you or your spouse received any compensation from or been involved in any financial or business transactions with a foreign government or an entity controlled by a foreign government? The answer is no.

Now, you have every right to make a request beyond these requests that are required by our rules, but I don't think that we ought to deny a vote to a nominee because he has decided not to respond to a request that not only goes beyond our rules, but, in some cases, goes way beyond our rules.

Finally, if you wish to modify the form that we ask nominees to fill out, that is well and good. But we are not going to do that retroactively. We are not going to single out one nominee for that. We will either do it for all nominees, in which case you can raise this at a committee meeting on process. You will be more than welcome to do that. But we are not going to single out one nominee for this kind of disparate treatment.

Senator CRUZ. Mr. Chairman, may I give a brief response?

Chairman LEVIN. You may.

Senator CRUZ. I would point out that these requests are not out of the ordinary. In fact, two prior nominees have been asked very similar questions.

When George W. Bush nominated Henry Kissinger to the 9/11 Commission, this body asked what foreign compensation had his firm received. Indeed, a number of prominent members of this body, including the majority leader, said they would oppose his confirmation unless and until he disclosed any foreign conflicts of interest.

Now, Mr. Kissinger made the decision, rather than disclose them, to withdraw, which was a reasonable decision for him to make. That is one precedent.

A second precedent was the nomination of Hillary Clinton for Secretary of State. In that instance, questions were likewise raised about potential foreign funds, and Secretary Clinton did something quite admirable. She voluntarily disclosed every foreign donation to the Clinton Foundation, even though the committee rules didn't require it, because there was a reasonable question that could be raised if foreign funds had gone to that foundation.

I would suggest those two paths are both reasonable paths to take. Number one, if reasonable questions are raised about financial conflicts of interest in a sensitive national security position of the receipt of foreign funds, one position is to say, "I won't make that disclosure, and I will withdraw from my nomination." I will point out that Henry Kissinger's was for an advisory board, not to be the chief civilian officer of the U.S. military, a far more important position. Or the second route is to provide disclosure enough to make clear there is not a foreign conflict of interest.

Senator Hagel's response is truly unprecedented. I am not aware of any precedent where questions have been asked—"Is there a foreign conflict of interest?"—where the nominee has said, "I refuse to answer your questions, and, nonetheless, I will not withdraw. I expect to be confirmed anyway."

I would suggest that sets a dangerous precedent. Indeed, if subsequent investigations reveal substantial financial conflicts of interest, and this Senate has proceeded with unnecessary haste and without giving due time to advise and consent on that nomination, I would suggest that each of us who did so would bear some significant part of the responsibility for that decision.

Chairman LEVIN. The precedent, which would be set here, would be by your unilaterally changing these rules that we have followed. If this nominee, or any other nominee, wishes to respond to your request, which goes beyond the rules, they are free to do so.

But we are not going to accept a change in the rules that applies to one nominee. If you wish to change these rules, you may do so at a procedural meeting of this committee. But we are not going to accept your suggestion and innuendo that there is some kind of conflict of interest here, because there is no evidence of a conflict of interest.

He has been asked this flat-out question by our committee: Have you or your spouse ever represented in any capacity—e.g., that is, employee, attorney, business, or political advisor or consultant—with or without compensation, a foreign government or an entity controlled by a foreign government? His answer is no.

Now, if you have any evidence to the contrary, that is one thing. But without any evidence to the contrary, to say that you haven't gotten answers to questions which go beyond the questions that we ask every other nominee is not going to be accepted by this chairman.

Senator CRUZ. Mr. Chairman, you asked for evidence to the contrary. I would point to the letter that Mr. Hagel submitted. There were 7 private funds that had paid him substantial sums of money that 25 Senators asked him about, and he responded. The question was, of those private funds that have paid you hundreds of thousands of dollars, did they receive foreign funds? He responded that for six of those funds, he could make the representation that the substantial fees he was paid did not directly derive from foreign sources. But for the seventh of those funds, a fund called Corsair Capital, which paid him $200,000 in the 2 years we know about and, for all we know, substantially more in the years in which he has not responded to the question, he said he could not even make that representation. He could not even say that the $200,000 he received did not come directly from a foreign government.

The question this committee asked—"Have you been paid directly by a foreign government?"—I would suggest it is every bit as relevant to know if that $200,000 that he has disclosed came from a foreign government.

Now, it may be perfectly appropriate. We might conclude that it was benign; it was reasonable. But it is, at a minimum, relevant to know if that $200,000 that he deposited in his bank account came directly from Saudi Arabia, came directly from North Korea.

I have no evidence to suggest that it is or isn't. But his statement was that he could not even tell this committee that $200,000 did not come directly from a foreign government. I would suggest that it is evidence that, at a minimum, would suggest further inquiry is justified.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Cruz, you are free to vote against this nominee for any reason you choose, including that he has not responded to questions which you have asked beyond the questions that this committee asks.

But let's be clear as to what the question is that this committee asked. During the last 10 years, have you or your spouse received any compensation from or been involved in any financial or business transactions with a foreign government or an entity controlled by a foreign government? His answer is no.

You say you don't have any evidence yes or no to the contrary. If and when you come up with any evidence that he has not answered this question honestly, I am sure that you will provide that to the committee.

But for the purposes of this proceeding with this nomination, your objection is clear on the record. If you come up with any evidence, you can supply that to us, that he has not answered these questions honestly.

But we are now going to proceed to call on Senator Nelson.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Chairman, Senator Cruz has stated his opinion, which he is entitled to. But I want to put on the record that this Senator feels like that Senator Cruz has gone over the line. He, basically, has impugned the patriotism of the nominee in your conclusions, which you are entitled to come to, about him, in essence, being cozy with Iran. You have also stated your opinion that you don't think he has been truthful with this committee.

Now, those are two fairly strong statements. I couldn't help but having had the privilege of serving on this committee for a while, and seeing the two former chairmen on either side of the nominee, and I looked at the former Republican Chairman John Warner's face, as some of the questions were asked, as he visibly winced.

There is a certain degree of comity and civility that this committee has always been known for. Clearly, in the sharpness of difference of opinion, to question, in essence, whether somebody is a fellow traveler with another country, I think, is taking it too far.

I would encourage this committee to take the role model of its former ranking member, Senator McCain, who can get into it hot and heavy, but at the end of the day, he is going to respect the other person's motives. I would implore the committee to consider that.

Now, I would just respond on a former question that was asked about this Global Zero report. I would simply turn to the transcript of the committee hearing, page 79. Senator Sessions has asked questions, and Senator Hagel's response at line 10, on page 79: "Thank you, Senator. Let me first correct some of your interpretation of what the Global Zero report was and what it actually said. First, it did not propose or call for anything. It was, in fact, the word specifically used at the front end of that report was 'illustrative,' proposing nothing but laying out different scenarios and possibilities and schedules.

"And here's the key part of all this—and by the way, this was summarized in a letter to President Obama in 2009—bilateral, never unilateral. Nothing was ever suggested on a unilateral basis to take down our arsenal. 'Negotiated,' 'verifiable,' these are terms that were in the report.

"As Senator Nunn said in his opening statement—and I have alluded generally to this—the mainstream thinking of most Presidents we have had in the last 65 years—and I go back to Ronald Reagan's comments, as Senator Nunn quoted—was reduction of nuclear weapons for the obvious reasons. That is why we have engaged in treaties to reduce nuclear weapons. Those were not unilateral arrangements; those were bilateral arrangements."

I will continue in the transcript on page 121 at line 2, where Senator Ayotte asked, "Here is what is troubling me. You have testified before this committee today that you have never been for unilateral nuclear disarmament; in other words, unilateral actions by the United States of America. Yet this report itself, which you call an illustration, it is illustration or recommendation, or however you want to frame it, is to actually—there are many recommendations in it. One of them is to eliminate a leg of the triad, which is the land-based intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM). Would you agree with that? That is the illustration that is contained in this report, or you call an illustration. Is that right?"

"Senator Hagel, 'I call it an illustration, Senator, because that is the term; it is used at the front end of the report.' "

"Senator Ayotte, 'Well, let me talk about the other terms that this report uses, because this report twice, as Senator Sessions has asked you, on page 1 and on page 16, says that the illustrations for this example given in this report, one of which is eliminating a leg of the triad, nuclear triad, could be implemented unilaterally. So here is what I am struggling with: Why would you ever put your name on a report that is inherently inconsistent with what you are telling us today, is that you have never been for unilateral disarmament as a possibility?' "

Senator Hagel's response is, on page 122, "Well, it is not inconsistent, I don't believe, Senator. But you used the term 'could'. That is a pretty important operative word in the report. The report does not recommend that we do these things. The report says 'could'—illustrative scenarios, possibilities. You probably know the other individuals who were involved in that report, mainly General Cartwright, the former Commander of Strategic Command."

I wanted to insert those things into the record from the previous hearing.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Nelson.

Senator CRUZ. Mr. Chairman, if I may be heard on a point of personal privilege?

Chairman LEVIN. Let me call on Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. I just want to make one observation.

My friend, Senator Nelson, I think I wrote down the words criticizing our Senator there for implying that Chuck Hagel was cozy with terrorist-type countries, referring to Iran. Let me say, I would say, he is endorsed by them. You can't get any cozier than that.

Chairman LEVIN. I have been endorsed by people I disagree with totally. I don't want people who hate me to ruin my career by endorsing me.

Senator Cruz.

Senator CRUZ. If I may be heard on a point of personal privilege, the Senator from Florida leveled to charges directly at me, and I would suggest both of those charges are false.

The first thing the Senator from Florida said is that I had impugned Chuck Hagel's patriotism. To the contrary, I have repeatedly and explicitly praised his personal character and patriotism and service. My focus is entirely on his longstanding foreign policy record and his consistent opposition to sanctions to any form of direct action dealing with those who would cause harm. So in no way, shape, or form have I impugned his patriotism. I focused on his foreign policy record, which even the Washington Post describes as at the fringe.

Second, the Senator from Florida suggested that I stated that Mr. Hagel has not been truthful. To the contrary, my point is exactly the opposite, that the question this committee asked, whether he has directly received money from foreign sources, enables him to answer that question truthfully no, while at the same time not disclosing whether the hundreds of thousands of dollars he has received have come indirectly from foreign sources.

His answers could be entirely truthful, and yet the example I used of Corsair Capital, that money, that $200,000, could have come from a foreign nation to Corsair Capital, and he could answer the truthfully, no, I haven't received it, because it came from an intermediary.

My point is not that he has lied. It is, rather, that he has refused to answer reasonable questions of disclosure. So I would suggest, in no way, shape, or form have I intended to or have I, in fact, impugned his character. My focus has consistently been on his record, which I think is a record that is troubling and would be dangerous to the national security interests of the country.

Chairman LEVIN. The record of the committee will have to speak for itself.

Let me now call upon Senator Wicker.

Senator MCCAIN. Could I——

Chairman LEVIN. Yes, Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. I just want to make it clear, Senator Hagel is an honorable man. He has served his country. No one on this committee at any time should impugn his character or his integrity.

Chairman LEVIN. I think we would all agree with that, I hope.

Senator Wicker.

Senator WICKER. Let me see if I can reel this back, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

This is not my idea of a good time. We have a Republican nominee for Secretary of Defense by a Democratic President. We have every Democrat on the committee supporting him. Every Republican on the committee with just as heartfelt reason to oppose the nomination.

Chuck Hagel's wife grew up in Mississippi. She has kinfolk still there. Presumably, they wonder why I can't support their kinsman.

Mr. Chairman, you say we need a Secretary of Defense, and we do. The acts of today by North Korea demonstrates that. What is going on in Iran demonstrates that. But we need the right Secretary of Defense.

I have to say, sitting there this week with Secretary Panetta, a man who I have served with, a man who I am proud to have voted for, I was proud to vote for him at the beginning of his term as Secretary of Defense, and here at the end of that term, I am just as proud.

Mr. Chairman, I would be delighted and eager to vote for you for confirmation as Secretary of Defense. I would do that without hesitation. I would have voted for Senator Warner, Senator Nunn. Clearly, Senator Hagel brought the right people with them.

But we need the right Secretary of Defense. Chuck Hagel is not the right Secretary of Defense for this time.

We need a Secretary of Defense who can stand before the world and articulate that we reject a policy of containment of a nuclear Iran. We need a Secretary of Defense that can stand before the world and be clear in making the point that the Iranian Government is not a legitimately constituted government.

When Senator Hagel made the misstatement about the legitimacy of the Iranian Government, Senator Gillibrand had to come back later, explain it to him, walk him back, and help him correct that misstatement. We need a Secretary of Defense who doesn't need help in that regard.

Clearly, we need a Secretary of Defense who doesn't need to be passed a note saying we are not in favor of a containment policy. He got that wrong, and the chairman had to take a third stab at it and correct the nominee for Secretary of Defense on one of the major issues of the day.

Now you could say that Senator Hagel had a bad day, and it was. It was a troubling performance before this hearing. The members of this committee acknowledge that and know that. But here is my larger objection. Here, in Chuck Hagel, we have a Senator who made a career out of taking a contrary view against bipartisan consensus positions that have been held across this table and across the aisle and at both ends of this building.

There has been a bipartisan mainstream national security consensus in this Congress on Israel, on our policy with regard to Iran, on our entire Middle Eastern policy, backing Jimmy Carter's Camp David accords in 1978. Chuck Hagel, without question, has made a career out of going in front of the cameras, getting invitation after invitation because it was good TV, and making it clear that he was outside that national bipartisan mainstream on all of these crucial national issues.

Now, suddenly, he is the nominee, and we are to believe that he is squarely in the mainstream of American thought in this regard. This is the individual who said the Israeli Government essentially continues to play games. He is the individual who said he didn't believe in unilateral sanctions because they don't work and they isolate the United States.

A week later, when it is necessary to say something different to the Senator from California, he walks that back. He is the same Senator who decried the systematic destruction of an American friend by the country of Israel and who said there is a Jewish lobby in this country that gets its way through intimidation, and that results in this Government doing dumb things.

Now when asked by Senator Graham, when asked by me about the Jewish lobby, he clearly reiterated that he should not have said the Jewish lobby. He should have said the pro-Israel lobby, or the pro-Israeli lobby. He told me, "No, I shouldn't have said intimidate. I should have said influence."

So there is an Israel lobby that influences. What about the dumb things? It finally got to the point where he was just unable to tell Senator Graham anything other than he really just didn't have anything at all in mind.

This is a man who has planted himself for 8 years in the U.S. Senate clearly, as Senator Graham says, not in the left lane, not in the center lane, not in the right lane, but in the Chuck Hagel outside the mainstream lane. Let me just tell you, my friends, I think we know in our hearts, we could do better.

Senator King is going to be a wonderful Senator. He says this is a job interview. Boy, during that job interview, it occurred to me that the prospective employer would say we can do better than this. We can do better. The President can do better.

I can name several people in this room who could do better, and we need to do it for the people of the United States and for the security of the United States.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Wicker.

Senator McCaskill.

Senator MCCASKILL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

President Obama, when he became President, had campaigned a lot on foreign policy and the war in Iraq. What did he do when he became President? He turned to the Secretary of Defense of President Bush and asked him if he would continue to serve as his Secretary of Defense.

Now I remember when he did that, and I remember the hue and cry that went up from many in the President's base. They were upset with the President because he had dared to ask Secretary Gates to stay on. President Obama weathered that criticism because he wanted the advice and the counsel of Secretary Gates.

This is a President who was just reelected by the American people. As much as some people in this room don't like it, he was elected President of the United States by the American people, and he has selected an honorable veteran, a Republican, who has served our country in various capacities, including this body.

He has a resume that qualifies him. He has a character that until today I assumed was not questioned on either side of the aisle and references embraced by an impressive bipartisan group of leaders in national defense, including the former chairman of this committee and ranking Republican of this committee, who is revered by both sides of the aisle. Not only did he introduce him, he warmly embraced him and endorsed him.

Now we have had the same set of disclosure rules in this committee for 25 years, same set of rules. We have applied these rules across the aisle, didn't matter whether it was a Republican or a Democrat.

During this period of time, we have confirmed Secretaries Carlucci, Cheney, Aspin, Perry, Cohen, Rumsfeld, Gates, and Panetta, as well as thousands of other nominees for senior civilian positions in the Department of Defense. We asked Senator Hagel the same questions that we asked all of those fine men, and he answered them all. There is a whole section on foreign affiliations, and he answered each one of these questions on foreign affiliations "no".

There are five different questions that cover the waterfront in terms of foreign affiliations. I certainly respect my friends across the aisle deeply, and I know we have different opinions about this, and I know that there are legitimate policy differences here.

But in this committee, it is my hope that if we have someone in front of this committee who at a time when many of his generation were running from facing battle, I remember, trying to figure out a way to get a deferment, trying to figure out a way to use their connections to avoid the battlefield, trying to get to Canada. This is a man who stood up and said, "Let me go," and not only did he go, he served with courage on the battlefield.

Now I am not saying you have to agree with him. I am not saying you have to vote for him. But I will say this. I think we have to be really careful with inferences that would leave the impression that this man would somehow purposely evade or purposely mislead this committee as to his relationship with any foreign government.

He has answered these questions clearly and completely. He has done everything that we have ever asked a nominee to do. So I think it is very troubling that we have gotten close to that line.

I have to tell you, Senator Inhofe, be careful because you might have an organization that would endorse you that you find abhorrent. Then would I have the right to say you are cozy with them? What if some horrible organization tomorrow said that you were the best guy they knew?

The idea that somebody is endorsed by someone else, that that somehow signs him up to agree with this country that he has acknowledged to this committee is a threat to our Nation, that he has acknowledged that he will not be part of any policy of containment, that he knows we must stop them from getting nuclear weapons, and that they are a state-sponsored organization of terrorism. He answered that very clearly to my questions.

I just think, am I sad that this is going to be a party-line vote? Yes, I am. Senator Graham said that this is an aberration. I sure hope so. Because this Nation deserves us trying to have it not be a partisan situation on this committee. I hope this is an aberration, and I do respect everyone who cannot vote to confirm this Secretary.

But I do think a great deal of deference should be given to the Commander in Chief on his selection, and I do think his resume, his references, and most importantly, his integrity qualify him for this job.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator McCaskill.

Okay. Let me just add one quick thing. This committee has had to deal with difficult issues before, and there have been occasions when we have actually split on a party line. We have survived those very strongly. We will survive this one, and we will be just as strong coming out as we were going in.

This is a bipartisan committee. We are proud of that tradition. That tradition is a lot stronger than any particular single vote or any particular single comment. So we will, I am sure, I have no doubt about this committee's future bipartisanship, as difficult as this vote is.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. I will just be very brief here. When you talk about the relationship between Senator Hagel and a country, and we were talking about the subject, the country is Iran. When they are the ones who say that they want to wipe Israel off the map, that Israel is a cancerous tumor in the heart. They hate America from the bottom of their heart. Yet he appears with some of their people on Al Jazeera, where he agrees with the statement that Israel has committed war crimes.

That goes far beyond just being endorsed. Now that needs to be in the record, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. I think the transcript of that will be put in the record because it will be very different in terms of many of our impressions of it than the way it has just been described.

But let us proceed, and we will go to Senator Sessions.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I respect your chairmanship so much, and we produced the defense bill unanimously last year again. It came out of the committee. So that does speak well, I think, for our bipartisanship.

I would note that I am uncomfortable. I don't think it is necessary that we rush this vote today. We just received certain speeches. I haven't seen them. A video apparently of one is in existence, but not been produced. There are other things that cause me to think we should be slower about this.

With regard to the committee rules, in the Judiciary Committee, like this committee, there are basic questionnaires that go to everyone, but that does not limit the inquiry. We have had much broader inquiry about individuals when they have this problem or this question and people ask. So, I think it is not unreasonable to ask that a nominee disclose his income over a period of time.

If I am wrong about that, I will change my view. But I don't think that is an unreasonable, burdensome question to ask of a nominee who wants to be Secretary of Defense. It has certainly been done to others, and just because we limit it to 2 years doesn't mean on a given circumstance we couldn't ask for more. But that is what I would say there.

Colleagues, we are facing and going to be debating the nuclear posture of the United States a great deal. I understand the President may talk about it at some length tonight. It does not totally surprise me because I believe he comes out of the anti-nuclear left, and as one wise observer of all these processes over the years said to me recently, "I am not surprised that the anti-nuclear left would propose the things that are in the Global Zero report. That has been out there for 30 or 40 years. What surprises me is that position may be held by the Secretary of Defense of the United States of America."

My view is that this nominee has been somewhat erratic in his positions over time, and I am concerned about that. Senator Nelson and I swapped as chairman of the Strategic Forces Subcommittee, where nuclear weapons issues are debated, and we have been involved in it for some time. The Global Zero report that Senator Hagel was one of four other people that signed it and produced it, said some very troubling things. It outlines a vision for nuclear weaponry in the United States that is contrary to our historical position.

Just about 3 years ago, legislation I proposed actually, America's Strategic Posture, a bipartisan report, was produced. William J. Perry, who was openly known to favor reducing nuclear weapons and continuing to reduce them. James Schlesinger, he was vice chairman. Perry, the chairman. Schlesinger, vice chairman.

Other people like James Woolsey, Lee Hamilton, Morton Halperin, John Glenn were on this committee. We appointed them to see where we were and to produce a bipartisan analysis from the best heads in the country about what we should do about our nuclear weapons. They did not say change the triad. They did not say take weapons off alert. They did not say eliminate all ICBMs. They did not say eliminate all tactical weapons. In fact, the contrary.

Now, apparently, Senator Hagel participates in this Global Zero report just last year, less than a year ago, and this is what it said. "In our illustrative plan, the United States over the next 10 years reduces its arsenal to a maximum of 900 nuclear weapons and increases the warning and decision time over its smaller arsenal."

Warning time means you take them off alert so it takes a lot longer to get them launched than it would today. It goes on to say, "These steps could be taken with Russia in unison through reciprocal presidential directives, negotiated in another round of bilateral arms reduction talks, or implemented unilaterally."

It goes on to make this unusual statement. "Security is mainly a state of mind, not a physical condition, and mutual assured destruction no longer occupies a central psychological or political space in the U.S.-Russian relationship." I don't think that is true of where Russia is.

That was on page 1 of the report. Then it says this about bilateral nuclear arms negotiations on page 16.

Chairman LEVIN. Would you forgive the interruption, Senator Sessions?

I think I am able to set a time for a vote now if we could get some idea about how long you want to speak, and I am not trying to limit you. Can you give us an idea about how long? Because I just talked to Senator Blumenthal, and I want to ask Senator Hirono the same question.

Senator SESSIONS. Okay, Mr. Chairman. I just wanted to share a few thoughts. About how much time do you want me to take?

Chairman LEVIN. Is 5 minutes enough?

Senator SESSIONS. Seven minutes.

Chairman LEVIN. Seven minutes? That is fine.

Senator SESSIONS. I will try to finish in 5 minutes.

Chairman LEVIN. That is no problem.

Senator Hirono, may I ask you about how long you want to speak?

Senator HIRONO. About 3 minutes.

Chairman LEVIN. Three minutes.

Senator Blumenthal, 2 or 3 minutes? Senator Udall wanted a couple of minutes.

I am now going to schedule a vote for 5 p.m. We will vote at 5 p.m. We will hopefully have just about everybody there. If not, if somebody is on their way, we can stay here until everybody has an opportunity either to vote in person or to vote by proxy.

So 5 p.m., we are going to start the vote.

Senator Sessions, forgive the interruption.

Senator SESSIONS. Let me ask one question, Mr. Chairman. There are several members, maybe the majority of the members on this side had requested we don't carry this vote tonight, and we would like to have it delayed. We recognize that you are the majority, and I would just make that request to you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

We have made a decision. We are going to proceed to a vote today. We recognize the request, but we just have to stick to a plan, which was a reasonable plan, and we are going to start the vote at 5 p.m. Now back to Senator Sessions.

Senator SESSIONS. A growing concern on our side about moving this nomination so rapidly and a belief that there are further disclosures. So I don't know where we will end up on that.

But the report says this. "The reductions in de-alerting proposed under this illustrative plan could be carried out in unison with the United States and Russia through reciprocal presidential directives, negotiated in another round of bilateral arms reduction talks, or implemented unilaterally."

It also says, "A less good approach," but still a good approach, apparently, "would be to adopt this agenda unilaterally."

Senator Hagel was very anxious to tell us the report did not call for unilateral actions on behalf of the United States. It clearly suggests three times the possibility of unilateral actions. I think it just was surprising to me how driven they were to reach this conclusion.

In a footnote, a question was raised about observers, I being one of them, who made the point that if we continue to draw down our weapons and they get to a certain level, more and more nations could see themselves as peer competitors. Far from being deterred from building up nuclear weapons, they might see it as an opportunity to be on an equal par with Russia and the United States.

I think that is a legitimate concern. They dismiss that and say that, "Global Zero discussions with high-level Chinese Government officials and military officials and experts indicate strongly that China remains committed to this course of a low nuclear policy. China would not race to parity or supremacy and would, in fact, take the opposite position to join an arms reduction process if the United States reduces their arsenals to low numbers."

Forgive me, but I don't know who he talked to, and I am not sure they would tell him the truth anyway. Matter of fact, I doubt it. This is the kind of thing that went into that report.

General Schwartz, the Air Force Chief of Staff, when asked about this report, was not sympathetic. General Schwartz said, "I don't agree with this assessment or this study."

The current commander, General Robert Kehler, Strategic Forces Command, that has the nuclear requirements for the U.S. Government, said, "Regarding the Global Zero report, in my view, we have the force size, force structure, force posture today that we need for our national security needs."

What did the report call for in conclusion? They are not shy about saying it. The United States "could seek to achieve," this is in the conclusion, "such reductions in 10 years and plan to base its arsenal on a dyad," no longer a triad, "of nuclear delivery vehicles. The optimal mix of carriers would consist of 10 Trident missile submarines"—there are currently 14—"and 18 B–2 bombers."

This would decommission, as they overtly say, 67 B–52 nuclear bombers. They would be totally eliminated, all the B–52s.

Continuing, "under normal conditions, one half of the warhead stockpile, 450, would be deployed on these carriers. The other half would be kept in reserve, except during national emergency. All land-based intercontinental missiles armed with nuclear payloads would be retired." All ICBMs would be retired. "And the carriers of nonstrategic warheads, all of which would be eliminated."

The carriers of nonstrategic, that is tactical nuclear weapons, would be eliminated from the stockpile. B–52 bombers would be completely eliminated or converted to carry only conventional weapons.

I really think that is an extreme position. It is contrary to the established bipartisan commission that we established, the concurrent bipartisan policy of the U.S. Defense Department. I don't know how you will vote on this nomination, but please, ladies and gentlemen, as we go forward, we are going to have to be very careful about how we handle strategic nuclear weapons.

There is no doubt our allies are very uneasy. They don't understand where we are heading. They don't have the confidence that we need them to have. If an ally doesn't think that we are going to be there for them, then will they not have a high incentive to build a nuclear arsenal themselves to defend themselves? That worries me.

The members of this committee that I talked to and met privately said they receive delegations from various countries I won't name that we respect and are great allies with are really troubled by this.

I asked a Russian professor on one occasion, "Would you eliminate your tactical nuclear weapons?" He said, "Do you know how many troops the Chinese have on our border? We are never going to eliminate tactical nuclear weapons."

We have to be careful about this dream of a world without nuclear weapons. Will it encourage Iran? Will it encourage North Korea, if we reduce our weapons, to stop producing nuclear weapons? If we continue to go down and people lack confidence in us, what about countries like Saudi Arabia or Egypt or Turkey or other countries around the world, South Korea or Japan? Would they not feel further pressure to build a nuclear arsenal, and therefore, proliferation would occur?

Mr. Chairman, I think this is out of the mainstream. It represents a rather erratic position. Having been involved in this virtually the entire time I have been in the Senate, I think it is so far away from where we need to be that I would not be able to support my friend, Chuck Hagel.

I like him. He absolutely deserves our respect for being on the ground, in combat, putting his life on the line, serving his country. He is a frank and open person. But he has not been particularly consistent, in my view, over the years. He has taken some views that I think are not good for America, and I believe in the Secretary of Defense, the entire world and all Americans really need to know that is one person that is stable, solid, can be counted on to issue measured judgments, and to execute them as promised.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Sessions.

Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I will be very brief in the interest of time, just to say that I will be supporting Senator Hagel.

I want to thank particularly Senator McCain for his comments about Senator Hagel that none of us are seeking to impugn his character. In fact, many of the Senators who question him commented that he is a good and decent man and that they respect his record as a decorated combat veteran.

He would be the first enlisted man to serve as Secretary of Defense and, therefore, I think uniquely qualified to address what I view as probably one of the two or three major challenges for the next leader of the Department of Defense, which is how to attract and retain the best in America, the best people in America to serve in our military.

We all are fond of saying that our people are our greatest asset, and it is true. Anybody who has visited our warfighters in Afghanistan, as I have done three times—and was privileged to go with Senators McCain, Graham, and Ayotte a couple of those times—stand in awe, I think, of the work that they have done and the sacrifices they have made.

This country traditionally, after such wars, hollows out its military. I am convinced that Senator Hagel is committed, passionately committed, to the men and women in uniform and our veterans. He has been a veterans advocate, as well as a decorated combat veteran himself.

So I believe there is a reason that we afford the President some prerogative in choosing his team, which is, ultimately, the President that we hold accountable for his policies. His policies, the administration's policies, will have to be Senator Hagel's policies, if he is confirmed as the Secretary of Defense.

We should hold the President accountable. I hope to work with my colleagues on issues like Iran and Israeli security, and as well as working to stop sexual assault, implementing the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell," the dangers and realities of suicide, post-traumatic stress disorder, and, of course, the looming danger of sequestration. The management of the Department of Defense is a huge challenge. I hope that we will come together on a bipartisan basis to help whoever the next Secretary of Defense is—and I believe he will be Senator Hagel—to address those challenges.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Blumenthal.

Senator Hirono.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

There are good-hearted, right-minded people on both sides of the Chuck Hagel nomination question, and I don't think there are any minds to be changed at this point. I would like to offer a few points about this nominee for the record.

First, it is important to our national security to have leadership in the Department of Defense right now. The Defense Department, it is never an easy place to run, but today it faces an unusually difficult set of challenges. We need a Secretary of Defense in place to manage the fallout from sequester, should it come to fruition, as well as the budget constraints we face in the future.

We need a Secretary of Defense in place to guide the fundamental rebalancing of our military after the end of the war in Iraq, as the winding down of the war in Afghanistan continues, and as we pivot to the Pacific. This rebalancing must be done while being vigilant about the circumstances in North Korea, Syria, North Africa, and elsewhere, as well as the large and ever-increasing cybersecurity threats to our data systems, power grid, and other infrastructure.

Second, at the same time, we, as a country, must have a larger discussion about the next generation of warfare. How, when, and under what circumstances will digital weapons be used? There are ongoing questions regarding the use of drones. What role will Congress have in overseeing the use of these weapons? We need a Secretary of Defense in place to participate in these discussions.

Third, we also need a Secretary of Defense who will look after the needs of our soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines, and their families. We need a Secretary of Defense who has fought for veterans issues and can work with the VA to ensure that these two agencies will work in coordination for the benefit of our veterans. Senator Hagel has tremendous breadth of leadership in both the public and the private sectors.

I think that we owe tremendous deference to the President to put together the team that he can count on. I am confident that Senator Hagel will provide the President unvarnished advice and that he will ask the kinds of tough questions that he has always asked, not necessarily the popular questions.

Senator Hagel, in my view, is clearly qualified to be Secretary of Defense, and I will be supporting his nomination.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Hirono.

Senator Udall.

Senator UDALL. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Inhofe, it has been a spirited discussion. I intend to proudly vote for Sergeant Hagel. He is a patriot. He has earned the right to wear two Purple Hearts and many other commendations.

The enduring case for me was made at his nomination hearing by the long list of former Defense Secretaries and National Security Advisers, both Republicans and Democrats, who stood together and supported Senator Hagel's nomination.

The enduring image for me will always be Senator Hagel flanked by Senators Warner and Nunn, our iconic and respected national security leaders.

Let us vote, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. We are almost at the 5 p.m. hour.

Senator SESSIONS. Could I say one good thing about our nominee?

Chairman LEVIN. Please. Great way to end.

Senator SESSIONS. I thought I heard him do the containment comment. First, I perked up. But my honest evaluation, Senator King, is it was just a mis-speaking. I don't think he rejected or meant to adopt a containment policy rather than not allowing them to have a nuclear weapon.

I meant to say that earlier. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

On that very positive note and a generous note, and I say that very seriously, this committee is a very strong bipartisan committee, as I said before, and we will continue to be, one difficult vote notwithstanding.

The clerk, a quorum being present, the 5 p.m. hour having come, we will now consider the nomination of Charles "Chuck" Hagel to be the Secretary of Defense. Is there a motion to favorably report Mr. Hagel's nomination to the Senate?

Senator REED. So moved.

Chairman LEVIN. Is there a second?

Senator NELSON. Second.

Chairman LEVIN. The clerk will call the role.

The CLERK. Mr. Reed?

Senator REED. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. Nelson?

Senator NELSON. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. Udall?

Senator UDALL. Aye.

The CLERK. Mrs. Hagan?

Senator HAGAN. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. Manchin?

Senator MANCHIN. Aye.

The CLERK. Mrs. Shaheen?

Senator SHAHEEN. Aye.

The CLERK. Mrs. Gillibrand?

Senator GILLIBRAND. Aye.

The CLERK. Mrs. McCaskill?

Senator MCCASKILL. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. Blumenthal?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. Donnelly?

Senator DONNELLY. Aye.

Chairman LEVIN. Let me announce the vote first, if you would?
Senator WICKER. On that, it was my understanding earlier that the vote would be left open, and I would just suggest that Mr. Vitter may have heard that and might——
Chairman LEVIN. We will—thank you.
Thank you, I did say that, and we will leave the vote open for an additional 10 minutes to give Mr. Vitter a chance to come and vote in person. If he does so, the vote will then reflect that vote in person. If not, it will be as announced.
I think we all trust each other so that we know what I am saying here. Would you just please announce the vote again, subject to that one vote change?
The CLERK. Fourteen ayes, 11 nays, 1 no instruction.
Chairman LEVIN. If Mr. Vitter does show up in the next, what did I say, 10 minutes, he can then cast a vote. It will not change the outcome. (Senator Vitter did not return within the allotted time.)
Given that vote, we will now favorably report the nomination of Chuck Hagel to the Senate.
We thank you all, and we look forward to another wonderful year together.
We are adjourned.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody, and welcome.

This morning, the committee considers the nominations of two very distinguished officers to two of the most active and challenging combatant commands (COCOM): General Lloyd Austin, U.S. Army, nominated to be Commander, U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM), and General David Rodriguez, U.S. Army, nominated to be Commander of the U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM).

These two combatant commands, CENTCOM and AFRICOM, are the centers of gravity for our military's operations to counter the threat of terrorism. Both nominees have served our country with distinction, and I want to thank each of you for your decades of military service and your willingness to serve, once again.

I understand that General Austin's wife, Charlene, and General Rodriguez's wife, Ginny, are with us this morning; I want to acknowledge them and thank them for their sacrifices, their support to our nominees throughout the years, which is so essential to the success of our nominees. As is the committee's tradition, our nominees are invited to introduce any family members or friends who may be with them this morning, with their opening remarks.

If confirmed, General Austin will assume command of CENTCOM during a critical transition period for our military operations in Afghanistan. In the coming months, Afghan forces will assume the lead responsibility for providing security throughout their country, with coalition forces stepping back to a support role. On Tuesday, President Obama announced, during the State of the Union Address, plans for drawing down half of the 66,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan this year, a 34,000-troop reduction by February 2014.

The President continues to consider options for a significantly reduced U.S. military presence in Afghanistan after the end of 2014, which will depend on many things, but, in part, on negotiations with the Government of Afghanistan over legal protections for our troops. The President has made clear that the missions of any residual U.S. military presence in Afghanistan after 2014 will be limited to counterterrorism operations, and training and advising Afghan forces.

General Austin would bring exceptional experience to overseeing this transition, having commanded U.S. Forces in Iraq during the reduction of U.S. Forces and equipment from Iraq.

Just this past weekend, our forces in Afghanistan have had a change of command, with General Joseph Dunford replacing General John Allen as Commander of the International Security Assistance Forces (ISAF) and Commander, U.S. Forces-Afghanistan.

I want to take this opportunity to thank General Allen for his thoughtful and devoted leadership in Afghanistan, for his forthrightness in his interactions with me and the rest of the members of this committee.

When Senator Reed and I visited Afghanistan in January, we saw real signs of progress, including the Afghan security forces increasingly taking the lead responsibility for protecting their country. Good-news stories about Afghanistan and the Afghan security forces don't seem to get the coverage in the U.S. media that is given to negative stories. For example, it was widely reported that only 1 of 23 Afghan brigades is rated by ISAF as independent. On the other hand, we heard, from our commanders in Afghanistan, that 87 percent of operations in Afghanistan's critical Regional Command East are carried out solely by Afghan security forces.

Another mainly success story is now the 18,000-strong Afghan Local Police (ALP) program. These community defense forces, when coordinated with district-level Afghan National Police and Afghan army forces, are more and more effective in empowering Afghan communities to defend against Taliban intimidation and violence. Plans are being developed to increase the authorized size of the ALP program from 30,000 to 45,000.

The next CENTCOM commander will also play an important role in shaping our enduring partnership with Afghanistan after 2014, a partnership that I fully support. I am concerned, however, by plans to reduce the Afghan National Security Forces by a third, starting in 2015, from 352,000 to 230,000 by 2017. I believe that any future reductions in the size of the Afghan forces should be based on security conditions in Afghanistan at that time. As Afghan security forces make progress in providing for their country's security, we should reassure them that we will continue to support these efforts by deciding that, as we withdraw our forces, that there won't be a drawdown in Afghan forces.

Progress in Afghanistan remains fragile. Significant challenges to Afghanistan's long-term stability remain. Among the greatest threats to stability are the safe havens for Afghan insurgents across the Pakistan border, which the Government of Pakistan has failed to disrupt or eliminate. In addition, the major shortcomings of the Government of Afghanistan in delivering governance and fighting corruption creates political and economic instability that could exacerbate the challenges to the 2014 transition.

In addition to Afghanistan, CENTCOM must contend with one of the most significant issues in our current national security debate: the threat posed by Iran and its continued pursuit of its nuclear program. As the CENTCOM commander, General Austin will be at the tip of the spear with regard to preparing, militarily, for the potential of an armed conflict with Iran. I share the President's view that all options must remain on the table with respect to Iran.

Iran's hand can be seen throughout the region, including its relentless pursuit of instability and fomenting of violence through proxies, such as Hamas and Hezbollah, and through its own covert activities in the region. Already, destabilizing events in Syria, Yemen, Gaza, Egypt, Iraq, and Sudan are made worse by Iran's funding and supply of terrorist organizations seeking to undermine governments and to spark further conflict among sectarian and tribal groups. CENTCOM has a critical role to play in leading efforts across the region to counter Iran's malign influence.

Events in Syria continue to deteriorate. The impact of the Assad regime's increasing dependence on support from Iran, and desperate actions to hold onto power, can be seen in the thousands of refugees that flow into the towns and villages of Syria's neighbors. While the United States is focused on providing humanitarian relief and nonlethal assistance to the Syrian opposition, the CENTCOM commander will be asked to advise on the situation in Syria, including whether to provide lethal assistance to the opposition, whether the United States should conduct limited strikes against key Syrian military capabilities, and whether the United States should seek to build a coalition of nations to take more significant military action. These are extraordinarily complex issues that General Austin will be asked to share his views on today.

CENTCOM's area of responsibility (AOR) remains the central location of many of the nonstate terrorist threats that our Nation faces. In addition to core al Qaeda in Pakistan and the reemergence of al Qaeda in Iraq, al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula remains focused on attacking the United States and our interests. Our CENTCOM forces continue to assist our Yemeni security partners in preventing al Qaeda from taking advantage of areas in Yemen, where the government has limited control. The events in Benghazi were a poignant and powerful reminder of our need and public expectations for a capability to respond quickly to crises around the world. This is one of the major evolving situations that General Rodriguez is going to have to address, and will consume a great deal of his time. But, it's far from limited to Benghazi and to Libya. We have struggled, in Africa, to find footholds to allow for responses to the type of events that occurred in Benghazi or to allow us to conduct day-to-day operations, like intelligence collection. AFRICOM has received less, in the way of resources and support, than other geographic commands, and this disparity, indeed, may grow in a resource-constrained environment. These challenges, combined with destabilizing impacts of terrorist and criminal networks, will make General Rodriguez's task at AFRICOM among the most complicated in the Department.

An additional matter in the AFRICOM AOR that this committee watches closely is the ongoing U.S. support operations in Central Africa to assist the multinational effort to remove Joseph Kony and his top lieutenants from the battlefield. This committee—and Senator Inhofe has been very, very active in this effort—has sought to ensure that this mission is adequately resourced, including additional intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance capabilities.

General Rodriguez, I know that you're familiar with this mission, and the committee looks forward to hearing from you about it, and to working with you on it and so many of the other challenges that you will be facing.

I'm going to turn the gavel over to Senator Kaine, who has agreed to take over, because I must go to the floor.

I now call upon Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I join you in welcoming our witnesses. I've had an opportunity to get to know them in the past, and visit with them personally, and I'm very anxious to move on with this.

I thank Charlene and Ginny for being here. You're the guys who work harder than they do, so we appreciate all your sacrifices.

If confirmed, General Austin, you're going to be in charge of overseeing, arguably, the most volatile region of the world, and in the midst of a declining defense budget. Just last week, Secretary Panetta announced the indefinite delay of the Truman Carrier Strike Group deployment in the Middle East, a development that was undoubtedly welcomed by the regime in Tehran.

In Egypt, despite the best hopes of the Arab Spring, President Morsi and his Muslim Brotherhood Government have shown a troubling hostility towards the opposition groups and minorities, and have taken an increasing bellicose tone toward our ally, Israel. These developments require us to think long and hard over what assets we're going to be sharing with them, the controversial F–16 transfers, and frankly, I didn't agree with that. But, it's a tough area, and I think, if you look through that area—and, General Austin, you have Iran, we know, that is determined to acquire nuclear weapons capability. But, it's been going on for a long time. We've found that our intelligence has really been behind the curve on their capability of what they've developed so far. It's serious. It's a big step, over there.

In Iraq, our premature withdrawal has directly contributed to a deteriorating security situation, and allowed al Qaeda to reestablish a foothold in Syria. Assad's reign of brutality has now claimed the lives of over 60,000 Syrians, and risks spilling into neighboring countries.

Pakistan, we see a nuclear-armed government teetering on collapse, while militant groups, all the military groups, have enjoyed that as a safe haven.

Afghanistan, you'll oversee our operation and manage the transition of combat responsibilities to the Afghan security forces. Without doubt, we have to make sure that the force structure matches the mission and is driven by the facts on the ground, and not arbitrary dates. We've talked about this in my office. General Rodriguez, you and I have spoken about the squeeze in the Middle East. I've often said that it's kind of the neglected continent. I was somewhat instrumental when we established AFRICOM; and so, it was no longer in three different commands, but in one unified command. It's a tough area. It's a tough area that has never had adequate resources to carry out—what I consider adequately carrying out the mission. Certainly, the Chairman mentioned the problem with the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) and that is a problem, and it's one that is not just confined to a few people that started in northern Uganda; now has spread throughout eastern Congo and on up through the Central African Republic, and south Sudan, I might add.

But, it's connected. It's all terrorism, and it's all connected together, and it is a serious problem that we are going to have to deal with. It's the smallest of the Department of Defense's (DOD) regionally focused combatant commands, with less than 5,000 boots on the continent. That's a huge continent. Your work is cut out for you; we've talked about that, you and I, in my office, in somewhat detail.

While the challenges you will both face are very daunting, I'm confident that the two of you are up to the task. But, it's going to be heavy lifting.

As I said to you, General Austin, in my office, are you sure you want to do this? You said yes.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KAINE [presiding]. Thank you, Mr. Ranking Member.

General Austin, General Rodriguez, we're ready to hear your opening statements and testimony. Again, we appreciate you being here, and your service.

We'll begin with General Austin, and General Rodriguez to follow.

STATEMENT OF GEN LLOYD J. AUSTIN III, USA, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF GENERAL AND TO BE COMMANDER, U.S. CENTRAL COMMAND

General AUSTIN. Good morning, sir, Senator McCain, Ranking Member Inhofe, distinguished members of the committee.

I want to thank you for this opportunity to appear before you today. I also want to thank you for the steadfast and strong support that you have shown, and continue to show, to our men and women in uniform, our Army civilians, and their families. It is remarkable, all that they have accomplished over the past nearly 12 years of war. It was made possible, in no small part, through your personal efforts, and those of your colleagues. So, my thanks to all of you.

I'd like to take a moment to introduce my wife, Charlene. I've been incredibly fortunate to have her as my partner for more than 30 years. She represents the many wonderful spouses, who are the true unsung heroes of these conflicts, as they've supported us back home, and, in doing so, enabled our success.

My thanks to you, Charlene, for your love and support, and for your many sacrifices, and Happy Valentine's Day. [Laughter.]

I'm glad, today, to be joined by my teammate, General David Rodriguez. He, too, is accompanied by his bride, Ginny, who, like Charlene, has done a tremendous amount for our soldiers and families over the years.

Dave and I have served together a number of times over the years, to include in combat. He is a gifted leader and a decorated soldier, and I'm pleased that he's been nominated to command U.S. Africa Command.

Ladies and gentlemen, it has been a tremendous privilege for me to serve my country in uniform for nearly 4 decades, and I am grateful to be able to continue to serve. I am honored and humbled to have been nominated by the President to serve as a commander of CENTCOM. If confirmed, I pledge that I will apply all of my experiences and judgment, to the best of my abilities, to help preserve and advance our Nation's interests in that region of the world.

General Mattis has led CENTCOM masterfully over these past 2½ years. Our Nation owes him a debt of gratitude. The impact of his leadership and the efforts of his team during this decisive period have been tremendous. If confirmed, I intend to sustain and continue this important work; for the reality is that, while much progress has been made in the CENTCOM area of responsibility, there is still a great deal more to be done. Our national interests, and those of our allies and friends, demand vigilance as well as our continued commitment to do our part to help address the many challenges that exist, and to achieve and maintain security and stability throughout the Middle East and in South and Central Asia.

Of course, our foremost priority remains the ongoing mission in Afghanistan. Soon, we will be required to complete the transfer of responsibilities to the Afghans, and also transition our people and equipment out of that country, just as we did in 2010 and 2011, when I served there as the Commander of U.S. Forces-Iraq. This represents a herculean undertaking, and, if confirmed, I will do everything within my power to help set the broader conditions for our success in this most important endeavor.

Meanwhile, one must simply watch the evening news to understand that the world we live in remains complex and extremely volatile. Much of the instability and associated challenges reside in the CENTCOM area of responsibility. While we have to be pragmatic, we must always be prepared to respond to contingencies, whenever and wherever they occur around the world. If we truly want to have an effective and lasting impact in the region, our friends and allies must be assured of our support, and our potential adversaries must understand that there will be consequences for their actions.

As this past decade of conflict has clearly demonstrated, success in our many endeavors will require effective application of the full continuum of our Nation's instruments of power and influence, military as well as economic and diplomatic. Having worked closely with senior military and civilian officials from the various U.S. agencies and organizations, and also having worked closely with leaders from other countries and partner nations while serving in Iraq as a commander of U.S. Forces, I can personally attest to the effectiveness of these kind of collaborations. If confirmed, I will continue to cultivate my existing relationships while pursuing additional opportunities and partnerships that will surely prove beneficial to our efforts.

Senator Kaine, Senator Inhofe, and members of the committee, these are historic times and difficult times. However, amidst the many challenges that exist reside opportunities, and certainly the shared desire of people to see peace and harmony and prosperity achieved, and even in those places that have never before experienced them. I fully appreciate that the work ahead will be great, and the road will not be easy, but, if confirmed, I pledge to give all that I have towards ensuring our success, and the success of our allies and friends around the world, in this most worthy endeavor.

Thank you again for this opportunity and for your steadfast support for our service men and women and their families. I look forward to your questions.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, General Austin.

General Rodriguez.

STATEMENT OF GEN DAVID M. RODRIGUEZ, USA, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF GENERAL AND TO BE COMMANDER, U.S. AFRICA COMMAND

General RODRIGUEZ. Senator Kaine, Senator Inhofe, distinguished members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today.

I am honored the President has nominated me to serve as the next Commander of U.S. Africa Command. If confirmed, I'll look forward to working closely with this committee, as well as all our joint and interagency, intergovernmental, and multinational partners, to address the challenges we face and the opportunities to increase stability on this strategically important continent. Strong partnerships are key to gaining and maintaining stability in the 54 nations of Africa.

I would also like to thank this committee for the sustained support it has provided to our soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines, coastguardsmen, and Department of Defense civilians, and their families, during this time of conflict. They all selflessly serve the Nation, at home and abroad, often in harm's way, but always ready to assume their share of the risk, and all are eternally grateful for the backing and support of the American people and Congress.

I want to acknowledge the tremendous effort of General Ham and his team at the U.S. Africa Command. His leadership helps sustain strong partnerships, providing the foundation for our continued engagement across the continent and globally. He has done a superb job, and I hope that, if confirmed, I can expand on the work he has done.

To General Lloyd Austin, exceptional soldier, leader, and a good friend, we have served together throughout peace and war in our careers, and have a significant number of deployments between us. I'm honored to share this experience with both Lloyd and Charlene, and am certain that, if confirmed, Lloyd will continue his remarkable service to the Nation and our servicemembers.

I also want to thank my wife, Ginny, for her decades of service as an Army wife. Ginny has cared for, and looked after, soldiers and their families with energy, empathy, and understanding. She's also a wonderful mother to our children: Amy, a former Army officer and current student at the University of North Carolina; Melissa, a schoolteacher in North Carolina; David, who works with the Department of the Navy in Washington, DC; and Andrew, an infantry lieutenant in the Army.

I thank the committee again for allowing me to appear before you today, and I look forward to your questions.

Thank you.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, General Rodriguez.

Here's the procedure we will follow. I have a set of standard questions, that we ask all witnesses, that I will ask both of you to respond to. We'll then proceed to rounds of questions, alternating between representatives of the two parties; and the rounds of questions will be 7 minutes long. If there are additional questions in the second round that members want to ask, we'll proceed in that way.

Let me begin with the standard questions that we ask the witnesses. These are to help us exercise legislative and oversight responsibilities.

Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

[Both witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Senator KAINE. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

[Both witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Senator KAINE. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of this confirmation process?

[Both witnesses answered in the negative.]

Senator KAINE. Will you ensure that your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

[Both witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Senator KAINE. Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

[Both witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Senator KAINE. Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal from their testimony in any such briefing?

[Both witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Senator KAINE. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify, upon request, before this committee?

[Both witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Senator KAINE. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic communications, in a timely manner when requested by a duly-constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good-faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

[Both witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Senator KAINE. With that, we will move to the questions, and I will begin with Senator Donnelly.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank you, General Austin, General Rodriguez, for your service to the Nation, and to your families, for everything you have done. You may want to take them, for a Valentine's Day lunch, to the Senate Cafeteria. Then again, you may not. [Laughter.]

General Austin, as we heard the President say, the other night, he is looking to withdraw 34,000 troops from Afghanistan. My question is, can that be done in a way that does not leave Afghanistan less stable?

General AUSTIN. Thank you, sir.

Whereas, I was not a part of the process that helped to generate the proposals for the numbers of troops to be drawn down, and the rate at which they should be drawn down, I can tell you that, from having been a part of that process before, the types of things that commanders consider, going into those recommendations, really account for whether or not they can accomplish the assigned objectives and missions. So, I would assume that General Allen and General Mattis, as they went through that process, provided their best military advice. I would assume that to be the case. But, having not been a part of that, I cannot speculate as to whether or not——

Senator DONNELLY. How quickly will you become a part of that, and taking a look at that and making that determination?

General AUSTIN. If confirmed, sir, I will get into that right away and confer with General Dunford and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, and make sure that I have full understanding of the objectives, the missions, and the resources that have been provided to accomplish those objectives.

Senator DONNELLY. You will give us your unvarnished opinion as to the plan, how it works, and whether it will meet your strategic objectives as you look at the situation that we're in?

General AUSTIN. I will, sir, and the objectives that are outlined by the senior leadership, that have been provided to us.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you.

General Rodriguez, as we look at your mission, one of the things that strikes me is—and, of course, in CENTCOM, too, how important it's going to be to build up our partners there so that they can be self-sustaining in protecting their own nation. How critical a focus is that going to be for you as you move into this position?

General RODRIGUEZ. Thank you, Senator. That's a critical focus, because, obviously, the objective is to have Africans provide security and stability for themselves. There are a wide range of tools that we have to do that, and that will be a main focus.

Senator DONNELLY. It seems that that could be the key to success, is being in a position where the training we provide enables them to stand up on their own.

General Austin, as we look at the region that you will be commanding, one of the challenges has always been Pakistan, and our working relationships with Pakistan. As we go through the withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan, both men and women and equipment, and again, you mentioned that you had not yet been fully involved on that plan but, I would think one of the things we want to do is continue to work closely with Pakistan on that plan, but also have alternative options, if there are bumps in the road, as we proceed forward with orders and with other things. Are you going to be looking at that as part of what you look at when you get the plan in your hands?

General AUSTIN. Absolutely, sir. I think our relationship with Pakistan is critical. It is a key country in the region. My goal would be to immediately work to continue to build upon the existing relationship, which is on somewhat of a positive slope right now, a positive path. I want to continue to build on that. Again, they will be key going into the future, sir.

Senator DONNELLY. General Rodriguez, as we look at your region, we just saw an extraordinarily tragic situation in Benghazi. When we look at the countries there, and we look at the challenges that those nations already have in protecting themselves—and we often depend on home-nation security for our own consulates and embassies. As you look at that, will you be asking for a time-and-distance study? How fast can we get to our consulate? Where is the closest location we have to that consulate? So that you have a plan that can make sure, if our consulates are in danger, we will be there to protect them?

General RODRIGUEZ. Senator, if confirmed, I'll do a thorough study of time, distance, as well as capabilities, spread throughout the region, who can respond in a timely manner and ensure that the Department of State is informed so, together, we can make good decisions on how to best support our Americans, worldwide, and especially in the African continent.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you.

General Austin, as we transition from Afghanistan, the military gains in security that we have achieved—with all your experience in Iraq, with the transition there—I think one of the biggest challenges is, as the military leaves, how do we make sure that some of the gains in, not just military, but in state functions in Afghanistan, that we're able to hold onto them? What experiences that you took away from Iraq can help with that in Afghanistan as we move forward?

General AUSTIN. Certainly, sir, I think our embassy will remain engaged and continue to work with the Afghan leadership, to help them build capacity and work with issues on their political system. But, I think having a competent security force helps to create the time and space for an immature political system to mature. We would hope that we would have the opportunity for that to develop, the Afghans would make the right choices, going into the future. Certainly, having advisors around to help advise the military also helps to influence the rest of the environment, as well. I think the activity between the embassy staff and what our military is able to do, and keeping the Afghan security forces focused, I think that creates some time and space for the political system to mature a bit.

Senator DONNELLY. General Rodriguez, General Austin, thank you so much for your service. You and your family have dedicated your life to our country, and we're incredibly grateful to you.

Thank you.

General RODRIGUEZ. Thank you, Senator.

Senator KAINE. The ranking member, Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I agree with the remarks by the Senator, on your service and the time, and the fact that I've had the opportunity to be with you in the field and at various times. Let's see, General Rodriguez, we spent some New Year's Eves together over there; so we got to know each other pretty well.

Anyway, as I said in my opening statement, you guys have some really serious problems that you're facing over there.

Let's start off on AFRICOM, because that's something I was perhaps a little more familiar with.

One of the problems is—and we all go through this, and you guys are not immune from it, like crew rest. When you're trying to get to places, and you're in Stuttgart, and you have 54 countries and over 12 million square miles—to adequately support AFRICOM—I'm going to ask you a question, in a minute, about the resources—but, in terms of time and distance, have you thought about how you're going to handle that as you get a crisis in sub-Sahara Africa, you're going to have a hard time getting there. What do you think about that location?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir. I think that's going to require a solid coordination between all the interagency partners so that we can best understand indications and warnings, prior to those incidents happening, so we can best posture ourself to be able to respond appropriately. But because of the time, the distance, and the basing challenges that we have, that's going to continue to be a challenge. I will, if confirmed, look at that very carefully, put some requirements to the leadership, and then ensure that everybody understands the risk that's involved in what our Americans throughout the region are taking on.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, it's something you have no control over. That's where it is right now. Frankly, when we started AFRICOM, I was pushing very hard for Ethiopia, or someplace, for headquarters in Africa. The problem there is the reputation of our involvement in Africa, it is being misinterpreted as a colonialism type of an approach. But, I have to say this, every President that I talk to, including Kikwete, in Tanzania, they all have said, "We recognize that would be easier, but there's no way that we can sell it to the people." So, that's going to be there.

The reason I bring this up is there is always a lot of people here in the United States, members, our good friends in the Senate, who would like to move that headquarters stateside. I think that it's the best we can do right now, in Stuttgart, and I think you would agree that it would be very difficult to move that headquarters and operate.

What do you think about this, have you had time to look and see, in terms of resources—as I said in my opening statement, we have 5,000 boots on the ground; that's not much for an area like that—do you have any comments, going in, right now, as to how you're being resourced, particularly with the drawdowns that we're talking about at the current time?

General RODRIGUEZ. Senator, thank you. The challenges across the depth and breadth of Africa that we're facing, with the resource constraints that we're all living under will be a challenge. Again, we just have to make great assessments of where we're going to accept risk, to ensure everybody knows and understands that. The coordination between the interagency partners will be critical as we move forward.

We all, as commanders, have to help our leadership assess the risk throughout the combatant commands. If confirmed, I'll execute that, to the best of my ability.

Senator INHOFE. The Chairman, in his opening remarks, talked about the LRA and Joseph Kony. People are now aware of that. There was a time when they weren't, when you first got involved over there. My question is, if we're successful in our operation, in helping them take out Joseph Kony, would you continue there, and recognize Kony and the LRA as part of a terrorist group that go far beyond what—originally, it was just northern Uganda, then spread up to south Sudan and down into eastern Congo—that it is widespread, and it is a serious problem? I'd like to get your commitment to stay involved in that, and recognize it for the problem that it is.

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir. If confirmed, I commit to you that I will continue to watch Kony and the LRA, and the entire negative impact it has on the region, as a whole.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, and there are so many other areas that people are not really aware of right now, but one of the things that I would like to—I wasn't going to dwell on this, this long, but—we made a good decision, back, right after September 11, when we decided, as a policy for this country, that we were going to recognize Africa as the squeeze takes place in the Middle East, and the terrorism goes down through Djibouti and the Horn of Africa—that our idea was to put in five African brigades—to help them, not us—but, to help train the Africans, who are very receptive to the idea, so that when that happened down there, we wouldn't have to use our forces. It's kind of been floundering. I'd like to ask you to make those five African brigades a top priority during the time that you're spending down there.

General RODRIGUEZ. Will do, Senator.

Senator INHOFE. That's good.

General Austin, as I said a minute ago, and as I asked you in my office, are you sure you want this job? It's a tough area there. I would just like to ask you, in just whatever time it takes, to kind of look at the sequestration and how that's going to affect you in that critical region that I outlined, area by area, in my opening statement.

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir. I believe that sequestration will have enormously negative effects on the Services' ability to resource our efforts. What will happen is that all the Services are committed to supporting the current fight, which is what we should be doing. Over time, the follow-on deployers will be less ready. Our ability to respond to emerging contingencies in the region—we'll have less of an ability to do that. We'll have less flexibility and fewer options, because of some of the pressure now, with pressure on the budget.

Senator INHOFE. You mentioned four areas, and you called them "four principle levers," the last time you were here before this committee. They were military-to-military engagements, plans and operations, security cooperation programs, and posture and presence. Of those four, what are going to be impacted the most by sequestration, should it become a reality?

General AUSTIN. Certainly our presence and our posture in the region will be impacted. We're seeing that, the leading edge of that, with the delay of the deployment of the carrier. Again, that begins to take away some of the flexibility and the options available.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KAINE. Thank you.

As a schedule accommodation, I'm switching my time spot with Senator Nelson, and his questions will be next.

Senator Nelson.

Senator NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The delay of the deployment of that carrier—which otherwise would go to the Persian Gulf region?

General AUSTIN. That would be a part of its responsibilities as it completes its tour. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. I asked that question because, of course, one of the continuing high-visibility questions is what's going to happen in Iran. If Iran were to continue with the development of a nuclear weapon, we would need all the military assets that we could muster. The General has just pointed out that a sequester is going to keep that carrier in port, which is not a good thing, because if we ever got into it in Iran, or if Iran ever started their own aggressive action by mining the Strait of Hormuz, we would need all of our Navy assets that we could bring to bear. That's a fair statement, isn't it, General?

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir. General Mattis has laid out what his requirements are. Those requirements have been vetted and approved. Again, if he doesn't get the full complement, then he'll have to do some things to mitigate that.

Senator NELSON. General, what do you see will be the remaining force when we are withdrawing, in 2014, from Afghanistan?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I believe that those decisions are still being made by the leadership, with the input of General Dunford and General Mattis. I'm not a part of that process—I don't know what the objectives are that the leadership will want to accomplish. That really drives what the force structure should look like, going forward.

Having been a commander in the field, where I was working hard with the leadership, to define options, and I found it very unhelpful when somebody, who wasn't a part of the process, speculated on what the troop strength should be.

Senator NELSON. In your experience, where you have worked with the indigenous forces and the leadership of a country like Afghanistan, can you give us your observations of the progress of that society, over the course of the last few years? Basically, what I'm getting at is, have the Afghani people progressed to the point that it's going to be very hard for the Taliban to take over, once we leave, and take them back to that feudal society that they were? What's your observation?

General AUSTIN. Sir, first of all, I think that two of the key elements that—or three key elements—that kind of go into this equation, as to whether or not things will remain on track or not, are, number one, do we have a credible security force to help guard against the challenges that will no doubt come in the future? We've worked hard with the Afghans to build a security force of 352,000, in a relatively short period of time, and it's still evolving in capability.

The second thing is that I think the political processes have to mature. I think the people have to begin to have faith in their leadership, and the leadership has to be inclusive, has to reach out to the people, and they have to provide a good governing mechanism for the country. That is critical.

I think the security forces can provide the space for that to develop. It's going to take some time.

The third piece of this is the corruption that we've seen in the country, over time they really have to get control over that and begin to move that in the right direction.

I think, when those things happen—and certainly, they're capable of happening—then—or working together—then I think things will continue to move in the right direction.

Senator NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you to the witnesses and their wonderful wives, for their service to our country. We're very proud to have you serving in such positions of responsibility.

General Austin and General Rodriguez—General Rodriguez, you recently served in Afghanistan, as the commander of the International Joint Command within ISAF. I'll ask you both the same question.

The President has announced 34,000 troops, more than half our force currently serving in Afghanistan, will return home by the end of the year. Was this recommendation of the uniformed military via the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs? Was this a recommendation of the military?

General AUSTIN. Senator, I don't know what the specific recommendation was. As I understand it, the——

Senator MCCAIN. No one has told you or General Rodriguez what the recommendation of the military was?

General AUSTIN. No, sir, I was not a part of that process. I know they——

Senator MCCAIN. So, you are excluded from knowing what the recommendation of the military was?

General AUSTIN. I was not——

Senator MCCAIN. Especially given the new responsibilities you have.

General AUSTIN. No, sir, I was not included in that process.

Senator MCCAIN. Did either of you recommend this option?

General RODRIGUEZ. No, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. In your best professional military advice, is the withdrawal of 34,000 troops this year in line with the conditions on the ground, as you saw them?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I defer to the current commander——

Senator MCCAIN. You really have no opinion whatsoever about whether we should withdraw 34,000, half our force, by the end of the year? Is that correct?

General AUSTIN. Having not been a part of the process, sir, I don't think that I should offer an opinion on this, because I don't know everything that went into their calculus.

Senator MCCAIN. General Rodriguez, you feel the same way?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Even though you recently served there?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir. I've been gone for 18 months, and things have changed tremendously. I can tell you that I was a part of the change in the strategy when we put the surge forward there, that the concept of what we were looking to do, strategically, is continuing. But, as far as the specific situation in the country that warrants those decisions, I am not current in that area, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. So, you wouldn't have any guess as to how many forces you believe are necessary to achieve our goals? You wouldn't have any. Whew.

General Austin, you were our commander in Iraq when the President decided to end negotiations with Iraqis and withdraw all U.S. troops by the end of 2011. Do you think that Iraq is more stable today than it was a year ago?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I'm certainly troubled by some of the things that——

Senator MCCAIN. Do you believe Iraq, today, is more stable than it was a year ago?

General AUSTIN. I think the stability has held, sir. I think it's fragile, and it's trending towards being more problematic, as we watch what's happening with the Kurd-Arab relationships, with the recent Sunni protests. I think a lot of that's brought on by a failure to solve some political issues.

Senator MCCAIN. So, whether we had troops there—a residual force there, or not, wouldn't have mattered?

General AUSTIN. I think that, certainly—if we could have continued to advise and assist the Iraqis, I think, certainly, it would have continued to make them better.

Senator MCCAIN. You were present in the room when Senator Graham and I asked you, after Maliki asked us, what level of troops would we, the United States, want to remain there in order to maintain that stability. Do you remember your answer? You said, "We're still working on that." Do you remember that?

General AUSTIN. Sir.

Senator MCCAIN. How long did they work on that, General Austin?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I think we worked with the Iraqi leadership all the way up until the point in time when they decided that they weren't going to be able to give us the protections that we needed to keep our troops there.

Senator MCCAIN. Because, of course, it was down to 3,500. Isn't that correct?

General AUSTIN. No decision had been made at that point in time, sir, because——

Senator MCCAIN. Wasn't our number back down to 3,500 troops left behind? Isn't that an accurate statement? It's written in Michael Gordon's book, and it's well—knowledge. Isn't that true? You were there.

General AUSTIN. I was, sir. Again, I presented a range of options——

Senator MCCAIN. But, don't you know that the administration position was back down to 3,500? They didn't tell you that?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I was aware of what the number was. I don't recall, specifically, what the final option was, being considered.

Senator MCCAIN. You really don't remember, specifically, an important issue like this, that it wasn't 3,500?

General AUSTIN. Sir, in that range of options—again, since we never closed, I've never——

Senator MCCAIN. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff testified that the number was down to 3,500. General Dempsey did, before this committee. You didn't know that? Even though——

General AUSTIN. Sir—sir——

Senator MCCAIN.—though you were there?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I did know what the number was. And——

Senator MCCAIN. And it was 3,500.

General AUSTIN. It was a small number, yes, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Whew. Which is why—and it's been well documented—these—the Iraqis decided that to try to obtain immunity of over 3,500 troops wasn't worth the effort. You believe Iraq is headed in a positive or negative direction?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I think—again, some of the things that we're seeing in Iraq are very troubling, with the Arab-Kurd tensions, with the Sunni protests. On the other hand——

Senator MCCAIN. Iranian aircraft overflying Iraq with arms for Bashar Assad, for the total estrangement between Barzani and Maliki, continued violence in Kirkuk and other areas along the border, the vice president of Iraq having to flee the country because there's murder charges brought against him. Does that indicate to you that Iraq is headed in the right direction?

General AUSTIN. It does not, sir. There are some things that are very troubling. There are also some things that I think indicate that, if they make the right decisions, they have a chance to move in the right direction. They're pumping 3.3 million barrels of oil a day; they've been challenged, several times, in terms of security, but the security forces have really held, and they're still loyal to the civilian leadership. They haven't fractured. There are a couple of things in there that do indicate that, if they begin to make the right decisions politically, then I think they have a chance of moving in the right direction. But, at this point, they've not made those decisions, and it is troubling.

Senator MCCAIN. General, your predecessor, General Mattis, had a well-deserved reputation of speaking truth to power, and in testifying before this committee in a frank and honest opinion. We have our responsibilities. Our responsibilities can only be carried out if we have frank and honest—as you were just asked if you would do, at the beginning of the hearing—opinions. I'm disappointed by your testimony today, that I have to draw these facts out from you, that you and I both know are facts. I hope the next time you're before this committee, that you will be more forthcoming in your answers. We deserve it. We have our responsibilities, as well as those that you will assume.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to join in thanking both of you for your extraordinarily distinguished career, and your families for their service and sacrifice, as well, and to wish you well in your new commands, the next chapter of your military careers.

General Austin, we had a very informative and important discussion yesterday on the subject of sexual assault, with a number of my colleagues, and a number of yours, and I would like to ask you and General Rodriguez for your commitment that you will pursue, as vigorously and aggressively as possible, the predatory crime, the vicious criminal offense of sexual assault and rape, wherever it occurs under your commands.

General AUSTIN. Sir, you have my commitment, I will do so.

General RODRIGUEZ. I will, sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Let me ask, by the way, have each of you seen the documentary movie "Invisible War"?

General AUSTIN. I have seen it, sir.

General RODRIGUEZ. I have seen it, sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Will you make it your policy and practice that, that movie, among other training aids, is seen by all of the commanders, at whatever level, under your command?

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir. As you may know, sir, in the Army, we have encouraged our leadership to use that as a training tool.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. General Rodriguez?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir, that's correct.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I'd like to ask you for more than just encouragement, but actually make it a matter of your general order, or whatever, however you want to implement within your command, that it be used as a training device.

General AUSTIN. Sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir, it's a requirement.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Let me ask you about—General Austin—focusing on Afghanistan. I recently had the privilege of traveling to Afghanistan with a number of my colleagues, including Senator McCain, who led the trip, and Senator Graham, Senator Ayotte, and others. I want to focus, for the moment, on contracting there.

We understand, from the Special Inspector General in Afghanistan, that 43 contractors, in effect, are doing business with the enemy, but they have not been processed by the Army for suspension and debarment, partly because of obstacles—legal obstacles and others—now in the law of the United States; section 841, in particular.

I'd like your personal commitment, as CENTCOM commander, that you will personally review these cases and use the authority you have to stop U.S. taxpayers' money from being funneled to the Taliban, and that you will help us—Senator Ayotte and I, in particular, are working on this issue—help us to strengthen the law.

General AUSTIN. Sir, you have my commitment.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you. Very aptly, your prepared testimony mentions the importance of "unity of effort"—that's your phrase, and I think it's a good one—on the battlefield. I think it's equally important that we have that unity of effort in stopping American taxpayer money from, in effect, aiding the enemy in Afghanistan, where corruption has been, unfortunately, so rampant.

One of the areas where I think section 841 can be applied more effectively is in the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) and State Department aid. I'd like your commitment that you will help us, in effect, improve the law in that regard.

Thank you. I understand you have made that part of your commitment, that you will help us do that.

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Let me ask you now, General Austin, about Syria. As part of that trip, we visited the refugee camp in northern Jordan, at Zaatari. I must say, very powerful and moving experience, to see the conditions of the camp, the numbers of children, the challenges in providing education, healthcare, basic sanitary conditions. I'd like your commitment that you will do everything possible to provide a drastic and dramatic increase in humanitarian aid to the refugees in Syria and elsewhere, besides Zaatari, but also in Jordan, where there are those refugee camps.

General AUSTIN. Sir, I'll do everything within my power to work with all the appropriate elements of the interagency to ensure that we're doing everything we can to support the refugees.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you. I think a number of us also were impressed by the herculean efforts being made by the King of Jordan, and by the Jordanian people, to aid those refugees. Just an extraordinary humanitarian effort. But also their commitment to aid in military assistance, the freedom fighters in Syria.

Let me ask you, don't you think the United States can provide more training and technical assistance, at the very least—in terms of communications equipment, logistical aid—to the opposition forces in Syria?

General AUSTIN. Sir, not being in the seat yet, my vantage point is that of many people on the outside looking in on this. I don't know the specifics, as many specifics as I'd like to know, about the opposition, and what is in the realm of the possible.

What I'd like to do is, if confirmed, I'd like to have the ability to go in and assess, to see what's possible. If there are things that are possible, what options do we have? I don't feel as if I can give you a very concrete and informed recommendation, at this point.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I hope that you will share the sense of urgency that many of us feel about this situation and about the very dire predicament of many of those courageous fighters who are opposing the murderous and barbaric regime that the Assad Government, if it still is a government, has become. I would invite you—in fact, I'd urge you—to present to this committee your recommendation, as soon as possible, because I think we feel that sense of urgency, and I hope that more can be done, militarily, to deprive Assad of his superiority, where he has it, in the air, and his forces on the ground that he is using, very simply, to slaughter the citizens of his own country.

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My time is expired, but, again, my thanks to each of you for your extraordinary service in the past and in the future, and again, to your families.

Thank you.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank General Austin and General Rodriguez, and their families, for, absolutely, your extraordinary service to our country, and very much appreciate your being here.

I wanted to follow up to what Senator Blumenthal discussed on section 841. As you recall, Senator Brown and I had worked on this no-contracting, or the enemy provision, that has given some authority to DOD to cut off enemy funds. I just want to join what Senator Blumenthal has said, that I look forward to working with him, and look forward to your commitment to make sure that we can give you all the tools that you need, including extending those tools to the State Department to cut off funds that go to our enemies. I appreciate your commitment on that, and look forward to working with Senator Blumenthal and both of you to make sure that happens.

General Austin, I wanted to ask you—when Senator Donnelly had asked—you mentioned you had been through the process before, of deciding what a follow-on force should be. That was in the context of commanding Iraq? Is that right?

General AUSTIN. That's correct, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. When you were the commander in Iraq, what was your recommendation to the administration on the troop levels that should remain, assuming we could negotiate a status of forces agreement?

General AUSTIN. Ma'am, I presented a range of options to the leadership. I provided that recommendation. I've never made public what my recommendations were.

Senator AYOTTE. It was reported, at the time, that your recommendations were between 14,000 to 18,000 troops. Was that accurate?

General AUSTIN. Again, ma'am, I provided that to the President, in confidence, and I have not made that public, and would not like to make that public.

Senator AYOTTE. Let me ask you this, General. The recommendations that you provided, and the number that was ended up, that Senator McCain just asked you, was that number significantly below what you recommended?

General AUSTIN. It was, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay. Thank you.

You have said, in answer to Senator McCain, at this point, you've not been involved in the decisions on the troop withdrawal in Afghanistan, or the follow-on force, following 2014. Is that right?

General AUSTIN. Yes, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. Have you spoken to either General Allen or General Dunford about this topic?

General AUSTIN. Have I spoken with them?

Senator AYOTTE. Have you spoken to them about what their recommendations are?

General AUSTIN. No, ma'am, I have not.

Senator AYOTTE. Senator McCain asked you about the 34,000 withdrawal that the President announced the other day. There was a report in the Washington Post that General Dunford, whom I'm sure you have great respect for, as well as General Allen, that they had been seeking a reduction of no more than 25,000 troops during that same period. That would have been significantly—certainly, the President's recommendation is much higher. Would that surprise you? Have you followed any of the public reporting on this?

General AUSTIN. I have read some of what's in the media. But, my experience, there, ma'am, is that, that's not always accurate, because it doesn't have the complete——

Senator AYOTTE. Let me follow up. Military officials, on background, were saying that, "Pulling out 34,000 leaves us dangerously low on military personnel, while the fledgling Afghan army and police need our support. It's going to send a clear signal that America's commitment to Afghanistan is going wobbly."

I guess I would ask you—I'm actually very surprised, as well, that you've not had conversations, given that you're taking over in CENTCOM, with General Allen or General Dunford about this very important question at this point. But, I would ask you, if we're in a position where the withdrawal puts us in a situation where we're going to be dangerously low on military personnel, I would expect you to come forward to this committee—when asked—and tell us your professional opinion as to what we should be doing. Will you do that?

General AUSTIN. I will do that, ma'am. I would say that there are a number of things that the commander considers as he makes his recommendation: the tasks that he's been presented with, that he has to accomplish; what—his assessment of the environment that he has to work in; any significant transitions—"transitions" meaning things like an election; other things, like maybe the fighting season that he has to go through. All that goes into his calculus to provide a range of options, in terms of recommendations there. As the leadership looks at it, they will consider other things, and I just don't have any idea of what, exactly, went into that specific calculus. So——

Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, I went to a troop deployment, on Sunday, in New Hampshire, of a Guard unit that's going to Khost Province in Afghanistan.

General AUSTIN. Yes, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. One of the worries that I have is that the numbers that are being floated by the administration on the follow-on—don't we get to a point where, if we don't have sufficient numbers there, we have to worry about the protection of our own forces?

General AUSTIN. Yes, ma'am. That clearly is one of the things that commanders must take into consideration, whether or not they'll be able to provide the adequate force protection for their troops as they're conducting operations in the area. Again, depending on what the specific missions are that they'll be asked to do, and how much of it they'll be asked to do, when you factor in force protection and other things, then that really kind of lays out what the commander thinks his requirements are. Again, typically he will present a range of options.

Senator AYOTTE. I understand it, but certainly we need to take into account the protection of our own troops there. If we get to a number that's so low that we can't protect our own troops, I'm going to be very concerned about that, and I expect your professional opinion on that as we go forward on this follow-on.

Just so that everyone understands, why does it matter? Why does a good outcome in Afghanistan matter?

I'd like an answer from both of you on that.

General AUSTIN. Yes, ma'am, thanks. It clearly is important to the region. It's important to the United States of America. We have a lot invested. We'd like to see this country continue to move forward. We'd like to see the political system begin to grow. I think, if the right things happen, it'll stabilize things in the region, and certainly it'll help us with our relationship with Pakistan and some other things.

I think it's important for the region, and it's also clearly important for the country of Afghanistan, important to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and important to the United States of America.

Senator AYOTTE. I know my time's up, but, General Rodriguez, I would like your opinion as to, why does this matter, in terms of the protection of our country, our interests? We've sacrificed so much there, and obviously, I think it's important that we understand, why does the stable Afghanistan, the outcome of that, matter?

General RODRIGUEZ. Stable Afghanistan, ma'am, means that's one of the things that was the objective, so that it never became a haven for al Qaeda and its adherents so they could never attack both the U.S. Homeland, U.S. interests, and our allies worldwide.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you. I'll have followup questions for both of you.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Reed.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Generals, thank you for your service to the Army and to the Nation. I can't think of two more dedicated and experienced officers to lead our forces in the various areas of command you're being assigned.

In fact, General Austin, correct me if I'm wrong—you were a brigadier general in the invasion of Iraq, with the 3rd Infantry Division (ID), you were a major general in Afghanistan, commanding the 10th Mountain Division, you were a three-star in Iraq, in the multinational forces. You are, I think, maybe one of the few combatant commanders that are going to an AOR where you've commanded at every general officer level. Is that correct?

General AUSTIN. That's correct, sir.

Senator REED. I don't think we could find someone better acclimated to the various challenges; and there are quite a few throughout the region.

One of the issues that's been touched upon is Iraq. From your perspective, are the problems there more political in nature or more the military capacity? Because what we've seen has been, I think, a very chaotic political situation—demonstrations, sectarian tensions—but, the Iraqi security forces seem to be performing reasonably well, given the training and the investment we've made. Is that a fair assessment?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I would say from my perspective, that's a fair assessment, that the security forces have done reasonably well.

Senator REED. Going forward, the challenges there seem to be more political than any type of military threat from the outside, or an uncontrollable internal threat. Is that a fair assessment, too?

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Thank you.

One of the key factors and key roles that you play—it's not just making sure our forces are well prepared, well organized, and well deployed—it's communicating, explicitly and implicitly, with leaders in different countries. I can think of several in your AOR. One is Pakistan, and one is Egypt, because of our relationship to the militaries. Do you have any perspective now with respect to your likely engagement with General Kayani in Pakistan and the Egyptian Army?

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir. I look forward to trying to develop a—or, not trying, but developing a good working relationship with General Kayani and the military leadership in Pakistan. I think it's essential to our overall relationship, and I think it will be very helpful in us trying to move forward with what we're doing in Afghanistan.

In Egypt, we have long enjoyed a great military-to-military relationship that's been very helpful to us. We will continue to try to build upon that, going into the future.

Senator REED. Let me ask you another question, and that's with respect to our forces in Afghanistan. As the Vice Chief of Staff of the Army, your current role, it would be highly unusual that you would be participating in the deliberations of strategy, going forward, in Afghanistan or any other area of operation. Is that fair to say?

General AUSTIN. That's correct, sir.

Senator REED. Yes. The planning was done appropriately through CENTCOM, General Mattis, beginning with General Allen and his colleague, going up into the Secretary of Defense's office, not through the Vice Chief's office, to the President for the final decision. That's the way it's done.

General AUSTIN. That's correct, sir.

Senator REED. Your collaboration has been—and it'll increase—certainly increase if you're confirmed; and I have every expectation you will—but, at that point, you will be having an opportunity to work closely with General Dunford and all of the commanders for a period of several months, I believe.

General AUSTIN. That's correct, sir. It will give me an opportunity to engage leadership on the ground, to get a clear understanding, from the staff at CENTCOM and also the Joint Staff, in terms of all of the elements that have gone into this, which is typically a pretty tightly controlled process, and rightfully so.

Senator REED. Right. Thank you very much.

General Rodriguez, again, thank you for your service. You're taking over a region which is our newest unified command, one which is facing a new set of challenges that, 4 or 5 years ago, were not relevant. I think it's appropriately—and fitting—that you're both sitting side by side, because what happens in Egypt has certain effects in your command, and what happens in your command has certain effects throughout General Austin's command. But, can you give us your sense, right now—and again, being the U.S. Army Forces Command commander, you have not, on a day-to-day basis, been engaged in deliberate planning—can you give us your sense of what the threats are in AFRICOM, and how well positioned you believe AFRICOM is?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir.

Sir, the threats in AFRICOM really revolve around three major areas. Of course, one being al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, which is where the French operation, supported by the African nations and the United States, is ongoing. Then also, al Shabaab, over in Somalia, and then Boco Haram. Also the LRA, as discussed earlier here. Those are the major threats to stability, militarily; but, of course, they have significant other ones in both government as well as health issues.

Senator REED. Yes, I think you've touched on something that, again, is a critical issue that cuts across both AORs; that is, governmental capacity, the ability of government to provide basic service, the ability of governments to function, at least to respond to the true needs of their people. One of the issues that we've talked about, General Rodriguez, is that we have had military training operations that have gone in, over the last several years, into African countries, as far as AFRICOM, with mixed results. Do you have any specific ideas about how you would improve the military training teams that will be a major aspect of your operational capacity?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir. If confirmed, I will look at that very, very hard. As General Ham has stated in the past, some of the training has been focused on tactical and technical, and some of the things that we did not emphasize were the values of the army, as well as the role of a military in a democracy. Those are some of the things that he's already started to work on, and I'll watch that very carefully—if confirmed—and assess that, and go forward in the best way possible, sir.

Senator REED. My time is expired, but, again, gentlemen, there are very few people who have served the Army and the Nation with your courage and your distinction and your dedication to the soldiers. For that, I thank you.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Fischer.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you, Senator Kaine.

I, too, would like to thank you, gentlemen, and your families, for your service and dedication to this country. I would also like to thank you, and thank the servicemembers that you represent, and their families, for their service to this country, as well.

If I may, I'd like to continue on that Washington Post article that came out recently. It did suggest that the Pentagon is pushing a plan that would keep only about 8,000 troops in Afghanistan. I know that, General Austin, you weren't a part of the planning process, thus far, but can you support a plan that would schedule withdrawal of troops in advance? We're looking at a withdrawal of troops in Afghanistan, and, according to this article, from about 8,000 down to a thousand, within a very short period of time. I have questions if we can even maintain our mission, let alone complete the mission.

How can you make decisions on troop withdrawal, when, as you stated previously, so much depends upon conditions on the ground, what the government is doing, what their abilities are, up to that point? How would you approach a proposal like that?

General AUSTIN. I certainly would, first, really work hard to make sure I fully understood what the leadership wanted to get done, moving into the future. Certainly, my advice, as a commander on the ground or Commander of CENTCOM, I would provide my advice to them, based upon where I think the security forces are, and conditions in theater, and what I think we needed to do to move forward, to make sure we maintain the gains that we've achieved.

But, I think so much is tied to what it is, what policy objectives that the leadership wants to accomplish. Based upon that, I would outline the forces required. I would consider the fact that there's a NATO complement to whatever forces we're going to have. Again, it really depends on what level that we're advising and assisting the Afghan security forces at. Then, how I assess that we need to do that.

If I'm confirmed, as I go in, those are things that I will work with General Dunford on, look at very closely, early on. I know that the leadership is still in the process of making the decisions on what it's going to look like, post-2014.

Senator FISCHER. Do you think it's useful to put those numbers out there so far in advance? Is there a military reason it's useful to put those numbers out there?

General AUSTIN. I do know that we're a part of a coalition effort. I do know that—members of the coalition are trying to determine what their commitment's going to be, going forward. They would like—my guess is that they would like as much predictability as possible.

Senator FISCHER. I appreciated Senator Reed's question that he asked General Rodriguez. How would you prioritize, General Austin, the threats in your future command? What do you see those as being?

General AUSTIN. It's a very complex and dynamic region, volatile region. We see a number of things that are kind of working together to fuel that instability. You see sectarian strife in a number of places. You see governments, that are former autocratic governments, that are either failed or failing, creating further instability. The instability is an issue there.

Again, we are certainly concerned about the Iranian aggression in the region, which adds to the complexity there. Of course, there's specific issues of Syria and the continuing work that we have to do in Afghanistan, as well. A number of things that have to be added together.

Also, there is a persistent threat from elements, like al Qaeda and al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, that have the ability to generate a threat to the Homeland. That is very, very important.

Senator FISCHER. Are we going to be able to meet those, with the troops that are projected to be there? Are we going to accomplish our mission? We've had so many families, in this country, sacrifice. Is it going to be worth it to them? I know you do this every day—how do you look at families and say to them, "We're going to pull out, maybe at levels that I think might be dangerously low, as I'm getting information on this"? How are you able to do that? When do we reach a hollow force, where the men and women that we send into harm's way are no longer protected?

General AUSTIN. We're going to do everything that—the leadership will continue to do everything that we can within our power to make sure that, when our troops are introduced into a dangerous situation, or into combat, that they are ready. Whatever we have to do to prioritize resources to make sure that we support the folks that are doing the hard work of the country, we're going to continue to do that. Again, the Services have been clear about the fact that they're going to support our troops that are in combat.

As we look at the shrinking top-line budgets here—the shrinking top line of the budget—it's going to make it more challenging for us to have forces that are ready to address emerging contingencies. That's my concern, going into the future.

Senator FISCHER. I would ask both of you gentlemen for your commitment to this committee, and to me, that you will always be honest and let us know that.

General AUSTIN. You have my commitment.

General RODRIGUEZ. You have my commitment.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you so much. Again, thank you for your patriotism, your dedication, and your service to us.

Thank you.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

Generals Austin and Rodriguez, welcome. I echo the comments made by my colleagues, of appreciation for your service, your stellar credentials.

I'm given additional confidence by the fact that you've worked so closely together in the past, because I think the CENTCOM/AFRICOM real estate and challenges have an awful lot of overlap, and that should give us confidence, as well.

Just to mix things up, I think I'll start with General Rodriguez, a few questions.

AFRICOM has an unusual mission. As I understand from our discussion, your deputy commander is a State Department official, and it is a mission that is heavily focused on partnerships with other agencies, and with the training mission with other governments. I'd like you, just for a minute, to talk about that unusual nature of the mission, and your own background. How it fits you to work in that kind of a very multilateral environment.

General RODRIGUEZ. Thank you, Senator.

As you said, the headquarters was designed a little bit differently than most of the other combatant commands, and has more interagency people assigned to the headquarters. I think all that is a great benefit to the organization, who stretches and reaches across the interagency in an effort that's required to be done that way in that interagency effort.

In the "building partner capacity" piece, all of our operations are really just like the ones that General Austin is talking about—is about helping to build the capacity of that nation to protect itself and provide stability for itself. We have worked very hard over the years, and we both have significant experience trying to build the Iraqi security forces, as well as the Afghan security forces to do it themselves, and also to work with our multinational partners to also ensure that they're part of the solution, both in our NATO allies and allies throughout the world, as well as the host-nation countries.

I look forward, if confirmed, to try to continue that effort to help Africans prepare themselves to take care of themselves.

Senator KAINE. General Rodriguez, some of the most challenging attacks on American embassies in our history have occurred in the AFRICOM footprint. I've been to two hearings, now, on the Benghazi attack—one, a Foreign Relations Committee hearing, and one a hearing of this committee—and still have some confusion about security that's provided to our diplomatic personnel around the world.

In the Benghazi situation, we were dealing with military security through the Marine security guards; we were dealing with State Department security—State Department personnel—but, also, two local militias—one unarmed, one that was apparently on some sort of strike or work slowdown because of a dispute over wages and benefits. I'd just like to hear you talk about the embassy security—recognizing that State takes lead on that—but, the embassy security challenges in AFRICOM, and how you would approach them, as the commander.

General RODRIGUEZ. Thank you, Senator. The challenges, as you state and we discussed earlier, were about the time-and-distance factors. If confirmed, I will work very closely with Department of State, who has the primary responsibility, as you've stated, to understand and have the best situational understanding that we can have, so we have threats and warnings, so that we understand the ones who are most threatened, so that we can respond appropriately.

We also have to prioritize our collection assets for the things that we don't know, it's a joint and interagency, as well as multinational, process to get the best situational understanding we can.

The second thing is, of course, in collaboration with the State Department, to make sure that the State Department understands our responsiveness and what we can do, so that they can make the best decisions and recommendations to the leadership.

Lastly, the response forces have already increased, in the aftermath of the Benghazi attack, and some of the lessons that were learned. There is now a new Commanders in Extremis Force that is forward-stationed, and we have more forces forward-stationed, as well as a special Marine Air-Ground Task Force that is also in Djibouti right now. In another month, there'll be a regionally aligned force from the Army who is allocated to AFRICOM to help with these challenges.

Senator KAINE. Great.

General RODRIGUEZ. Thank you, Senator.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, General.

General Austin, to return to a point that we've talked about briefly, in your advance policy questions, you stated that maintaining a credible naval force in the region, covered by sufficient aviation combat power, is essential to demonstrating an enduring commitment to regional partners. We've had discussion on this committee, just this week, about the aftermath of the decision of the deferred deployment to the USS Truman. Just focusing on that and the sequester, from your perspective as you prepare to take command of CENTCOM, what is the impact of a reduced naval presence in the region? Will it complicate your ability to carry out your mission?

General AUSTIN. I think it will, sir. I think, certainly, again, those forces have been outlined by General Mattis as what he needs to accomplish the goals and objectives that he's laid out. That's been supported by the Joint Chiefs, and resourced by the Office of Secretary of Defense. This has gone through a pretty deliberate process to allocate those resources and forces.

When he doesn't have those available, or when a commander doesn't have them available, then, again, it really begins to take away his flexibility to address emerging situations. Once you reduce the presence in the region, you could very well signal the wrong things to our adversaries. We'll want the commander—and I'll certainly want to have, if I'm confirmed—to have as many options available as possible to address the current situation and any emerging situations or crisis.

Senator KAINE. Let me ask you this. The "send the wrong message to allies or adversaries," what about the message that it sends, just from your own experience, inside the organization, as you deal with your officers and enlisted? What's the buzz as they continually watch Congress run up against one kind of fiscal crisis after the next, that gives no certainty to the military about its resource capacity?

General AUSTIN. It certainly can be disheartening, sir, if we kind of know we have things that we're trying to accomplish, we know that we need resources, and it's difficult to get those resources. Having said that, it's the spirit of our military to try to find a way to be successful. But, we want to make sure that, if at all possible, we're resourcing them with the adequate things—with the things that they need to be successful.

Senator KAINE. Thank you very much, to both of you.

Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I understand we're going to have two rounds, if you could just let me know when 7 minutes is up, I have a few more questions. I'll try not to hold everybody up.

Senator KAINE. Great. We'll move right into a second round as soon as you're finished if no one else comes.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Thank you very much.

This is one of the most important hearings we've had in, probably, a very long time. That's saying a lot, given the hearings we've had in recent time.

Both of you, thank you for your service. I know you well, appreciate your families. You're fine men.

General Austin, here's my dilemma. I'm not so sure—and I may be wrong—that you cannot tell us what you recommended about troop levels. I don't know if that's an executive privilege, or not. I'll have to think about that. I don't know if you have the right to do that, quite frankly.

I know what you told me. You told me, on the tarmac in Baghdad, that we needed somewhere between 18,000 and 20,000. I said, "That may be more than the market can bear." You said, "Well, look at the numbers." I know what your recommendations were; it was somewhere in the mid-15,000 to 16,000. I think the bottom line, for most people, was 10,000. I have an exchange between me and General Dempsey about how the numbers went from 19,000, I think, all the way down to 5,000, and eventually to 0.

I'd like to put in the record the exchange I had with Chairman Dempsey about the ever-changing numbers in Iraq.

HEARING TO RECEIVE TESTIMONY ON SECURITY ISSUES RELATING TO IRAQ

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2011, U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES, WASHINGTON, DC.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you both for testifying. This is a very important issue for the country, and I think we have had a good discussion.

Number one, I completely concur with the idea that American troops should not be left behind in Iraq without legal protections. It is not fair to them. To say that the Iraqi legal system is mature is being gracious. If an American soldier were accused of rape anywhere in Iraq, I do not think they would get a fair trial. So at the end of the day, Iraq has a long way to go on the legal side and I think a long way to go on other sides.

My concern is that I have never bought into the idea that the impasse was getting the parliament to approve an immunity agreement. I will just give you one vignette. I went over with Senator McCain and Senator Lieberman in May to talk to the prime minister about a follow-on force, and I was discussing with him that no American politician, Republican or Democrat, would accept a follow-on force without legal protections. As we were talking about it, he says, well, how many people are you talking about? What is your number? I turned to Ambassador Jeffrey and General Austin and said you have not given them numbers. He says, no, we are still working on that. That is in May.

So let us get into this, General Dempsey. 16, 10, 5, cascading. Is it your testimony that we were proposing 16,000 to the Iraqis and they said no? Then we came back with 10,000 and they said no. Then we came back 5,000 and they said no. Then it got to be zero.

General DEMPSEY. No, that is not what I testified to.

Senator GRAHAM. What caused the cascading effect? General Austin told me—and I will just tell you now because it is so important—he thought we needed 19,000. and I said, Lloyd, that is probably going to be more than the market can bear. I said that because I am concerned about American politics too.

Then the numbers were around 15 to 16. Then we started about 10. It came to 10, and nobody got below 10. So I know what General Austin had on his mind.

At the end of the day, General Dempsey, you are right. It is about the missions you want that determines the numbers. We have got through it pretty well. Iraq does not have the intel capacity we do. We need to make sure they have better intelligence. They do not have an air force. We need embedders. We need trainers. We need CT. we need to referee the Kurd-Arab dispute. I think 10 or 12 is what you need. At the end of the day, we are down to zero.

I guess my question is, is Iran comfortable with a democracy on their border in Iraq, Secretary Panetta?

Secretary PANETTA. I think they are very nervous about having a democracy on their border.

Senator GRAHAM. Let me tell you what the speaker of the Iraqi parliament, a Sunni, Mr. Najaf, said. Iraq now suffers from points of weakness. If neighboring countries see that Iraq is weak and incapable of protecting its border and internal security, then definitely there will be interference. This interference does not exist now. He was talking about how Iran would step up their efforts to destabilize Iraq if we all left.

Do you agree that is a more likely scenario? They are doing it now. They are only going to do it more if we do not have anybody there.

Secretary PANETTA. I think there will be a continuing threat. I think that the reality is that the Iraqis do not want to have Iran exert that kind of influence in their country.

Senator GRAHAM. Now, if the Sunni speaker of the parliament is worried about that, is there any doubt the Kurds want us there? If it were up to the Kurds, there would be 50,000 American troops in Kurdistan. Do you agree with that?

Secretary PANETTA. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. So we know the Sunnis are worried about this, and we know the Kurds would have 50,000 if we would agree to put them there. I would not agree to that, but they are very welcoming of U.S. troops. So I am getting a little bit concerned that all the blame on the Iraqi political system is maybe not quite fair.

Secretary Panetta, you were a politician in another life. Would it be a political problem for President Obama to announce this year that we are going to keep 15,000 people in Iraq past 2012? Did that ever get considered in this administration? Did anybody ever talk about the numbers changing because the Democratic base would be upset if the President broke his campaign promise?

Secretary PANETTA. Not in any discussions that I participated in.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you think it ever happened anywhere? Do you think anybody in the White House ever wondered about the political effect of having troops in Iraq on the 2012 election? You talk openly about the Iraqis having political problems. You do not think there are any politics going on on our side?

Let me ask you about Afghanistan, General Dempsey. Did any commander recommend that all of the surge forces be pulled out by September 2012?

General DEMPSEY. I honestly do not know, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Well, let me tell you. The testimony is clear. No option was presented to the President in July to recover all surge forces by September 2012, and you put General Allen in a terrible spot—the administration has. I think it is no accident that the troops are coming home 2 months before this election in Afghanistan, and if you believe that to be true, as I do, I do not think it is an accident that we got to zero.

Now, at the end of the day, we are at zero. Do you think the people in Camp Ashraf are going to get killed? What is going to happen to them?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, the State Department is leading an effort to ensure that we work with the Iraqi——

Senator GRAHAM. Can you tell the people back here that the likelihood of their friends and family being killed is going up greatly if there are no American forces up there policing that problem?

General DEMPSEY. I will not say anything to those people because I am not involved in the outcome.

Senator GRAHAM. Fair enough.

I asked Admiral Mullen, your predecessor, what is the risk of an Arab-Kurdish conflict over the oil reserves around Kirkuk in terms of a conflict if we are not present. He said it was high. Do you agree with that?

General DEMPSEY. I might have said moderate because of my own personal contacts with both the Kurds and the Iraqis.

Senator GRAHAM. So you believe that there is a moderate risk, not a high risk, if there are no U.S. Forces policing the Kurd-Arab borderline disputes and the Kirkuk issue.

General DEMPSEY. I do. I would like to take some time to articulate why I believe that, but if you would like me to take that for the record, I would be happy to do so.

Senator GRAHAM. I would.

Now, do you believe it is smart for the United States not to have counterterrorism forces? Is it in our national security interest not to have any counterterrorism forces in Iraq?

General DEMPSEY. It is in our national security interest to continue pressure on al Qaeda wherever we find them either by ourselves or through partners.

Senator GRAHAM. But do you think the counterterrorism problem in Iraq is over?

General DEMPSEY. I do not.

Senator GRAHAM. Secretary Panetta, you have been great about this. You said there are a thousand al Qaeda in Iraq, and I know in your old job that you are very worried that they are going to reconstitute. So will you do the best you can to convince the Iraqis—and I tell you what. I am willing to get on a plane and go back myself—that they would benefit from counterterrorism partnership with the United States?

Secretary PANETTA. I have made that clear time and time again.

Senator GRAHAM. They just tell you they are not concerned about that.

Secretary PANETTA. What they tell me is that they are concerned about that. They obviously have their forces that are dealing with that.

Senator GRAHAM. Is it your testimony the Iraqis would not have 3,000 U.S. Forces? They do not want any U.S. Forces at all. They are not willing to expend the political capital to get this agreement done because they just do not see a need for U.S. Forces. Is that the Iraqi position that they have come to the point in their political military life that they just do not need us at all?

Secretary PANETTA. I think the problem was that it was very difficult to try to find out exactly—when you say the Iraqi position, what exactly the Iraqi position was at that point.

Senator GRAHAM. What is the Kurdish position in Iraq about U.S. Forces?

Secretary PANETTA. Well, I do not think there is any question they would like to——

Senator GRAHAM. So what is the Sunni speaker of the parliament's position about U.S. Forces?

Secretary PANETTA. I think the same.

Senator GRAHAM. Well, when I was with Prime Minister Maliki in May, the next day he announced that he would accept a follow-on force if other parties would agree. So how did this fall apart?

Secretary PANETTA. I heard the same statements and read the same statements. But the problem is in the negotiations that involved the Ambassador, that involved General Austin, in those discussions they never came to the point where they said we want this many troops here.

Senator GRAHAM. Well, I can tell you—and I have taken my time. I can tell you in May they had no number given to them by us. They were in the dark as late as May about what we were willing to commit to Iraq. So this is a curious outcome when you got Sunnis and Kurds on the record and the prime minister of Iraq saying he would accept a follow-on force if the others agreed. I do not know who does the negotiation for the United States, but if I had three people saying those things, I thought I could get it over the finish line. But we are where we are.

Thank you for your service.

Senator GRAHAM. The point, Mr. Chairman, was that the Iraqis were not saying, "18,000 too many, 15,000 was too many." That wasn't the exchange.

Did Prime Minister Maliki tell you that he thought 18,000 were too many?

General AUSTIN. No, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. So, this was coming from the White House; this is what Chairman Dempsey said, that the numbers were cascading down, were not because the commanders were saying, "I overshot." It's because the political people were saying, "That's too many," and you kept coming down and down; and at 10,000, I think, you finally said, "That's the lowest I can go." The cascading effect of the numbers being reduced were not the Iraqis saying, "We can't have all that many troops," it was that our own White House—and they have every right to do this, by the way—was saying, "We just don't agree with the commander's recommendation."

Do you remember that exchange between me and Prime Minister Maliki, in May, when we were over there, in 2011?

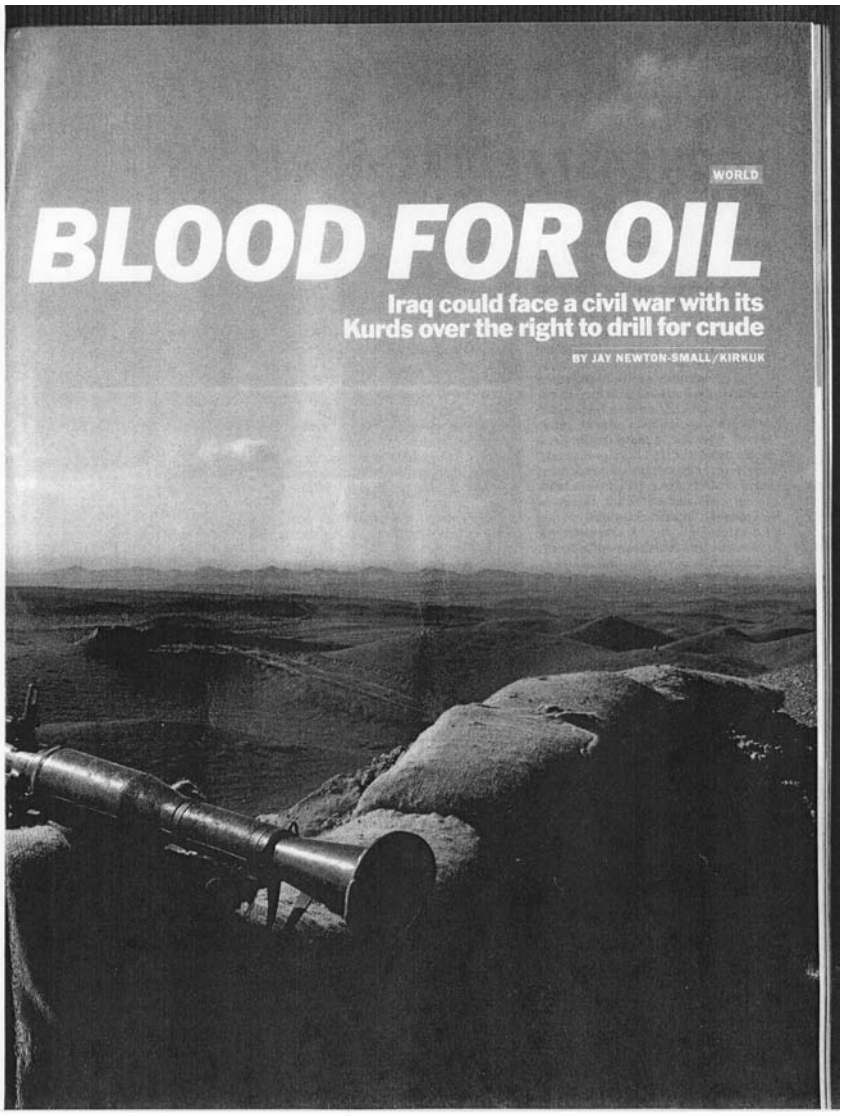
General AUSTIN. I do, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. He turned to me and says, "Well, how many troops are"—cause we were asked to go to Iraq—myself, Senator Lieberman, and Senator McCain—by Secretary Clinton, to see if we could push the Iraqis to make sure we had legal protections for our troops. I'm with the President on this; I wouldn't have one troop in Afghanistan or Iraq without a status of forces agreement, that he was absolutely right to insist on that. But, when Prime Minister Maliki said, "How many are you going to recommend?" I turned to you and Ambassador Jeffrey, and you said, I believe, "We're still working on that." Do you recall that conversation?

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir, I do.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

I was a bit astonished, because it's not that General Austin didn't know what he needed, it's just nobody would tell him what they were going to approve.



I just want people to be clear that General Austin always had a firm view that we needed—18,000 to 20,000 is what he first said, and I said, "General Austin, that may be more than the political market can bear," because I'm not insensitive to the fatigue back here at home. So, you kept putting pen to paper. I know very well that you were making the best recommendations you could.

My problem is not with you, General Austin. You put the numbers to paper, and, at the end of the day, we have none.

I just want to put into the record a load of articles about Iraq: "Blood for Oil," "Iraq's Return to Bloodshed," "Why Kurds Versus Arabs Could Be Iraq's Next Civil War," "Be Warned, Americans' Withdrawal From Iraq Heralds a World of Instability." I'd like permission to put all these articles into the record.

Senator KAINE. Without objection, they'll go into the record.

WORLD
BLOOD FOR OIL
Iraq could face a civil war with its Kurds over the right to drill for crude
BY JAY NEWTON-SMALL/KIRKUK

LOOK EAST FROM THE KURDISH TRENCHES

on a dusty ridge outside the northern Iraqi city of Kirkuk and you can see the cause of it all: a rudimentary oil field where water wells are being sunk and sites are being cleared for drilling.

Now look south into the valley below the Kurdish positions and you can see two Iraqi army units poised to make sure that drilling never begins.

Since November, a crisis of oil, money and history has been building in the semiautonomous northern Iraqi region of Kurdistan. Some 30,000 Kurdish soldiers face just as many regular Iraqi army troops, setting the stage for a civil war in a country that has already endured more than its share. Under these lands lie an estimated 66 billion barrels of oil, enough to shift the global market for crude and alter Iraq's economic fortunes—provided the resource doesn't tear apart the country first.

Both armies arrived in Kirkuk at the end of November after a gas-station shoot-out nearby between Iraqi police and Kurdish troops left one dead and both sides furious. The forces have been tripping over each other since, in patrols through the divided city of Kirkuk and throughout the surrounding disputed territory, which is a bit larger than Kuwait. The situation has become tense for both sides. "I'm going to fight them," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki warned his staff and allies in December. "I will use force to prevent them from working in the disputed area." With the two armies mustered in such close proximity, war may not wait; a suicide bomber killed at least 36 people and wounded more than 100 at a Kirkuk police station on Feb. 3. "Accidents happen," says Harry Schute, a former U.S. Army colonel who led U.S. forces into Kurdistan in 2003 and returned in his retirement to advise the Kurdish government on security issues. "This could blow up to be a war that no one wants."

Civil Affair

THE TINDERBOX HAS BEEN YEARS IN the making. Kurds—a nomadic Indo-European ethnic group spread across parts of Turkey, Syria, Iran and Iraq—have sought an independent state since 1920, with limited success. But Kurds in northern Iraq were largely able to govern themselves from 1991 to 2003 in Iraq and had little or no contact with Baghdad. Only after the fall of Saddam Hussein, however, did the Iraqi Kurds begin to flex their muscles on energy policy, claiming the right to sign deals with foreign oil companies and drill on lands they historically claimed. When the Kurdistan Regional Government opened up to drilling in 2004 it sweetened the offer by allowing foreign oil companies to keep far more of the profits than the post-Saddam government was offering from oil fields in southern Iraq. Baghdad in 2011 threatened to cancel all its contracts with companies drilling elsewhere in the country if they signed up with the Kurds, but that didn't deter more than 50 multinationals from making deals with the north, including majors like ExxonMobil, Chevron, Total and Gazprom. "U.S. firms want to be able to work anywhere in Iraq and base their business decisions on which province or region is the most attractive for investors," says Hussain Qaragholi, president of the U.S. Business Council in Iraq, whose board includes ExxonMobil and Chevron.

Of course, oil isn't worth much unless you can ship it to the people who want to buy it, and Iraqi Kurdistan is landlocked. So last month the Kurds struck a provisional deal with neighboring Turkey to build a pipeline to carry any oil drilled on Kurdish lands—or even disputed territory—out of Iraq. There's just one problem: under the new Iraqi constitution, Baghdad controls all oil exports. And without a pipeline to move the crude to market, drilling in Kurdistan makes little sense. The result is an increasingly nasty standoff that's brought to the surface deep divisions between the Kurds and Baghdad.

The Iraqi government has threatened to forcibly halt any Kurdish exports of oil by truck—about 70,000 barrels a day head out by road to Turkey—and to stop the pipeline's construction, which is scheduled to begin later this year. Last May, al-Maliki sent President Obama a letter asking him to persuade ExxonMobil to either abandon or slow down its Kurdish activity. The appeal had little effect; Obama informed al-Maliki that he has no control over private companies, though the White House warned all U.S. oil firms working in Iraq that signing contracts without the approval of Baghdad exposed them to international legal risks.

The company with the most at stake is ExxonMobil, the first oil major to sign on with the Kurds in 2011. It is the only company to own contracts—three of its six Kurdish parcels—in the disputed territory. The company began exploratory work on one of those disputed plots early this year, and ExxonMobil representatives arrived in Baghdad in January to try to negotiate a peaceful solution. Those talks are ongoing. For ExxonMobil and the other oil majors, the political risk of taking sides in a civil dispute is balanced by major potential rewards. Some of the best oil fields in all of Iraq happen to be in territory that's under dispute. A 2012 International Energy Agency report predicted that with the right investment, Iraq as a whole could double oil production to 6.1 million barrels a day by 2020 and raise it to 8.3 million barrels by 2030, making it the single biggest contributor to global oil-supply growth.

But that can happen only if Baghdad and the Kurds can reconcile their differences, and by late November, it became clear just how dire the dispute

A separate people From top: tankers are lined up to export oil; young Kurdish men smoke shisha in Erbil; a Kurdish family rides a gondola high over the city was. An estimated 60,000 Kurdish and Iraqi troops marched to Kirkuk, taking up positions across the disputed territory. On Dec. 19, the peshmerga, as the Kurdish troops are called, fired on an Iraqi helicopter. The disputed region has been hit by a wave of sectarian bombings in the past month that have killed more than 90 people and injured more than 500—violence that alarmed State Department officials. Administration officials, including U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Robert Beecroft, have stepped in to try negotiating a settlement, but no timeline has yet been set for troops to withdraw. On top of everything else, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd and an experienced peacemaker, has been incapacitated since suffering a stroke on Dec. 17.

Battle Lines

DESPITE THE DRAMA, WAR SHOULD STILL be avoidable, in part because peace would be a lot more profitable. Until they can start exporting their oil in bulk, the Kurds remain reliant on Baghdad for revenue. When the new Iraqi government was formed, the Kurds were given 17% of all oil revenue annually, which today accounts for nearly all the Kurdistan Regional Government's budget. Turkey, thirsty for oil and concerned with its own Kurdish population, prefers to maintain the peace. For its part, Baghdad has its hands full with an outbreak of Sunni violence in recent weeks spilling over from neighboring Syria, including mass protests and a bombing of Shi'ite pilgrims after al-Maliki moved against his Sunni Finance Minister Rafia al-Issawi.

Still, nerves are so tense that even a minor blunder could spark a war that neither side really desires. Back in Kirkuk, a Kurdish soldier named Weli Abdulla stands on that dusty ridge looking down through the row of machine guns and rocket-propelled-grenade launchers aimed at his fellow Iraqis below. In between the weapons someone has propped a solitary rose and a tiny Kurdish flag. "We do not want to fight," he says, grasping the rifle slung diagonally across his chest and glaring down the hill. "But if we have to fight, we will defeat the Iraqi army." There will be oil—or there will be blood. ■

Iraq's return to bloodshed

By Kimberly Kagan and Frederick W. Kagan, Published: February 8

Kimberly Kagan is president of the Institute for the Study of War. Frederick W. Kagan is director of the Critical Threats Project and a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Eighteen days of protests in Egypt in 2011 electrified the world. But more than twice that many days of protest in Iraq have gone almost unnoticed in the United States. Iraqi army troops killed five Sunni protesters in Fallujah on Jan. 25, after a month of anti-government protests in Anbar, Nineveh and Salahuddin provinces and elsewhere for which thousands turned out. Al-Qaeda in Iraq and Iranian-backed Shiite militias are re-mobilizing. Iraq teeters on the brink of renewed insurgency and, potentially, civil war.

This crisis matters for America. U.S. vital interests that have been undermined over the past year include preventing Iraq from becoming a haven for al-Qaeda and destabilizing the region by becoming a security vacuum or a dictatorship that inflames sectarian civil war; containing Iranian influence in the region; and ensuring the free flow of oil to the global market.

While tensions have risen over the past two years, the triggers for recent eruptions are clear. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, had the bodyguards of Finance Minister Rafie al-Issawi, who is Sunni, arrested for alleged terrorist activities on Dec. 20 — almost exactly one year after he ordered the arrest of Sunni Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi's security detail. Hashimi fled to Turkey and is unlikely to return soon to Iraq, where he was sentenced to death after Maliki demanded his trial in absentia for murder and financing terrorism.

The threat to Issawi, a moderate technocrat from Anbar, galvanized Iraqi Sunnis, who rightly saw Maliki's move as sectarian and an assault on government participation by Sunnis not under the prime minister's thumb. Three days after the arrests, demonstrations broke out in Ramadi, Fallujah and Samarra. Three days after that, a large protest closed the highway from Baghdad to Syria and Jordan. The popular resistance spread to Mosul on Dec. 27.

These protests erupted during a constitutional crisis and as an expanding Arab-Kurd conflict has become increasingly militarized. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was incapacitated by a stroke on Dec. 17 and has been out of the countryfor treatment. Iraq's constitution specifies a line of succession — but with one vice president in exile and the other a Shiite and obvious Maliki proxy, Iraq has been, in effect, operating without a president. Political processes that require presidential involvement have been paralyzed, including moving forward with long-standing efforts by Sunnis and Kurds to hold a parliamentary vote of no-confidence in Maliki.

Talabani had been the critical link holding Baghdad and Kurdistan together since tensions rose following a 10-day standoff between Iraqi army units and Kurdish pesh merga troops in October, after Maliki sent the army toward the disputed city of Kirkuk. That move followed a series of skirmishes and mobilizations along the "Green Line" separating Kurdistan from Arab Iraq and a series of attacks in the area by al-Qaeda in Iraq.

The recent protests underscore the collapse of the inclusive political accommodation reached in 2007, which had been reconfirmed by the formation of a grand Sunni-Shiite-Kurd coalition government after parliamentary elections in 2010. By November 2012, Maliki had evolved to openly discussing his intention to form a "majoritarian government" that would exclude the most important Sunni representatives. In mid-December he participated in creating a Shiite grand alliance as the launching pad for that government. The principal Sunni political leaders, including Issawi, parliamentary speaker Osama al-Nujaifiand Anbari tribal leader Ahmed abu Rishaannounced their intention to form their own coalition. In short, Iraqi politics was re-fragmenting along sectarian and ethnic lines even before the protests began.

Understood in this context, the Iraqi army's killing of protesters in Fallujah last month is a watershed event similar to the destruction of the Askariya shrine in Samarra in February 2006, though the crisis will not escalate as quickly. Sunni-Shiite tensions have hitherto played out in political forums. The key actors in today's crisis are not the Sunni political leaders but, rather, Anbari tribal leaders, including Ali Hatem Ali Suleiman, one of the most powerful leaders of Iraq's largest Sunni tribe. Suleiman and fellow leaders of the Dulaim tribe were essential to engineering the Anbar Awakening in 2007 and Sunni participation in the government, for which they rejected al-Qaeda in Iraq and renounced violence against the state. They responded to the killings of protesters last month by threatening open war against the state for the first time since 2007. So far at least, they have restrained protesters and resisted violent confrontation.

For his part, Maliki has sought to deescalate the conflict and to mollify protesters. Tehran has also been working — to persuade Iraq's Sadrists, whom Maliki has alienated in his consolidation of power, to abandon their support for their Sunni brethren. Their combined efforts appear to be working: The Sadrist Bloc, which had refused Maliki's request for suggestions to replace Issawi and other Sunni politicians, has put forth a substitute finance minister.

These efforts, ostensibly toward political resolution, actually increase the likelihood of sectarian war by continuing the marginalization of Sunni political leaders without addressing Sunni tribes' core grievances — and by re-creating a Shiite front that had splintered.

Al-Qaeda in Iraq has already taken advantage of this situation through its front group, the Islamic State of Iraq, which deployed combat teams in Fallujah last month that targeted Iraqi army positions and killed several soldiers. The jihadists' black flags have appeared at Sunni protests and memorial ceremonies for the fallen. The group is back in the havens it held in 2006. If Maliki does not allow proper Sunni representation in government, al-Qaeda will gain greater popular tolerance and foreign support.

Over the past year, the situation in Iraq has become explosive while sectarian sentiment and armed violence in neighboring nations have escalated dramatically. Americans have become accustomed to watching Iraq approach the precipice and draw back. But circumstances have changed with the withdrawal of all U.S. forces and Maliki's year-long efforts to intimidate his opponents through political, judicial and military maneuvers. If Maliki does not accept many of the protesters' reasonable demands and allow meaningful Sunni participation in government, prospects for stopping Iraq's descent into sectarian conflict are grim.

Why Kurds vs. Arabs Could Be Iraq's Next Civil War

By Andrew Lee Butters

With a projected capacity of about 40,000 bbl. a day, the new oil refinery inaugurated on July 18 by the Kurdish regional government of northern Iraq is modest even by the standards of Iraq's dilapidated oil industry. But its significance shouldn't be underestimated: in Kurdish minds, the region's ability to refine the oil it pumps is a vital step toward deepening its autonomy from the Arab-majority remainder of Iraq. (Read "The Reasons Behind Big Oil Declining Iraq's Riches.")

Until recently, Iraqi Kurdistan had no refineries of its own, and though the area is sitting on a huge pool of oil, it had to rely on gasoline supplies from elsewhere in Iraq, Turkey or Iran. Fearful of giving Iraq's ethnic Kurdish minority any control over the country's most precious resource, Saddam Hussein had not only declined to build refineries in the region; he made sure Iraq's oil pipelines bypassed Kurdish areas, and his army forcibly removed much of the Kurdish population from Kirkuk — the most important oil-producing area in the north — and repopulated the city with Arabs from the south.(Watch a video about the gas shortage in Iraq.)

Since Saddam's demise, however, the autonomous Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) is steadily developing an independent oil industry in northern Iraq. It has discovered and begun to develop new oil fields inside its boundaries, and has entered production-sharing deals with foreign oil companies that were made without the consent of the federal government in Baghdad. Those deals have raised suspicions among Iraq's Arab-dominated government that KRG is not simply taking on more of the prerogatives of sovereign statehood but is actually laying the economic infrastructure for independence.

For their part, Kurdish officials suspect that Baghdad's failure to pass a national oil law (which would give Iraq's provincial governments greater control over the industry in their territory) and its failure to press ahead with a referendum to settle Kurdish claims to Kirkuk and other disputed areas are signs that the Arab majority plans to settle matters in its favor.(Read "The U.S. Military: Mediating Between Kurds and Arabs.")

Such is the enmity, in fact, that KRG's president, Massoud Barzani, and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki haven't spoken in over a year. Recently, KRG Prime Minister Nechirwan Barzani said that Arab-

Kurdish relations in Iraq are at their lowest point since Saddam was in power. With Iraq's Sunni-Shi'ite sectarian violence largely in check, the Kurdish-Arab dispute has become the most worrisome fault line in Iraq.

Ever since the U.S. invasion, the Kurds of northern Iraq have enjoyed many of the trappings of sovereignty. Kurds have their own parliament and executive government, plus an 80,000-strong army (the Pesh Merga militia) and control over their borders, which Baghdad-controlled security forces are not allowed to enter. Despite the fact that the vast majority of Kurds want independence from Iraq, their leaders have proceeded with caution, mindful of the risks. Their small, landlocked region is surrounded by neighbors — Turkey, Syria, Iran — whose own restive Kurdish minorities make them hostile to the prospect of an independent Kurdish state emerging in Iraq. (See why Arab-Kurd animosity threatens Iraq's fragile peace.)

While the rest of Iraq was in the grip of insurgency and sectarian civil war, the Kurds quietly advanced their economic-development policies, building an international airport, business hotels and hydro-electric dams and — most important — doing oil deals. They explained this autonomous engagement with international oil markets on the grounds that they couldn't wait for the barely functional Iraqi state to get its house in order. Indeed, such is the dismal state of Iraq's oil production (not yet back at pre-invasion levels, which were a fraction of its full potential) that in June, the Iraqi government allowed the Kurds to begin pumping oil extracted from newly developed Kurdish oil fields through federal pipelines for export sale to Turkey. (Currently, only Iraqi government companies can sell oil, the revenue from which is shared among the regions.)

Kurds have also grown impatient with Baghdad's stance on disputed territories. According to the Iraqi constitntion, the central government should hold a referendum in the Kurdish-populated areas of four Iraqi governorates in northern Iraq (including Kirkuk) to determine whether they should remain under Baghdad's control or become part of the KRG. But even before that takes place, the constitution commits the Iraqi government to a potentially explosive reversing of Saddam's "Arabization" policies in these areas, moving Arabs out and Kurds in.

The Iraqi government has postponed the referendum several times from its original date in 2007, citing the understandable excuse that it could spark a new civil war between Kurds and Arabs.

But now that Iraq's government is increasingly stable, Kurdish leaders fear that Baghdad is merely playing for time, allowing the Iraqi military to grow in strength and capability as the U.S. moves to draw down, allowing the Iraqi government eventually to settle the issue the old-fashioned way: with tanks. Already, Kurdish and Iraqi forces have nearly clashed on several occasions in the disputed territories.

Last month, Kurdish lawmakers passed a regional constitution that unilaterally laid claim to the disputed territories and the oil resources in them. Though some Iraqi officials have said that the constitution amounts to a Kurdish declaration of independence, Kurdish leaders are pushing for a referendum to be held on the constitution as early as August.

Meanwhile, the domestic politics of both the Kurdish region and the wider Arab Iraq are pushing the two sides toward confrontation. In Kurdistan, where parliamentary elections will be held on June 25, a new party called Change is mounting the first significant challenge to the duopoly of Barzani's Kurdistan Democratic Party and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, led by Iraqi President Jalal Talabani. The new party is gaining ground by tapping into growing dissatisfaction with government corruption and nepotism. Although the parties credited with delivering today's de facto independence are likely to win, they have moved to strengthen their position by sharpening their tone toward Baghdad as the election approaches.

Baghdad has troubles of its own, which creates an incentive for Kurd-bashing. Most Iraqi Arabs have even less faith in their corrupt leadership class than Kurds have in theirs. And as al-Maliki consolidates his grip on power and styles himself as Iraq's new strongman, he may find that promising to push back against Kurdish efforts to dismember Iraq could help rally Arab Iraqis, both Sunni and Shi'ite, behind him. Hey, it worked for Saddam.

Rising Strife Threatens Tenuous Iraqi Stability

BAGHDAD — Violence and political instability have escalated across Iraq since the withdrawal of American forces, as political and sectarian factions have fought for power and influence in a struggle that, within weeks, has threatened to undo the stability that allowed the pullout in the first place.

The most recent turbulence came over the weekend when a Shiite governor threatened to blockade an important commercial arterial road from Baghdad to the semi-autonomous Kurdish region in the north if Kurdish officials did not hand over Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi to government authorities. The Shiite-led national government has accused Mr. Hashimi, a Sunni, of running a sectarian death squad.

On Sunday, the advocacy group Human Rights Watch said the Americans had left behind a "budding police state," with the country's Shiite leadership increasingly ruling by force and fear. Insurgent attacks have surged across the country, and as security forces loyal to the Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite, have pressed a campaign against Sunni politicians, arresting several in the past week.

The turmoil has come at a time when Iraqis had hoped their leaders would be emboldened by their new independence to tackle the nation's multitude of problems — finally confronting the social, economic and religious divisions that were papered over by the presence of American troops.

But while there remains hope that Iraqis can still unite, the country is far from the "sovereign, stable and self-reliant" place President Obama described it as last month.

"Before the United States withdrew, our politicians were saying that we are a government of national unity, and that we are a democracy, and that is all they talked about," said Dr. Basam Edis, 45, a physician from the northern city of Mosul. "Now people are wondering if militias will take control of the cities again. It is all happening because our politicians are now fighting for a bigger piece of the pie."

He added, "Our politicians have become vampires who do not care about us."

The worst break came when Mr. Maliki ordered Mr. Hashimi's arrest last month. In response, Sunni politicians boycotted Parliament and cabinet meetings, bringing an already unproductive political process to a halt. Sunni-majority provinces began talking about greater autonomy or even breaking away from the central government.

Amid the paralysis, Mr. Maliki publicly threatened to release secret information that he said would implicate politicians in terrorist plots. Then, last week, Mr. Maliki stripped the boycotting Sunni ministers of their posts. Sunni politicians responded by calling him a dictator.

The political dysfunction has become so acute that it is considered a positive sign that Shiite and Sunni leaders are at least arguing about who will attend meetings to discuss where a next round of meetings will be held. Those meetings would then aim to resolve the political crisis.

"All these years, the United States stayed here trying to polish the political process so they would have an excuse to leave Iraq victorious," said William Warda, an analyst in Baghdad. "But the fact is, they left a very shaky political structure, one that has a very weak foundation. It is like a building standing on a match. What has happened since the withdrawal has proved this even more."

The criticisms from Human Rights Watch were released in their annual report on human rights in various countries. The group said that the Iraqi government had significantly restricted freedom of expression in the nation over the past year and that security forces had intimidated, beaten and detained activists, demonstrators and journalists.

"After the formal withdrawal last month, the political clampdown has intensified, and Maliki has threatened his political opponents with jail," the group's Middle East director, Sarah Leah Whitson, said in an interview.

At the same time, Al Qaeda has increased its attacks while shifting its focus toward Iran's influence in Iraq. On three different days in the past month, the daily death toll rose past 60, and on more than a dozen days the toll was more than 10. Without the help of American Special Operations forces, the Iraqi military and police forces have appeared unable to curb attacks on religious pilgrims, civilians and security officers.

"The United States withdrew rapidly after being repeatedly attacked by our mujahedeen in order to save their military from a quagmire," Al Qaeda in Iraq said in a recent posting on its Web site. "The American military withdrawal is a defeat in every sense of the word, but the war is not over because Iran is trying to establish a Shiite buffer zone in Iraq and extend its Islamic revolution to Medina and Mecca," it said, referring to Muslim holy sites in Saudi Arabia

Al Qaeda said the Iranian government, which trained and financed militias in Iraq involved in sectarian violence and attacks on American troops, had helped destroy Iraq by "killing the best families, the elite, the educated."

As problems have persisted inside Iraq, its leaders have struggled to deal with neighbors, including Turkey, one of the largest foreign investors.

According to members of Mr. Maliki's bloc, the Turkish prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, called Iraqi politicians about 10 days ago and told them that they should peacefully deal with one another as they try to resolve their differences.

Around the same time, Mr. Erdogan called Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. to express his concern about the tensions between Shiites and Sunnis in Iraq, warning that the crisis could lead to a sectarian war.

The calls angered Mr. Maliki because he felt that Mr. Erdogan, a Sunni, was criticizing how he was dealing with the country's affairs. In a television interview, Mr. Maliki said that Mr. Erdogan was acting as though he controlled Iraq, and said that Mr. Erdogan should stop meddling.

The issue has lingered. Last week, the head of Iran's Quds Force was reported to have said that Iraq and southern Lebanon were under Iranian control. In response, top Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite politicians in Iraq called on Mr. Maliki to reprimand the Iranians as he had the Turks.

"I expected a lot of wisdom and a sense of calm between the Iraqi officials, especially after the United States troops withdrew," said Abdul Baqi Abboud, 59, a teacher from Basra. "But the contrary has happened, and they have acted recklessly and without a sense of responsibility. They have proved that they are teenagers, and we will now expect more problems."

Reporting was contributed by Yasir Ghazi, Duraid Adnan and Omar al-Jawoshy from Baghdad, and an Iraqi employee of The New York Times from Mosul.

Officials in Baghdad, including American diplomats, are trying to mediate a dispute with the Kurdish government in the north.

By TIM ARANGO and DURAID ADNAN
Published: December 3, 2012

BAGHDAD — It was just the sort of episode that observers have long worried could provoke a serious conflict: when federal police agents sought to arrest a Kurdish man last month in the city of Tuz Khurmato in the Kurdish north of the country, a gunfight ensued with security men loyal to the Kurdish regional government.

When the bullets stopped flying, a civilian bystander was dead and at least eight others were wounded.

In response, the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, rushed troop reinforcements to the area, and Masoud Barzani, the president of Iraq's semiautonomous northern Kurdish region, dispatched his own soldiers, known as the Peshmerga, and the forces remain there in a tense standoff.

Almost a year after the departure of the United States military closed a painful chapter in the histories of both nations, Iraq finds itself in a familiar position: full-blown crisis mode, this time with two standing armies, one loyal to the central government in Baghdad and the other commanded by the Kurdish regional government in the north, staring at each other through gun sights, as officials northern city claimed by Arabs and Kurds.

in Baghdad, including American diplomats and an American general, try to mediate.

Like bookends, Iraq is closing the year just as it began, with a major confrontation that has exposed sectarian and ethnic rifts that hundreds of billions of American dollars and thousands of lives have not reconciled. At the outset of the year, it was the sectarian divide between Shiites and Sunnis that was on vivid display when the government of Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, issued an arrest warrant on terrorism charges against the Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi.

"The year started with the warrant against Hashemi and is ending with tanks on the edge of the Kurdish mountains," said Sarmed al-Tai, a columnist for the newspaper Al Mada, which ran a story on Sunday on the anniversary of the American military's departure, describing the exit as "leaving a large vacuum and a significant deterioration of the national partnership."

As American troops left at the end of 2011, Mr. Maliki sent tanks to surround Mr. Hashemi's home in the Green Zone of Baghdad. An arrest warrant led to Mr. Hashemi's self-imposed exile, first in the Kurdish north and then Turkey; a trial in absentia followed, then the handing down of not one but two death sentences. Mr. Hashemi now lives in a suburban high-rise apartment in Istanbul, where he is protected by Turkish guards and remains defiant.

"Legally, I am still a vice president," he said in a recent interview, adding, "I do have a lot of time to look after the future of my country."

The latest crisis is an ethnic one, between Kurds and Arabs, and the consequences are potentially more serious because the Kurds, in contrast to the Sunni Arabs, enjoy a measure of autonomy in the north, control their own security forces and have longstanding ambitions for independence.

Tuz Khurmato, the city where the clash occurred, is of mixed ethnicity, where Turkmens, Arabs and Kurds compete for power. It lies in a region around the city of Kirkuk, an area of vast potential oil wealth that is at the center of a longstanding power struggle between Kurds and Arabs. As part of his brutal rule, Saddam Hussein moved tens of thousands of Arabs into the area, to dilute what was historically a Kurdish stronghold. After his fall, thousands of displaced Kurds demanded the right to return to the homes they had been driven from, creating tensions that have yet to subside.

The latest crisis began after Mr. Maliki sought to consolidate his control over security in Kirkuk, where Kurdish and Iraqi forces have shared responsibility for security, and it reached a critical stage after the gunfight.

"This is a red line for the Kurds," said Joost R. Hiltermann, an Iraq expert at the International Crisis Group. "Maliki is essentially taking control of the police. And the Kurds will never give up the city."

Efforts at mediation, backed by the Americans, have so far failed to reach resolution. On Monday, Mr. Maliki and Mr. Barzani sent more troops to the area, with each side accusing the other of doing so first. Mr. Maliki warned the Kurds of the "seriousness of their behavior" and warned of its "consequences." A spokesman for the Peshmerga said, "Anything is possible."

The Kurds (Iraqi Kurdistan)

Updated: Dec. 6, 2012

The Kurds are a distinct ethnic group without a nation of their own.

About 25 to 30 million live in the Middle East. Throughout history, the majority inhabited the mountains and plateau regions where Iran, Iraq and Turkey meet. About half the Kurds live in Turkey, accounting for an estimated 20 percent of the total population there. There are believed to be approximately 5.7 million Kurds in Iran and about 1.5 million in Syria. There also important communities of Kurds in Armenia, Azerbaijan, Germany, the Netherlands and Sweden.

America's involvement with Iraq, where Kurds make up about 20 percent of the population, has led to the creation of a semi-autonomous region that is the closest thing to a Kurdish state since the end of World War I.

But while the Kurds of northern Iraq have prospered, the growth of their power there has been at the price of the dream of true independence. And while they have exploited their role as holding the balance of power in a country divided between a Shiite Muslim majority and a resentful Sunni minority, their position will remain vulnerable as long as Iraq lurches from political crisis to crisis.

On top of the tensions in Iraq and long-simmering Kurdish autonomy movements in Iran and Turkey, the civil war in Syria is presenting the Kurds with a new set of hopes and dangers.

The Kurdish militias in northern Syria had hoped to stay out of the fighting there. They were focused on preparing to secure an autonomous enclave for themselves within Syria should the rebels succeed in toppling the government. But slowly, inexorably, they have been dragged into the fighting and now have one goal in mind, their autonomy, which also means the balkanization of the state.

Analysts fear this combustible environment could presage a bloody ethnic and sectarian conflict that will resonate far beyond Syria's borders. There is concern that Iraq's Kurds, who are already training Syrian Kurds to fight, may jump into the Syria fight to protect their ethnic brethren. That could also pull in Turkey, which fears that an autonomous Kurdish region in Syria would become a haven for Kurdish militants to carry out cross-border attacks in the Kurdish areas in southeastern Turkey.

A Standoff Between Kurds and the Iraqi Government

Meanwhile, in Iraq, as 2012 drew to a close, violence erupted in a standoff between the northern Kurds and the Baghdad government. The crisis began after Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, sought to consolidate his control over security in the city of Kirkuk, where Kurdish and Iraqi forces have shared responsibility for security. In November, federal police agents sought to arrest a Kurdish man, and a gunfight ensued with security men loyal to the Kurdish regional government.

Iraq-Kurd deal offers hope, but challenges remain

9:55a.m. EST December 15, 2012

(Photo: Emad Matti, AP)

BAGHDAD (AP) — A deal brokered by Iraq's president this week gives the central government and the Kurdish minority an opportunity to step back from a military standoff that has threatened to tip the country back into armed conflict just a year after the last American troops left.

The Kurds, a different ethnic group from Iraq's majority Arabs, have their own armed fighters and enjoy considerable control over an increasingly prosperous enclave in Iraq's mountainous north. Thursday's accord calls for the eventual withdrawal of Iraqi military and Kurdish fighters who in recent weeks moved into disputed areas where both seek to extend their influence.

There is no timetable governing the pullout of troops, tanks and artillery on either side, meaning tensions could quickly flare back up. Distrust remains high, and the two sides are far from reaching a lasting deal over how to manage energy resources and divvy up the growing profits oil brings in.

"This is only the symptom," Martin Kobler, the U.N. envoy to Iraq, said of the military standoff in an interview this week. "We have to go to the root. And the root is the Arab-Kurdish understanding. … Distribution of wealth in this country is distribution of power, period."

The dispute that has played out over the past month shows just how unstable Iraq remains nearly a decade after the U.S.-led invasion, and injects an added level of uncertainty into a Middle East grappling with the potential collapse of Syria, on Iraq's doorstep.

A shootout between Iraqi police and Kurdish guards in the disputed northern city of Tuz Khormato kicked off the most recent bout of brinksmanship in mid-November. One civilian was killed and several police officers were wounded in the gun battle, the first deadly clash between the two sides in years.

Both sides responded by moving additional troops into the disputed areas. The buildup happened after Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki created a new military command overseeing security forces in contested areas bordering the Kurdish region. Kurds saw that as a provocation.

Tensions spiked earlier this week when the president of the Kurdish region appeared on television inspecting his green camouflage-clad troops near Kirkuk, an oil-rich city outside the Kurds' autonomous enclave that has long been seen as a likely flashpoint for ethnic conflict. Massoud Barzani was shown alongside one of his sons, who was outfitted in full combat gear.

Iraqi Arabs bristled at the symbolism of the visit, which drew barbed comparisons to ousted dictator Saddam Hussein. Yassin Majid, an Iraqi lawmaker allied with al-Maliki, was among the most vocal.

"Barzani's visit to Kirkuk was meant to send a message of war to all Iraqis. … This reminds us of Saddam when he used to take his sons while visiting military units on the front lines," Majid said. "Barzani is acting like the president of a neighboring country to Iraq and … he is pushing things toward war."

Despite the bluster, both sides benefit from not allowing the standoff to spiral into a shooting war.

Full-blown fighting would spook the foreign investors who have flocked to the Kurds' self-rule region. It would also set back the central government's efforts to restore stability and security after years of violence.

Those realizations may have helped push Barzani and al-Maliki to agree to Thursday's deal, which calls on both sides to halt all media campaigns that could lead to more tension and work toward eventually withdrawing their military forces from disputed areas.

Under the plan, committees will be set up to create security forces made up of local inhabitants — a process that could prove tricky because it will have to balance competing ethnic and sectarian claims.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, himself a Kurd, helped negotiate the accord.

Ali al-Moussawi, a spokesman for al-Maliki, said he is optimistic but noted that the "real test will be the actual withdrawal of the deployed forces." The Kurds likewise remain cautious about the issue of security forces for the disputed areas.

"This issue is sensitive and it needs work on the tiniest details so that any agreement, if reached, would guarantee that what has happened recently would not be repeated," the Kurdistan Regional Government said in a statement.

The remaining risks are real. Iraqi and Kurdish officials, as well as foreign diplomats, fear that a miscalculation by a single soldier on either side might spark a firefight that could escalate.

The American military kept tensions between the two sides in check over much of the past decade. But the last American troops left on Dec. 18, 2011 — except for a small number of personnel attached to the U.S. Embassy that are responsible for facilitating Iraqi arms purchases and training Iraqis to use the weapons.

"After 2011, Iraqi politics are operating under their own logic again," said Toby Dodge, an analyst at the International Institute for Strategic Studies think tank in London. "Al-Maliki's consolidating and expanding (power). The Kurds are the last autonomous force that stands in his way."

American military commanders were aware of the risks of Arab-Kurd friction, which they described as one of the biggest threats to Iraq's security in the years before the U.S. pullout. Concerns about ethnic violence prompted the U.S. to create checkpoints jointly run by American, Iraqi and Kurdish forces in the disputed areas, effectively forcing the two sides to work together.

In recent weeks, American officials have pressed the Iraqi government and the Kurds to stop their troop movements and provocative statements while working toward some type of agreement.

Troops from both sides faced off near the Syrian border over the summer too, but American observers viewed the latest standoff as more worrying.

"There's an intensity here that wasn't present back in July on the Syrian border," said a U.S. Embassy official, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the matter so insisted on anonymity. "It's an on-the-ground form of negotiation that's really risky."

Conflicts Brew Between Kurds, Arabs In Iraq

by KELLY MCEVERS

All Things Considered 4 min 36 sec

Arab-Kurd skirmishes in southern Iraq late last week injured dozens of people and killed at least one. Now troops from both sides are escalating and tensions are high again. This all comes as Kurdistan president Massoud Barzani battles Iraqi Central government Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Analysts say Barzani has been emboldened by independent oil contracts, the increasing support of Turkey, and ongoing events in Syria.

MELISSA BLOCK, HOST:

And now to Iraq, where it's been almost a year since American troops pulled out. The U.S. had hoped to leave a few thousand soldiers behind, but couldn't strike a deal with the Iraqi government. The fear was, without U.S. troops to mediate, lingering conflicts between Arabs and Kurds would escalate. Well, that fear now seems to be coming true.

NPR's Kelly McEvers sent this report from northern Iraq, where a small skirmish has sparked a major escalation.

KELLY MCEVERS, BYLINE: So we're standing here, along a pretty major thoroughfare. We're about - what, 70 kilometers south of the city of Kirkuk. This area right here, Tuz Khurmatu, is where the trouble started a few days back. We're about to talk to a man who owns a restaurant here, where we're standing, and a bakery just up the road. He says he saw what happened.

ABBAS SAEED MOHAMMAD: (Speaking foreign language)

MCEVERS: The restaurant owner is Abbas Saeed Mohammad. He says the latest troubles between Arabs and Kurds started a little more than a week ago, when a carload of guys stopped for gas along this road, but refused to pay. The gas seller was a Kurd. The guys in the car were Arabs, who claimed to work for the federal police.

MOHAMMAD: (Through translator) And then one of the federal police took out his gun and pointed it at his head. They say, I'll shoot you dead if you ask for money.

MCEVERS: Kurdish bodyguards, posted on a roof nearby, saw the confrontation; and shot at the Arabs in the car.

MOHAMMAD: (Through translator) And - you know, everybody started to shoot, after the first bullet was shot...

MCEVERS: Ten people were injured, and one passerby was killed. In another place, this incident might have been contained. But this is the so-called disputed territory of Iraq, where Arabs, Kurds and Turkmen live side by side - not always happily. For months, Kurdish and Arab leaders have been sparring at the national level. The president of the semi-autonomous Kurdish region, Massoud Barzani, tried - but failed - to oust Iraq's Arab prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, earlier this year. Then, Maliki's forces opened a command center for the central government's troops in the disputed territory. Kurds saw this as an encroachment, and answered back with threats of their own troop buildup. Then came the shooting at Tuz Khurmatu.

(SOUNDBITE OF VEHICLES)

MCEVERS: On our way into the town, we saw Arab troops - from Baghdad - heading into Kirkuk. And over the weekend, Kurdish officials released a video of their own tanks heading into Kirkuk, too.

(SOUNDBITE OF CROWD CHATTER)

MCEVERS: At this press conference in Tuz Khurmatu, local officials - representing Kurds, Arabs and Turkmen - hold hands to show they're unified at the local level, and they don't want any trouble. But it seems that the local leaders have little say in the matter. Saad al Mutallabi is part of the ruling, Arab-dominated party in Baghdad. He says Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani is emboldened by the presence of oil and gas in Kurdistan; and by contracts with super-giants like Exxon Mobile.

SAAD AL-MUTALLABI: And the thing that he doesn't understand - that one artillery shell that lands close to Exxon Mobil, Exxon Mobil will leave the country.

MCEVERS: That sounds like a threat, I say.

AL-MUTALLABI: Well, if it's - I think Iraqi people will retaliate when they see that their national interest is at risk.

MCEVERS: The question is: Is all this tough talk from Arabs and Kurds real threats, or just bluster? Joost Hilterman, of the International Crisis Group, says it's mainly bluster. He says Kurdish leader Barzani has been emboldened by the oil contracts, but also by better ties with Iraq's neighbor Turkey. But he says Barzani still relies on Maliki's central government, for a chunk of Kurdistan's budget. And despite possible Kurdish gains in nearby Syria, Barzani's dream of an independent Kurdistan is still way off.

JOOST HILTERMAN: The Kurds will make progress in the current period. They can take advantage of the new opportunities created in the region - in Syria and in Iraq, and in Turkey. But I don't think that independence will be the result - at least, not now.

MCEVERS: Kurdish and Arab military leaders tentatively agreed today to pull their troops back to previous positions. But the restaurant owner back in Tuz Khurmatu, is not optimistic. It's not the politicians in high places who suffer from this war of words, he told us. It's us, the people on the ground.

In Iraq, Exxon oil deal foments talk of civil war

By Ben Van Heuvelen, December 18, 2012

BAGHDAD — With their opposing armies massed on either side of the contested border dividing southern and northern Iraq, leaders in Baghdad and the semiautonomous Kurdistan region are warning that they are close to civil war — one that could be triggered by Exxon Mobil.

Although leaders on both sides are negotiating a walk back from the brink, they also say their armies could easily be provoked into battle. One of the most sensitive tripwires is Exxon, which is preparing to drill for oil in the disputed territories at the heart of the military standoff. Iraq's two most explosive political conflicts — over land and oil — are primed to combust.

"The prime minister has been clear: If Exxon lays a finger on this territory, they will face the Iraqi army," said Sami al-Askari, a member of parliament and confidant of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "We don't want war, but we will go to war, for oil and for Iraqi sovereignty."

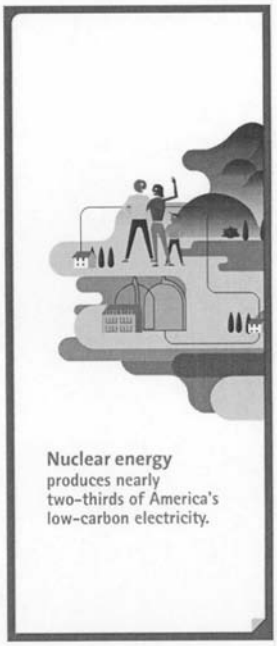
Iraq's major ethnic groups have laid competing claims to a belt of land between the Kurdistan region and southern Iraq. An unofficial "line of control" bisects the disputed areas, demarcating the southern border of Kurdistan-governed territory.



The crisis began after a Nov. 16 battle in the town of Tuz Khurmatu, whose ethnic tensions are typical of the disputed areas. A shootout erupted when federal forces tried to arrest a Kurdish fuel seller, who asked Kurdish soldiers, known as the pesh merga, to protect him.

Maliki and the Kurdistan region's president, Massoud Barzani, quickly ordered thousands of reinforcements to move toward the line of control. "We do not want war," Barzani said in a speech to troops on the front lines, "but if war comes, then all Kurdish people are ready to fight."

Iraqi Kurds are scarred by memories of Saddam Hussein's campaigns of ethnic cleansing. After the fall of his regime, they staked out substantial autonomy in northern Iraq, and now the Kurdistan region has many features of an independent state.

Many of the region's southern Iraqi neighbors, however, complain that the Kurds are grasping for territory that is not rightfully theirs. Authorities in Baghdad say they had to deploy thousands of Iraqi troops to prevent further Kurdish encroachment.

Kurdistan conflict threatens to bring new violence to Iraq

War in Syria exacerbates religious and ethnic tension amid speculation over a declaration of independence

Christophe Ayad
Guardian Weekly, Tuesday 14 August 2012 08.59 EDT

Just how far will the dispute between Iraq and Iraqi Kurdistan go? Clashes between the Iraqi prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, and the Kurdish president, Massoud Barzani, have been escalating since the US withdrawal at the end of 2011, leading to speculation about the declaration of an independent Kurdish state. Certainly the hypothesis of an armed conflict between the central Iraqi government and the autonomous Kurdish region cannot be excluded.

One recent example of current tensions occurred last month when the Kurdish peshmerga prevented the Iraqi national army from reaching the Fishkhabur crossing into Syria in the Zimar region, one of the "disputed territories". According to AFP, an anonymous Iraqi source has accused the Kurdish authorities of illegally buying anti-aircraft and anti-tank weapons "with help from a foreign country". Fingers point to Turkey, which supports Iraqi Kurdistan and is in conflict with Baghdad. Last spring Barzani tried in vain to dissuade the US from selling F16 fighter planes to Iraq.

This tension has been exacerbated by the war in Syria. Barzani supports the rebels whereas Maliki, who is pro-Iran supports Bashar al-Assad. Profiting from this situation, the Iraqi branch of al-Qaida has resurfaced and on 23 July claimed responsibility for a series of attacks that killed 116 people.

Baghdad and Erbil have an endless list of grievances, ranging from border controls and the integration of the peshmerga to the Iraqi national army, to the delimitation of Kurdistan and the sharing of wealth between the centre and the autonomous region – especially oil.

There is a fear that growing Kurdish independence will serve as an example to the Sunni provinces, or even to the oil-rich Shia province of Basra in the far south of Iraq, which produces 2m of the 2.5m Iraqi barrels a day. "Al-Maliki would far rather be the leader of a large country than the master of a 'Shia-istan' in the south of Iraq," was one western diplomat's analysis. Conversely, Barzani sees himself as the defender of Iraqi minorities in the face of Shia "hegemony". That is why he granted asylum to the Sunni vice-president Tariq al-Hashemi in December 2011, after he was judged in abstentia in Iraq for having headed a death squad during the civil war (2005-2008).

The Kurdish-Sunni rapprochement, promoted by Turkey, has led to a coalition that is seeking to overthrow Maliki – so far without success. In retaliation, the Iraqi prime minister denounced his opponent's corruption and nepotism on a private Kurdish television station last June, pointing out that Barzani's son heads the autonomous region's security services while his nephew is prime minister.

At the core of this friction lies the issue of Iraqi Kurdistan's independence. According to one diplomat, Barzani's dilemma is as follows: "He knows that Kurdistan is not ready and that other countries in the region would not appreciate a declaration of independence. But he is also aware that the longer he waits, the stronger Baghdad will become."

UPDATE 2-Iraqi Kurds defend oil policy, reject BP Kirkuk deal

* KRG calls plan with BP for Kirkuk illegal

* Baghdad and Kurdistan locked in long oil dispute

* Kurdish region has begun to truck oil to Turkey

By Patrick Markey

BAGHDAD, Jan 18 (Reuters) - Iraq's Kurdistan has defended its oil policy as constitutional, and rejected a deal between Baghdad and BP for an oilfield in the disputed city of Kirkuk as an "illegal" step in the autonomous region's feud with the central government.

The statement came after Iraq's oil minister said Baghdad's government would sue companies exporting crude from Kurdistan, warned of cuts to the self-ruled region's federal budget and announced an accord with BP in Kirkuk.

Iraq's Arab-led central government and Kurdistan Regional Government or KRG, run by ethnic Kurds, are locked in a widening dispute over control of oil revenues, oilfields and territory that is fraying the country's uneasy federal union.

The ethnically mixed city of Kirkuk, sitting on the internal border between Iraq and Kurdistan, is at the heart of their long-running battle over constitutional rights to the OPEC member's crude reserves, the world's fourth-largest.

"Iraq's citizens are simply tired of this sort of language of threat and intimidation, which in the cynical pursuit of narrow political agendas serves only to create division and strife," the KRG said in a statement on its website.

"In terms of oil and gas management, the KRG firmly believes in, and abides by, the letter and spirit of Iraq's permanent, federal constitution."

Speaking to Reuters on Wednesday, Oil Minister Abdul Kareem Luaibi said Baghdad intends to sue Genel Energy - the first company to export oil directly from Kurdistan - and may slash the government's allocated 17 percent budget to the region unless it halts what he rejected as smuggling.

Luaibi announced a preliminary agreement with BP to revive the northern Kirkuk oil field, which - apart from being at the centre of the fight between Kurdistan and Iraq - is suffering massive output declines.

"He reveals details of an illegal and unconstitutional plan to allegedly allow BP to enhance the recovery of some of the depleted fields in Kirkuk... without consulting and obtaining approval of the other parties to the dispute," the KRG said.

Automatic spending cuts would hurt Americans: White House

63 Pope resigns, saying no longer has strength to fulfill ministry

The feud between Baghdad and the Kurdistan enclave, which has run its own regional administration and armed forces since 1991, has escalated since the KRG began signing deals with oil majors like Exxon Mobil and Chevron.

Iraq's government claims only it has the constitutional authority to export crude oil and sign deals, but Kurdistan says the constitution allows it to agree to contracts and ship oil independently of Baghdad.

Baghdad and Kurdistan late last year both sent troops to reinforce positions along their internal border in a major escalation of tensions between the two regions, but neither appeared to have the stomach for open conflict.

The KRG has given permission to Genel to truck exports directly from Kurdistan's Taq Taq oilfield to Turkey, bypassing the federal pipeline system linking Kirkuk with the Turkish Mediterranean port of Ceyhan.

While the central government dismisses that as smuggling, the KRG said the barter with Turkey was making up part of Kurdistan's entitlement to 17 percent of refined products since Baghdad was not supplying the full amount.

The regional government also rejected Luaibi's suggestion that Baghdad might cut Kurdistan's 17 percent allocation of the federal budget.

"The federal oil minister is stepping well beyond his remit in speaking about the federal budget, creating yet another smokescreen for the incompetency of his ministry and of the federal administration," it said.

The move to truck oil directly to Turkey came after Kurdistan exports were halted via the Baghdad-controlled Iraq-Turkey pipeline due to a dispute over central government payments to oil companies working in Kurdistan.

Baghdad has made one payment in 2012, but Iraqi officials said last month they would not pay firms a second installment because Kurdistan had failed to reach agreed production under a deal made in September.

The central government says Kurdistan is expected to provide 250,000 bpd to Iraq's 2013 oil export target of 2.9 million bpd. In 2012, the KRG was to contribute 175,000 bpd to the federal budget, but handed an average of 61,000 bpd, Luaibi said.

"Had it not been for the federal government's obstructionist policies, the Kurdistan Region could now be exporting 500,000 barrels per day or some $18 billion per year," the KRG said.

Kurds hit out in Iraq oil conflict

By Michael Peel in Abu Dhabi

Iraq's internal battle over oil deepened on Thursday as the semi-autonomous Kurdistan region condemned a threat from Baghdad to cut its budget over its decision to start independently exporting crude to Turkey.

The Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) warned that "intimidation" from the Iraqi capital would create "division and strife" – a resonant message after a string of sectarian terrorist attacks across the country killed more than 50 people in the past two days.

Analysts say the escalating dispute over control of Kurdistan's oil is one of the biggest threats to the stability of Iraq's fragile, post-US occupation, political settlement and the ambitions of Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister, to entrench his authority.

"The oil issue is an existential threat to Maliki," said Toby Dodge, author of a soon-to-be-published book called Iraq: From War to a New Authoritarianism. "And the Kurdistan Regional Government and Maliki know it."

Abdul Kareem al-Luaibi, Iraq's oil minister, made the Kurdistan budget cut threat this week, warning the region's authorities that it was "high time" they stopped the "very dangerous behaviour" of "illegal" crude exporting.

Mr Luaibi threatened to sue Genel Energy, the independent oil producer headed by Tony Hayward, the former BP chief executive, which has just started transporting oil from one of its Kurdistan fields to Turkey.

Genel declined to comment, although one person close to the company said it was "very clear" that its contracts enabled it to export crude with the KRG's approval.

Safeen Dizayee, a KRG spokesman, said Mr Luaibi's threat reflected "a degree of panic and desperation" and a "lack of respect" for the Iraqi constitution and the people or Kurdistan. He said: "Iraq's citizens are simply tired of this sort of language of threat and intimidation, which – in the cynical pursuit of narrow political agendas – serves only to create division and strife.

"It would appear the overriding philosophy is that if your own policies have failed, lash out and blame others."

While the Iraq government disputes Kurdistan's right to exploit and export the oil on its territory independently, Baghdad has grown increasingly alarmed as leading oil companies, such as ExxonMobil, Chevron and Total, have signed production-sharing deals with the authorities in Erbil, Kurdistan's capital.

The struggle over Kurdistan's resources is part of a complex series of overlapping political fights in Iraq between Mr Maliki – a Shia Muslim Islamist – and factions including Moqtada al-Sadr, a firebrand Shia cleric, and Sunni minority representatives who have been holding street protests in recent weeks.

Insurgents, widely thought to be Sunni extremists, killed 22 people in Iraq on Thursday in bomb attacks aimed maiuly at Shia pilgrims. The slaughter came a day after another wave of bombings killed at least 33 people, with one targeting an office of the Kurdistan Democratic party of Massoud Barzani, the KRG president, in the disputed town of Kirkuk.

The balance of Iraq's volatile politics will be tested in local elections due in April, while the forthcoming national budget may give Mr Maliki an opportunity to shore up some deteriorating relationships, especially with the Kurds.

"Maliki has probably been provoked by this [oil dispute] and he doesn't quite know how to respond," said Reidar Visser, an Iraq specialist and editor of the Gulf Analysis website.

"In the past, Maliki has often used the budget to build bridges to the Kurds at the last minute."

ARBIL, Iraq | Thu Feb 7, 2013 9:16am EST
(Reuters) - Iraqi Kurdistan will press ahead with building its own oil export pipeline to Turkey, the region's energy minister said on Thursday, despite U.S. objections due to fears the project could lead to the break-up of Iraq.
The autonomous Kurdish region is locked in a turf war with the central government in Baghdad over how to exploit Iraq's hydrocarbon riches and divide up the proceeds.
Baghdad says it alone has the authority to control exports of the world's fourth largest oil reserves, while the Kurds say their right to do so is enshrined in Iraq's federal constitution, drawn up following the U.S.-led invasion of 2003.
"We want to have an oil pipeline to ourselves," Iraqi Kurdish Minister for Natural Resources Ashti Hawrami said at a news conference in the regional capital Arbil. "It is currently in the works and we will continue until it is completed."
Crude from the Kurdistan region used to be shipped to world markets through a Baghdad-controlled pipeline to Turkey, but exports via that channel dried up in December, from a peak of around 200,000 barrels per day (bpd) due to a row over payments with Baghdad.

The United States says the solution lies in a national hydrocarbons law that has been delayed for years by a power struggle between Iraq's Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish factions, which has intensified since U.S. troops withdrew a year ago.

"The Iraqis have been struggling to pass a hydrocarbons law. It is very important that they succeed in that," U.S. Ambassador to Turkey Francis J. Ricciardone said in Ankara on Tuesday.

Reluctant to wait, Kurdistan has been looking to resource-hungry Turkey for answers. A broad energy partnership between them ranging from exploration to export has been in the works since last year.

Majority Sunni Turkey's deepening ties with the Kurdistan region in northern Iraq have heightened tensions between Ankara and the Shi'ite-led government in Baghdad.

"If Turkey and Iraq fail to optimize their economic relations... There could be more violent conflict in Iraq and the forces of disintegration within Iraq could be emboldened," Riccardione said.

Kurdistan is already bypassing the federal pipeline network by trucking small quantities of crude over the Turkish border in exchange for refined oil products.

"The issue is that we are entitled to 17 percent of (Iraq's)refined products, but the central government sends us only 3 percent and our refining capacity is not enough to satisfy domestic demand," Hawrami said.

Iraq's relations with Arab world deteriorating days after Baghdad summit

BAGHDAD — Iraq's fugitive vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, flew to Saudi Arabia on Wednesday as the goodwill generated between Iraq and its Arab neighbors by an extravagant summit in Baghdad last week began unraveling.

The visit by Hashimi, who is wanted by Baghdad authorities on charges of terrorism, came as Iraqi officials announced they had called off a national reconciliation conference planned for Thursday that was supposed to ease tensions between Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the Sunni and Kurdish factions in his coalition government.

Parliament speaker Osama al-Nujaifi told reporters that the meeting had been postponed indefinitely because of "mounting differences" on a range of issues, just one of which is the arrest warrant that the Shiite-led government has issued for Hashimi, a Sunni.

Hashimi's visit to Saudi Arabia and the cancellation of the conference highlighted the danger that the increasingly intractable political crisis in Iraq will draw in the country's neighbors at a time of increasing polarization in the region over how to address the unrest in Syria.

Maliki had agreed to hold the reconciliation conference as a last-minute concession to the Sunnis and Kurds ahead of the Baghdad summit, which the government hoped would showcase Iraq as stable, safe and assuming its rightful place in the firmament of Arab nations after the withdrawal of U.S. troops late last year.

But relations with Arab states have since been deteriorating fast, along with any hopes that Iraq will soon be able to resolve its own internal problems. On Sunday, Maliki issued a forceful defense of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, saying his ouster would destabilize the region. On the same day, at a U.S.-backed gathering of "Friends of Syria" in Istanbul, Saudi Arabia endorsed a plan to fund and equip Syrian rebels.

Maliki's comments triggered blistering attacks in Saudi newspapers, which often reflect official thinking.

In an editorial in the Saudi-owned al-Sharq al-Awsat, editor Tariq Alhomayed called for sanctions on Maliki "to prevent the emergence of a new Saddam or another Bashar."

The governments of Turkey, Iraq and Iraqi Kurdistan play a dangerous game

Dec 22nd 2012 | ERBIL | From the print edition

Like 516 Tweet 50

SNAKING their way from Kirkuk, a city 240 kilometres (150 miles) north of Baghdad, through Kurdistan and across Turkey's eastern region of Anatolia to the Mediterranean are pipes that once carried 1.6m barrels a day (b/d) of Iraqi oil to the global market and yielded fat transit fees to Turkey along the way. The infrastructure underpinned the two countries' mutual dependence. But nowadays the balance of power has shifted. A third party, the Iraqi Kurds, has changed it. It is unclear who will emerge on top. But Iraq's central government in Baghdad is on the defensive.

Wars, saboteurs and, since the 1990s, economic sanctions have left the Iraqi sections of the pipeline system in a mess. Barely a fraction of its capacity is used. One of the two parallel lines stands empty and the source that once fed them, the giant Kirkuk oilfield, is dilapidated. The oil ministry in Baghdad has vague ideas about revamping the pipeline, perhaps to carry crude extracted near Basra, in the far south, though this would need an expensive new pipeline to link both ends of the country.

But Turkey is hatching a different plan for its section of the Kirkuk-to-Ceyhan pipeline. Its souring relations with the government in Baghdad have spurred it to cultivate new ties with the Iraqi Kurds' regional government in Erbil, which oversees the oil and gas that Turkey's growing economy craves. A wide-ranging energy deal is in the works that will see state-backed Turkish firms and Western oil majors plough money into Kurdish infrastructure and oilfields, connecting them to Turkey and the world beyond. The deal could eventually allow for up to 2m b/d of Kurdish oil exports to go through Turkey.

Last year, trade between Turkey and Iraqi Kurdistan amounted to $8 billion. Turkish money has paid for pristine airports in Erbil and Dohuk, an Iraqi Kurdish city further north, and for other large projects. Not long ago, Turkish politicians, wary of their own large and restless Kurdish minority still fighting for autonomy (or more) in eastern Turkey, barely acknowledged Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region.

Now Turkey's government is using its commercial clout to press the Iraqi Kurds' president, Masoud Barzani, to help restrain militant Kurds within Turkey. A stroke recently suffered by Jalal Talabani, a Kurd who is president of federal Iraq and who has often mediated between his kinsmen and the rulers in Baghdad, may make it even harder to keep the calm.

Oil and gas are at the core of this warm new relationship between Turkey and Iraq's Kurds. "Turkey has made a strategic shift in its relations with us," says an official in a ministry in Erbil. "Whatever the scenario, our market is in Turkey."

Nuri al-Maliki's government in Baghdad, dominated by Shia Muslims, has unwisely pushed Turkey into this oily Kurdish embrace. Mr Maliki's close ties to Iran and support for President Bashar Assad in Syria have angered Turkey's government and convinced it not to rely on Iraq. The refuge offered by Turkey to Tariq al-Hashemi, Iraq's vice-president, who was sentenced to death in absentia by a court in Baghdad in September, has also upset Mr Maliki, who has duly insulted Turkey's leaders. In November his government expelled Turkey's state oil company from a block in Iraq, plainly out of political spite. In December he ordered his air-traffic controllers to deny landing rights to Turkey's energy minister, Taner Yildiz, who was en route to Erbil for an investor conference.

Iraq's central government seems bent on wrecking the Kurds' thriving oil industry, saying that their regional government has no legal authority to export oil independently or sign contracts with developers. The government in Baghdad has delayed payments to Iraqi Kurdistan's oil producers, who say they are owed about $1.5 billion. Some explorers fret that they will never recoup their cash. Pars Kutay, an executive at Genel Energy, a Turkish oil-producer in Kurdistan, says that depending for payment on Iraq's central authorities is like "pumping oil into a black hole". Kurdish oil exports are now said to have collapsed to around 30,000 b/d.

This helps no one. Oil explorers in Kurdistan, now including big spenders like ExxonMobil and Chevron, are said to have so far invested about $10 billion. Future exports of 2m b/d, as envisaged by the regional government in Erbil, would yield far greater sums. Under Iraq's revenue-sharing scheme more than four-fifths of the money from such sales would go to Baghdad, 17% to the Kurds. If the region's oil were allowed to flow, Kurdistan, now a drain on Iraq's budget, would soon be a net contributor, says Ashti Hawrami, the Kurds' oil minister. "It is a win-win."

But the centralising Mr Maliki is deeply loth to give the Kurds their head. Their oil policy, he says, threatens to tear Iraq's fragile federation apart by fostering similar aspirations in its oil-producing provinces in the south. Western governments, fearing that Iraq's disintegration would strengthen Iran, are siding with Mr Maliki. The Americans are pressing Turkey to tone down its support for Iraq's Kurds.

In recent weeks Mr Maliki has mobilised Iraq's army along the fault-line that divides the Kurdish region from the rest of Iraq. Bombs have killed at least ten people in the past fortnight in Kirkuk. Kurdish leaders say that they are ready to fight and have sent thousands of their fighters, known as peshmerga, to face down the Iraqi army. From a ridge north-west of Kirkuk, they peer through binoculars at Iraqi troops massing a few hundred yards below on the plain. "If one peshmerga is killed," says a Kurdish officer, "it is war."

Sunni sheikh to al-Maliki: Hand over soldiers behind shootings or 'face losses'

Iraqi soldiers fire on protesters.

STORY HIGHLIGHTS

- Four Iraqi soldiers have been killed in clashes in Falluja, officials say
- Four soldiers also have been abducted, police officials say
- Sheikh Ahmed Abu Risha is demanding the prime minister hand over the soldiers involved
- At least seven people were killed and 47 wounded in shootings during protests Friday

Baghdad (CNN) -- Thousands of mourners turned out in Falluja Saturday, hours after a powerful Sunni sheikh called on Iraq's Shiite prime minister to hand over soldiers responsible for killing anti-government protesters in Anbar province or face "losses among their ranks."

The warning came as reports emerged that four soldiers were killed and four were abducted after security forces fired on a Sunni anti-government protest in Falluja, raising fears of retaliations that could ignite sectarian violence.

Sheikh Ahmed Abu Risha, who is credited with rallying Sunni tribal leaders to turn on al Qaeda in Iraq, gave Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government seven days to hand over to Anbar's criminal court those involved in the shootings.

"We warn al-Maliki that the people of Anbar have another choice, if their demand is not met," Abu Risha told supporters in a televised statement broadcast by a number of Iraqi news outlets. Abu Risha's words carry weight, as he is head of a 160,000-member clan, a subset of the Dulaim tribe, one of the largest of all Middle East tribes.

Provincial health officials said that at least seven people were killed and 47 wounded in the shootings Friday during the demonstration in Falluja in the western Anbar province, a Sunni stronghold where protesters have been denouncing what they call second-class treatment by the Shiite-dominated government.

In an interview with Al-Baghdadiya TV, Abu Risha also demanded al-Maliki withdraw troops from Falluja ahead of Saturday morning's funeral procession for those killed.

"They need to go back to their barracks and be stopped, or there may be losses among their ranks or the ranks of the police. With all honesty, Falluja is boiling," he said.

Indians: End 'degrading' rape exam updated 10:26 AM EST, Wed February 6, 2013
Advocates say the exam includes unnecessarily invasive and irrelevant procedures -- like a so-called "two finger" test.

http://www.cnn.com/2013/01/26/world/meast/iraq-protests 2/13/2013

The funeral procession drew thousands of mourners who shouted, "God is great, God is great" and "al-Maliki is the enemy of God," and demanded that al-Maliki be removed from office.

"Al-Maliki is a leader of militias, he is a criminal, he should be fired from his position immediately" Ahmed Ismaeil, one of the mourners, told CNN.

"Al-Maliki should be tried for crimes he has committed against Iraqi people. This is one of his crimes" Ismaeil added.

35 killed in Iraq suicide bombing, police say

The caskets bearing the bodies of the dead were carried on the shoulders of mourners and were buried in Falluja's famous Martyr's Cemetery.

Abu Risha is head of the Anbar Awakening Council, a group composed primarily of Sunni Arab fighters who turned on al Qaeda in Iraq, which was made up of predominantly Sunni extremists, in late 2006 and who joined forces with the U.S.-led coalition.

While a number of the members of the council, also known as the Sons of Iraq, have been integrated into Iraq's security forces, Abu Risha has said he maintains a militia of about 80,000. Al-Maliki's government has put the number at 50,000, according to published reports.

Abu Risha took over as head of the province's Awakening Council after his brother Sheikh Abdul Sattar -- also known as Abu Risha -- was assassinated in 2007.

Abu Risha's demand that troops withdraw from Falluja was backed by a number of religious leaders in the city.

By nightfall Friday, Iraqi soldiers withdrew from several security posts in and around the city and went back to their main military headquarters in Falluja, according to police officials in the city.

There were conflicting accounts about what led to the shootings.

Witnesses told CNN that Iraqi soldiers opened fire after they ordered the demonstrators to stop filming dozens of Iraqi security forces on the rooftops surrounding al-Etisam Square, while others said Iraqi soldiers fired when protesters started throwing objects at them.

Security officials said the shootings occurred when protesters began throwing rocks. When the soldiers opened fire, protesters responded by burning military vehicles and civilian cars.

By Friday night, dozens of angry protesters had attacked an army checkpoint in southern Falluja, setting the building on fire and burning an army vehicle, police officials said. The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, were not authorized to release details to the media.

Two soldiers were killed in that attack, the officials said. Two more soldiers were killed by snipers on Saturday morning, they said.

That was followed Saturday by the abduction of four soldiers from near a military base near Falluja, the officials said. The four, who were in civilian clothing, were on their way home for a short vacation when they were kidnapped, they said.

Al-Maliki on Friday said the violence in Falluja doesn't surprise his administration. He cited "conspiracies" plotted by regional intelligence services, vestiges of the old regime, al Qaeda and those with sectarian agendas.

The government, he said, has warned before about "those who have hostile agendas against Iraq, its political process and its democracy." He said dangers are "increasing day after day in an attempt to blow up the security situation in the country and drag the armed forces into confrontations."

The protest in Falluja was the latest in a series held in predominantly Sunni regions of Iraq. They have been countered by mostly Shiite, pro-government demonstrations, raising fears that the sectarian division could bring violence in the streets.

The protests have grown in recent weeks. They began in late December when Sunni demonstrators took to the streets in Anbar province, which borders Jordan and Syria, to protest al-Maliki's order to arrest the bodyguards of Finance Minister Rafaie al-Esawi, a Sunni.

The arrest of al-Esawi's bodyguards came just hours after President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd who is widely viewed as a stabilizing political force in Iraq, left the country about two weeks after suffering a stroke.

The protesters also are demanding the release of detainees they said are held without charges, calling the government corrupt and accusing it of unfairly targeting Iraq's Sunni people.

Iraq's Arab Sunnis and Kurds have accused al-Maliki and his Shiite political party of working to consolidate power in Iraq by cutting them out of the political process, an allegation that comes as U.S. lawmakers raise concerns about Iraq strengthening its ties with Shiite -dominated Iran.

Sunnis make up about 20% of Iraq's estimated population of more than 27 million, whereas about 60% to 65% are Shiite.

Since the fall of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-dominated regime in 2003, Sunnis in Iraq have been largely disaffected. The gulf was widened in 2005 when Sunnis boycotted the country's election, opening the way to a heavily dominated Shiite government.

The sectarian divisions translated into violence in the streets in 2006 and 2007, with fighting that nearly ripped the country apart.

CNN's Mohammed Tawfeeq reported from Baghdad and Chelsea J. Carter from Atlanta. CNN's Amir Ahmed contributed to this report.

Iraq's Sadr Encourages Antigovernment Demonstrations

By YASIR GHAZI and CHRISTINE HAUSER
Published: January 1, 2013

BAGHDAD — A populist Shiite leader in Iraq, Moktada al-Sadr, expressed support on Tuesday for fresh protests against Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a fellow Shiite but his political opponent, saying that Mr. Maliki bears "full responsibility" for the unrest in the country.

Moktada al-Sadr spoke in Najaf on Tuesday.

As with many developments in Iraq, the timing and venue of Mr. Sadr's comments to reporters were as notable as their meaning. He spoke in Najaf, one of the holiest cities of his Shiite sect, just as Iraq ended its bloodiest year since 2009, a reflection of unabated ethnic, sectarian and political tensions among the country's Kurdish, Arab, Sunni and Shiite populations.

Several times during the gathering, Mr. Sadr directed his remarks at Mr. Maliki, who has taken recent steps that suggested he was asserting greater control over many aspects of the government and that prompted fears he was cracking down on his political opponents. Mr. Sadr's remarks could indicate that he is trying to test the political waters or possible support from the street before Iraq's provincial elections, which are scheduled for the spring.

Mr. Sadr also tried to assert broader credibility for the anti-Maliki protests by comparing them to the movements that have swept many Arab countries in the past few years, calling for new government leaders and better representation.

"The Iraqi spring is coming," Mr. Sadr said, in a tone that implied a warning to Mr. Maliki.

"We are with the demonstrators, and Parliament must be with them, not against them," he said. "The legitimate demands of the demonstrators, by which people know what they want, should be met."

Mr. Sadr was careful to appear moderate and to say he was speaking for all Iraqis in his remarks, which his media office distributed to journalists throughout the country. He said he supported the widespread demonstrations as long as they were peaceful and did not seek to create divisions, driving the last point home by adding that he was willing to go to Sunni-dominated Anbar Province to take part in protests.

Demonstrations against Mr. Maliki's Shiite-dominated government erupted in Sunni areas last month in response to a raid by security forces on the office and home of the Sunni finance minister, Rafie al-Issawi. In one protest last week, tens of thousands of Sunni Muslims blocked Iraq's main trade route to neighboring Syria and Jordan, Reuters reported.

Aside from reaction in the street, the raid had immediate political fallout. Mr. Issawi described it as a "pre-election blow" intended to weaken Mr. Maliki's rivals. Leaders from the Sunni-dominated bloc, Iraqiya, threatened to pull out of the government and called for a no-confidence vote on Mr. Maliki.

Mr. Sadr's voice has now added his voice to the discord that has left the country in disarray a full year after the withdrawal of American forces left seemingly intractable problems among political factions and ethnic groups.

Tensions between the Kurds in the north and the government in Baghdad, who were already at odds over sharing oil revenues, have risen as soldiers squared off with Kurdish militias after Mr. Maliki sought to consolidate his control over security in the north.

Further political uncertainty occurred at the end of 2012 when the Kurdish president, Jalal Talabani, suffered a stroke and was flown to Germany for treatment.

Sunni Arab and Kurdish officials have accused Mr. Maliki of trying to monopolize power before. In September, Tariq al-Hashimi, the vice president of Iraq and a prominent Sunni Muslim, was convicted of murder and sentenced to death in absentia on accusations that he oversaw death squads. Sunni supporters accused the Shiite-led government of trying to sideline them.

The discord has translated into bloodshed. While attacks have not been as frequent or widespread as they were during the height of the insurgency, Iraqis marked the end of 2012 with a grim milestone.

Iraq Body Count, a nonprofit group that tallies casualties, said Tuesday that civilian deaths from attacks in Iraq rose to at least 4,471 in 2012 from 4,136 in 2011, the first annual rise since 2009. Deaths during the final two weeks were still being tallied.

"Over all, 2012 has been more consistent with an entrenched conflict than with any transformation in the security situation for Iraqis in the first year since the formal withdrawal of U.S. troops," the group said.

Yasir Ghazi reported from Baghdad, and Christine Hauser from New York.

This article has been revised to reflect the following correction:

Correction: January 5, 2013

Because of an editing error, a headline on Wednesday about antigovernment protests in Iraq misstated the title of the country's leader, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. As the article correctly noted, he is the prime minister of Iraq — not the president, a head of state position held by Jalal Talabani.

A version of this article appeared in print on January 2, 2013, on page A5 of the New York edition with the headline: Shiite Rival Encourages Protests Against President of Iraq.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I just want everybody to know, General Austin thought long and hard about a residual force.

Now, do you remember, when you were first getting the job, taking it over from General O. (Odierno), we had an exchange where I said, "In football terms, how would you put us, in terms of our situation in Iraq in June 2010?" He said, "I think you've—I did, sir. I think we're on the 10 yardline, and I think that the next 18 months will determine whether we get to the goal line or give, really, the Iraqis an opportunity to get to the goal beyond 2011." I said, "We're having a new quarterback," and you said, "Sir, I'll take the ball." You agreed with me that we were inside the 10, that we needed a residual force. You talked about the Arab-Kurd conflict. You told me, in no uncertain terms, "One of the friction points in Iraq was at Kirkuk." Do you remember that?

General AUSTIN. I do, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you remember the Lions Brigade concept, where you had Iraqi security forces?

General AUSTIN. I do, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. You had the Peshmerga Brigade, and you had U.S. Forces, working as a team. I think that may have been your idea. It was working so well, because the Peshmerga are, basically, paramilitary forces that are Kurds. Now you see a shooting war about to erupt, I'm afraid, between the Peshmerga and the traditional Iraqi Security Forces. You told me that, if we had about 5,000 people at the Article 140 boundary line, we could keep tensions down. Do you remember that?

General AUSTIN. I do, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you remember telling me that we were one perceived slight or insult away from these guys shooting each other, and we need to have a follow-on force to keep tensions low?

General AUSTIN. That was my assessment, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. It was a good assessment.

What you see now, Mr. Chairman, is the "Blood for Oil" article is a story, last week, about how close they've come to firing at each other over the oil problems in Kirkuk.

I want to introduce into the record the exchange I had with General Dempsey, General Odierno, and General Austin, in 2010 and 2011, about what happened in Iraq.

Senator KAINE. Without objection, it will be entered into the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

NOMINATIONS OF GEN RAYMOND T. ODIERNO, USA, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF GENERAL AND COMMANDER, U.S. JOINT FORCES COMMAND; AND LTG LLOYD J. AUSTIN III, USA, TO BE GENERAL AND COMMANDER, U.S. FORCES-IRAQ

THURSDAY, JUNE 24, 2010, U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES, WASHINGTON, DC.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Congratulations to both of you on the job you have done and the new jobs you're going to undertake, here.

General O—I always butcher your name, I'm just going to call you General O—there must be a height requirement for these jobs. [Laughter.]

We mentioned yesterday the World Cup is going on and it's fun to watch, and I'm pulling for the U.S.A., but I have really no idea what they're doing when they play soccer. So, we're going to talk football. I think you indicated, we're probably on the 10-yard line when it comes to Iraq?

General ODIERNO. I did, Senator. I do think we are on the 10-yard line. I think the next 18 months will determine whether we get to the goal line, or really give the Iraqis an opportunity to get the goal line beyond 2011.

Senator GRAHAM. But, from our national perspective, we're on the 10, and I think you said we probably have four downs? It's first and 10 on the 10, we have a new quarterback coming in.

General ODIERNO. That's right.

General AUSTIN. I'll take the ball, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. I couldn't have found a better guy to be the new quarterback.

Now, the Sons of Iraq, how is that going, General O, in terms of getting those people integrated in the Iraqi security forces?

General ODIERNO. We started out with about 103,000 Sons of Iraq. About 40,000 have been transitioned into other Government of Iraq jobs. They actually stopped the transition because they were starting to realize the value in many areas of what they were providing in terms of intelligence and other things, so they've slowed that down, and they're now doing some reevaluation of the Sons of Iraq program, and how they want to transition that.

Senator GRAHAM. Are they still getting paid?

General ODIERNO. They are.

Senator GRAHAM. One thing that we need to watch for, General Austin, is you have thousands of young Sunnis that are receiving a government paycheck, I think it's like $90 a month, is that right?

General ODIERNO. Three hundred.

Senator GRAHAM. Three hundred? Okay, $300 a month. We have to make sure that if that pay stops that we have a plan, do you agree with that, General Austin?

General AUSTIN. I absolutely agree with that, Senator. I was there, again, in the early days we begin to transition the Sons of Iraq to working for the government and work along with the Prime Minister to outline a plan to effectively transition them. I think they've done a pretty good job, and we need to continue to do that in the future.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay, who's paying? Is that coming from the Iraqi budget?

General AUSTIN. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

Now, Article 140 boundary dispute issues, I think there are a couple of trip wires left in Iraq and one of them that stands out to me is how do you resolve the Arab-Kurdish conflict in Kirkuk and the boundary dispute. If you could both give me, maybe, a 30-second overview of where we're at and what could we do in Congress to help you?

General ODIERNO. We have established a tripartite security architecture in the disputed areas for about 6 months now, and it's been very successful in reducing tensions. It's Pesh Merga, Iraqi Army and U.S. Forces manning checkpoints and joint security areas where they do patrolling in these areas, and it has calmed things down considerably. The United Nations (U.N.) is now taking on the role of now mediating the long-term issues of the border issues and the status of Kirkuk and other issues.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you think that will get resolved for this new government in a year?

General ODIERNO. It depends. My guess is, some of that will be discussed during the governmental formation process. How well that goes could determine how quickly it could happen. I do believe though, to solve the whole problem, it will be longer than a year.

Senator GRAHAM. General Austin, do you agree that is one of the big outstanding issues that the Iraqi people have to resolve?

General AUSTIN. Senator Graham, I absolutely do.

I think that, I would be delighted if it could be resolved in a year but——

Senator GRAHAM. Probably not.

General AUSTIN. I really believe that it's going to take awhile.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you feel like we have enough resources and focus to help them get it resolved?

General AUSTIN. I think that we're doing the right things in terms of working with the government to help them build confidence—bring about confidence-building measures to bring the two sides closer together. I think, again, it's encouraging to see that the U.N. is continuing to try to help, we'll require their help in the future.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

General AUSTIN. But this is going to take a lot of work.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

The hydrocarbon law. Have you had to pass the hydrocarbon law, is that right, General O?

General ODIERNO. That's correct, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. From my point of view, for what it's worth, is that until the Iraqis have a statute that divides the oil up between each group where everybody feels like they're getting the resources of the country fairly shared, it's going to be a tough go. Do you see a breakthrough in the hydrocarbon law any time soon?

General ODIERNO. I think the hydrocarbon law, itself, probably might not get passed. But, I think there are other alternatives.

Senator GRAHAM. They do it year-by-year, budgeting-wise, don't they?

General ODIERNO. Yes, year-by-year, but also they get a revenue sharing agreement——

Senator GRAHAM. Right.

General ODIERNO.—I think would be important. I think that's something that people are looking at now, and I think that would help significantly.

We've had some thawing, there was an argument about whether the Kurdistan Region could develop their own oil, they have solved that problem. They have now begun to develop that. The Government of Iraq, the Central Government is helping them, so that's a breakthrough. We're starting to see small breakthroughs in the overall resolution of this. But again, there's still work that has to be done in that area.

Senator GRAHAM. The rules of engagement—as I understand it, we're partnering with the Iraqi security forces, we have right of self-defense, obviously, but when you make a raid, now, at night, do you have to get a warrant?

General ODIERNO. Under the security agreement, all operations must be warranted.

Senator GRAHAM. Is that working okay?

General ODIERNO. It is working very well.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you have good confidence in your judicial system, there are no leaks?

General ODIERNO. It's not perfect.

Senator GRAHAM. Not perfect.

General ODIERNO. No system is perfect. But our ability to present evidence and get warrants, we absolutely have the ability to do that. That's working well.

Senator GRAHAM. That's very encouraging.

One last question to both of you. General O, we're talking about the consequences to the United States of winning in Iraq, and I think they're enormous. Probably a good time now, given Afghanistan and where we are at in the world—if, for some reason, we didn't make it into the end zone, what would be the consequences of Iraq failing?

General Austin, if you could tell this committee, what are the one or two things that keep you up at night when you think about Iraq?

General ODIERNO. First, if we had a failed state in Iraq, it would create uncertainty and significant instability, probably, within the region. Because of the criticality of Iraq, its relationship to Iran, its relationship to the other Arab states in the region, if it became unstable, it could create an environment that could continue to increase the instability. If it becomes unstable and ungoverned, it opens the area, potentially, for terrorists, in order to allow Iraq to become a place where terrorism could be exported.

Now, I don't believe we're close to that. I believe we're far away from that happening. I think we're definitely on the right path. But those are the kinds of things that would happen if we had a complete breakdown inside of Iraq.

General AUSTIN. Senator Graham, we will be successful in Iraq, we will get the ball into the end zone. I believe that because of all of the great work that our young men and women continue to do on a daily basis and the commitment of this entire country to accomplishing that in the right way.

You mentioned the thing that keeps me awake at night, the one thing that is foremost in my mind is that if their leadership is unable to transfer power in a peaceful manner, that would create conditions that would cause us to, perhaps, revert to sectarian behavior and people to lose confidence in their ability to be properly represented. That is one of the major things.

But I am confident that, based upon what we've seen thus far, this peaceful transition will occur. It will just take some time for them to form a government.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you very, very much.

Now, let's move to Afghanistan. I'm not going to block your nomination, that's not my intent. But, I do believe it's only fair to the committee that you go talk to General Allen. Pick up the phone. I know he's on leave. Do you agree he's one of the finest officers you've ever served with?

General AUSTIN. He is a fine man, sir. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with that, General Rodriguez?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. You all have been at this for a very long time. All of you. I just can't thank you enough. My time's about to expire, so we'll do a second round.

What I would like you to do—and you can give this to me in writing—I want you to go talk to General Allen about his recommendations in Afghanistan, and see if they make sense to you, because—and I'm not going to reveal this to the committee—I know, exactly, his bottom line. I know Senator Ayotte knows his bottom line. I want to find out what's the proper role of this committee in divulging information, because I really do believe we have a right to know what commanders are recommending, as much as the Commander in Chief, because we fund wars. This idea you can't tell us is something I want to explore.

I'm going to stop now, let my colleagues do a second round. Would you please go to General Allen and get briefed on his recommendations—bottom line, top line—and write to me as to whether or not you think they're sound, before we vote. This could be done, I think, relatively quick.

[The information referred to follows:]

UNITED STATES ARMY
THE VICE CHIEF OF STAFF
Washington, DC 20310-0201

15 February 2013

The Honorable Lindsey Graham
United States Senate
290 Russell Senate Office Building
Washington, DC 20510

Senator Graham,

As you requested, I have spoken with General Allen about his recommendations for U.S. troop reductions and troop levels in Afghanistan post-2014 (a range of options reflecting a top and bottom line). I know that General Allen put considerable thought into his assessment of the conditions on the ground, and what it will take to accomplish the currently assigned missions sets, sustain the gains achieved over the past 12+ years, successfully conduct transition/ retrograde and properly secure our forces. Based upon my experiences in Iraq and my current understanding of operations in Afghanistan I believe the recommendations Gen Allen made are sound.

If confirmed, one of my first priorities will be to visit Afghanistan, talk with Gen Dunford and conduct a complete assessment of all factors and conditions on the ground.

Respectfully,

General Lloyd J. Austin III
Vice Chief of Staff, Army

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you.

Senator KAINE. We'll move to a second round.

I just want to point out that the questions that the witnesses both answered at the beginning indicated that they would provide answers unless they had a good-faith reason, in consultation with the committee, not to provide them. I believe some of General Austin's answers have kind of been along that scheme. But, to follow that instruction, and he will come back to the committee.

Senator GRAHAM. That's it, Mr. Chairman, I——

General AUSTIN. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. Really, I think we have a right to get this, but I don't want to put these gentleman in a bad spot.

General AUSTIN. Right.

Senator GRAHAM. That's why I'm going to wait.

Senator KAINE. Either we'll get the answer or a good-faith description for why you believe certain conversations cannot be revealed. We'll get one or the other.

We'll move to a second round of questions, with no one here who has not asked a first round.

I'll go to Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I share Senator Graham's request, and, obviously, would like to understand, if you can't provide that information, why that is, because I think that is something important for this committee to take up, because we have to make decisions on resources that are very important, and we have an oversight function. I very much respect the President's function as Commander in Chief, but this is a very important issue.

We were on the same trip to Afghanistan, and having seen the conditions on the ground, and having been to a recent deployment ceremony, I just want to make sure, also, when our guys are still there, that we have enough people there to protect the guys and gals we have on the ground. I appreciate that very much.

I have a question for General Rodriguez. Can you help me understand what's happening in eastern Libya right now with the Qaddafi arms cache that was not secured after the NATO activity in Libya? What is happening with those arms? Where are they going? What efforts are we making to secure those arms?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, ma'am. They had significant arms caches throughout Libya; and many of them, of course, in eastern Libya, which is the most unstable part of Libya right now. The Intelligence Community has assessed that those continue to move. Many of them have moved southwest, toward the northern Mali issue, and has increased the capacity of al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb.

The United States and allies have several initiatives to try to attempt to stem that flow. Most of them are on training and equipping efforts for both the Libyan army as well as the Libyan border control people who benefit from some of the training that we're doing.

Then, the military-to-military relationships and the coordination that we're doing are all focused to try to get those under control and limit the ability of that to continue to migrate away from Libya and into the hands of terrorists.

Senator AYOTTE. Just so we understand—when we were on our trip, we also went to Egypt—those arms are being trafficked through the Sinai; the arms are going into Syria; they are also going into Mali and other places, where they're getting in the wrong hands. That continues, as we sit here today.

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, ma'am, that continues, again, in all those directions, that's right. It's not only toward Africa, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. In eastern Libya right now, we have those military-to-military relations, but we don't have a position where the Libyan Government is actually stopping the transfer of those arms, right now, to the wrong people.

General RODRIGUEZ. Eastern Libya is the most destabilized place, and the militias—there's no state control of many of those militias, and that's a challenge that the government is dealing with right now.

Senator AYOTTE. So, we still really need to get much tougher on these arms. This is a dangerous situation, there have been reports that some of these arms may include Manportable Air-Defense Systems (MANPADS), correct?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, that's correct, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. I hope that, certainly, we need to take greater action on this, because these arms are very dangerous. They're getting into the hands of terrorists, and this is continuing. I look forward to supporting you and the administration to take whatever steps need to be taken to make sure that happens.

I would also point out that I believe that this is one of the reasons when we think about the concept of a light footprint, and we're engaged in an area, that those arms should have been secured right following our involvement so that we weren't in the situation where we're chasing them around, trying to get them from dangerous individuals, who are then using it to attack us and our allies.

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, ma'am.

Senator KAINE. General Austin, General Rodriguez, a quick question. Would you agree with me that the number of troops in any theater is not an end, but it is a means to an end, a means to accomplishing a defined mission?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, sir.

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

Senator KAINE. If you are each confirmed in your positions, do you agree that, at any time, if you think that the number of troops assigned, or the number of troops you're dealing with, is not sufficient to accomplish the end that you are charged with accomplishing, that you'll share that concern, under appropriate channels, with your colleagues and superiors?

General RODRIGUEZ. I will, sir.

General AUSTIN. I will.

Senator KAINE. All right.

Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. If we told both of you that you're the only two soldiers left in Afghanistan, you would stay and fight to the end, wouldn't you?

General AUSTIN. If there's work to be done, Senator, I would.

Senator GRAHAM. Would you also tell us, "We have a high opinion of ourselves, but the chance of success would be pretty low"?

General AUSTIN. That's correct.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. What I want to know is, do you agree with me, General Austin, the last card to play in Afghanistan is the residual follow-on force, in terms of our presence of "closing the deal"? This is a very important decision to make.

General AUSTIN. Yes, sir, I would.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. I appreciate that very much.

Senator Kaine, you're absolutely right about numbers, but General Austin, is Iran watching what we're doing in the region?

General AUSTIN. They clearly are, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with that, General Rodriguez?

General RODRIGUEZ. Sir, everybody's watching what we're doing.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. If Syria is deteriorating—and we seem to be leading from behind there—if Iraq is deteriorating, and we pick a number in Afghanistan that makes it a high likelihood of failure, that would be sending the wrong signals, do you agree, to the Iranians, if what I say is true?

General AUSTIN. I would, sir, I would agree with that.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. If you had a recommendation of 8,000 troops in 2014, by 2017 we would be down to 1,000, don't you think the enemy would be focusing on the 1,000, not the 8,000?

General AUSTIN. I clearly think that they would, sir. I think that would——

Senator GRAHAM. Yes. I think that everybody would be focusing on the low number, not the high number.

I don't know what the numbers are going to be, but I do want to say this to the administration. I know the war is unpopular. I want to end it well. Like Senator Levin, I think we can be successful in Afghanistan. The key is their security forces. But, we have to have enough capability to keep them moving forward. I know the number General Allen picked.

NATO will not stay, in any numbers, if we have 1,000 troops. Do you agree with that? No NATO nation's going to get to our right.

General AUSTIN. That's my assessment, yes.

Senator GRAHAM. I'll wrap this up, Mr. Chairman, by saying that—I'll make some of my questions in writing—I believe we're at a pivotal moment in the war in Afghanistan, that NATO is not going to stay unless we show a willingness to stay beyond Kabul itself, and that the enemy will look at the bottom number, not the top number. But, if the President will follow General Allen's recommendations, within reason—and he's the President, not me; he has every right to pick the number; every military commander agrees with it, and I agree with that—but, as a member of the opposition party, and as somebody who cares about this, I will either stand with him or lodge my objections. I just want the administration to know that, if they can leave a sufficient force behind, beginning in 2014—and it can be as low as 9,000 or 10,000—that I will stand with them, that I will keep funding the Afghan army, that I want this to turn out well. I know it won't be popular at home, but it's the right thing to do. I do want the administration to know, they have every right to make this decision, but if they overrule the commanders and create a force that cannot, in my view, be successful, I cannot, in good conscience, vote to continue this operation.

Mr. Chairman, I can't think of a worse outcome for America than for us to lose in Afghanistan after a dozen years of fighting, bleeding, hundreds of billions of dollars. That's the place we were attacked from. How do you win in Pakistan if you lose in Afghanistan?

Mr. Chairman, I will end with this thought. If we don't get this residual force right to continue the momentum, Afghanistan will fall apart quicker than Iraq, and all hell is going to break out.

Thank you very much.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator.

A third round of questions, also 3 minutes.

Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. General Rodriguez, would you consider Boco Haram a terrorist organization?

General RODRIGUEZ. Senator, Boco Haram has committed some acts that can be associated with terrorism. That's a policy decision that has to be made. If confirmed, I'll study that issue and make my recommendations on whether it gets classified as a terrorist organization, or not, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. I would very much like your opinion, given some of their activities, including a car bomb attack against the United Nations headquarters.

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. I would certainly appreciate your opinion on that.

[The information referred to follows:]

Boco Haram has committed some acts that can be associated with terrorism. Designating Boco Haram as a terrorist organization is a policy decision. I will study this issue and make my recommendation on whether Boco Haram should be classified as a terrorist organization.

Senator AYOTTE. Also, General Rodriguez, in thinking about what happened in the attacks on our consulate in Benghazi, from your assessment—and obviously, you'll be taking over that area of responsibility, and you and I have talked about it—what are some of the lessons learned, do you think, from that?

General RODRIGUEZ. Ma'am, lessons learned, that both DOD and the Department of State are taken on as the gaps that were created—or were there, in intelligence—that didn't provide the sufficient indication or warnings for us to be able to respond properly. The security decisions that get made by the Department of State have to be well informed by the Department of Defense, so we need to do some closer cooperation there.

Then, the response forces that are available to the combatant commanders need to be continually looked at and appropriate for the situations that are out there throughout the region.

Senator AYOTTE. You talked about the forces that would be—as I understand it, going to Stuttgart, that we would have in place, that we didn't previously have in place—but, how's that response time, though, when you think about it? Because we're not going to be Djibouti or Aviano—and also, thinking about the air assets; will we have any AC–130s or anything that, if we had to go to that area again to respond—how would we handle it?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, ma'am. I think that, again, we'll—if confirmed, place those requirements on the Department of Defense. Again, they'll have to make some risk decisions, based on the situation across the combatant command's area of responsibility, where to put those. The best we can do is to make sure everybody understands the risk that they're incurring, so we can make good decisions on where to keep our people and where not to keep our people.

Senator AYOTTE. I look forward to continuing to—as you're confirmed, to work with you on that. I think that's a challenge that we face in that area, and particularly with what we talked about, with the arms that are still flowing in that area, that are very dangerous, to a whole host of areas that are getting in the wrong hands of al Qaeda and other terrorist organizations.

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, ma'am.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

I return the gavel to Chairman Levin.

Chairman LEVIN [presiding]. Thank you so much.

I very much appreciate, Senator Kaine, your taking over the gavel this morning.

Just a few questions, if they haven't already been asked. I was trying to catch up to what questions were being asked.

General Austin, in your judgment, are the Afghan security forces on track to assume the lead responsibility for security in Afghanistan, starting this spring?

General AUSTIN. My judgment's based upon my interaction with the commanders in the field. I was just recently in Afghanistan—during the Thanksgiving holiday—and, as I went around the country, the commanders that I talked to felt that the Afghans had developed significant capability, and were in the lead, in many cases, throughout the country. They were hopeful and very positive about where they were, and very hopeful that things would continue in the right direction.

Based upon that assessment, I think the Afghans will be capable of taking the lead in the prescribed timeline.

Chairman LEVIN. When Senator Jack Reed and I traveled to Afghanistan in January, we heard, from our military commanders, that the Afghan National Security Forces are in the lead already in the vast majority of operations and in the very challenging Regional Command East, that Afghan security forces were conducting operations by themselves in 87 percent of the operation. Have you heard that figure? If not, would that not be a very reassuring fact?

General AUSTIN. Sir, I've heard similar reports, and it is, indeed, reassuring. Again, I talk to both brigade commanders in that area and also the division commander, and they were very positive about the performance of the Afghan security forces.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

One more question on Afghanistan, and that's a subject which I've gotten into repeatedly, and Senator Graham and I have worked together to make the same point, and that has to do with the future size of Afghan security forces. The current proposal is to reduce the size of the National Security Forces in Afghanistan by about a third after 2014, from 352,000 down to approximately 230,000. I believe it sends the wrong signal to the Afghans to do that. They are looking for reassurance that the United States and our allies are committed to an enduring relationship with Afghanistan. We wrote the President again last year—Senator Graham, Senator McCain, Senator Lieberman, myself—to convey that point.

At the time when we are drawing down our troops, it is the wrong message to be drawing down or suggesting the drawdown of Afghan forces from their current level to a significantly lower level.

I'm wondering, General Austin, whether or not you feel that we should keep the Afghan security forces at the 352,000 level beyond 2014.

General AUSTIN. Sir, I think keeping the larger-sized force would certainly, as you pointed out, reassure the Afghans. It would also reassure our NATO allies that we remain committed.

In addition to that, sir, I think a larger Afghan force would help to hedge against any future Taliban mischief. You could reasonably expect that an enemy that's been that determined, that agile, will very soon, after we transition, begin to try to test the Afghan security forces. Further, I think that size of a force provides additional capability to allow the political processes to mature a bit. I think, because of that, it seems to me that a larger force would be of benefit.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Just one question for you, General Rodriguez, and this has to do with the in-extremis force that is desirable, and other contingency response forces that would be useful, to put the AFRICOM commander in a stronger position to respond to contingencies such as we saw in Benghazi. If you've not been asked that question, can you tell us whether you would look for ways to find the greater capability to provide contingency response forces, beyond what they currently are, and were, in the case of the Benghazi matter?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, Senator, I would. If confirmed, that will be one of the top priorities I have, and I'll report back to the committee on that. They've already made some significant improvements in that, and we have to continue to do that.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Thank you both. We look forward to your confirmation.

Again, I want to thank Senator Kaine for taking over this morning. It's very much appreciated.

General RODRIGUEZ. Thank you, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. We will stand adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 12:05 p.m., the committee adjourned.]

[Prepared questions submitted to GEN Lloyd J. Austin III, USA, by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the military departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. The Department has made great progress in the joint arena since the enactment of Goldwater-Nichols. The Services and Joint competencies have proven their effectiveness and capabilities in more than a decade of war. While there is no room for complacency, I don't believe there is a need for any major modifications to the act.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. I do not believe there is a need for any major modifications to the Goldwater-Nichols Act. Beyond the Act, however, Congress may want to look at ways to increase integration of non-military agencies in appropriate training and force readiness environments in order to build a more effective whole-of-government approach to crisis prevention and resolution.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. Section 162(b) of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense, and from the Secretary of Defense to the combatant commands. Other sections of law and traditional practice, however, establish important relationships outside the chain of command. Please describe your understanding of the relationship of the Commander, U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM), to the following officials:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. Subject to direction from the President, the Commander, CENTCOM performs duties under the authority, direction and control of the Secretary of Defense. In addition, the Commander, CENTCOM is responsible to the Secretary of Defense for the preparedness of the command to carry out its missions.

Question. The Under Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. Commander, CENTCOM coordinates and exchanges information with the Under Secretaries of Defense as needed to set and meet CENTCOM priorities and requirements for support.

Question. The Assistant Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. Commander, CENTCOM coordinates and exchanges information with the Assistant Secretaries of Defense as needed to set and meet CENTCOM priorities and requirements for support.

Question. The Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Chairman is the principal military advisor to the President, National Security Council and the Secretary of Defense. Section 163 of title 10, U.S. Code, allows communication between the President or the Secretary of Defense and the combatant commanders to flow through the Chairman. As is custom and traditional practice, and as instructed by the Unified Command Plan, I would communicate with the Secretary through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I anticipate a close dialogue with the Chairman on all significant matters.

I would communicate and coordinate with the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff as required and in the absence of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. The Service Secretaries and Service Chiefs.

Answer. The Secretaries of the Military Departments are responsible for the administration and support of forces assigned to the combatant commands. Commander, CENTCOM coordinates closely with the Secretaries to ensure that requirements to organize, train, and equip forces for CENTCOM are met.

Commander, CENTCOM communicates and exchanges information directly with the Service Chiefs to facilitate their responsibility for organizing, training and equipping forces. Successful execution of the CENTCOM mission responsibilities requires close coordination with the Service Chiefs. If confirmed, I intend to work closely with the Service Chiefs to understand the capabilities of their Services to clearly communicate to them the CENTCOM theater's requirements and to ensure effective employment of the Services' capabilities in the joint and coalition execution of the CENTCOM mission.

Question. Commander, U.S. Special Operations Command.

Answer. Commander, CENTCOM maintains a unique relationship with Commander, U.S. Special Operations Command, due to the volume of collaboration required to successfully execute missions within the area of responsibility. Our relationship, like those with other combatant commanders, is critical to the execution of our National Military Strategy and characterized by mutual support, frequent contact and productive exchanges of information on key issues.

Question. The other combatant commanders.

Answer. Commander, CENTCOM maintains a close relationship with other geographic and functional combatant commanders. These relationships are critical to the execution of our National Military Strategy and are characterized by mutual support, frequent contact and productive exchanges of information on key issues.

Question. Commander, North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), Afghanistan/Commander, U.S. Forces-Afghanistan (USFOR–A).

Answer. Commander, CENTCOM maintains operational control (OPCON) over U.S. Forces assigned to NATO–ISAF in his role as the Commander, USFOR–A, which is CENTCOM's current main effort and top priority for mission support. For forces further assigned from USFOR–A to NATO–ISAF, this OPCON authority is largely transferred to Joint Forces Command Brunssum and Supreme Allied Commander Europe as "NATO–OPCOM". Thus mission direction for NATO–ISAF is a shared responsibility between CENTCOM and SACEUR chains of command. For this reason we moderate any interactions with Commander NATO–ISAF by close coordination with Commander JFC Brunssum and SACEUR.

Question. The respective U.S. Chiefs of Mission within the CENTCOM AOR.

Answer. Commander, CENTCOM maintains a close working relationship with all U.S. Ambassadors to countries in the CENTCOM region. We coordinate carefully to ensure that operational and security cooperation activities remain consistent with each Ambassador's priorities and Mission Strategic Plan as needed to ensure unity of effort between U.S. military and other U.S. Government activities in the CENTCOM region.

Question. The respective U.S. Senior Defense Officials/Defense Attachés (SDO/DATT).

Answer. Commander, CENTCOM is in the rating scheme for Defense Attachés and maintains close relationships and coordination with Senior Defense Officials. The commander relies on the SDOs to provide the information necessary to ensure that CENTCOM's security cooperation activities stay in-step with each Ambassador's priorities and Mission Strategic Plan.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. If confirmed, you will be entering this important position at a critical time for CENTCOM.

What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. Over the course of my 37-plus years serving in the U.S. military, I have commanded at every level, to include at the Corps and Theater levels. I spent much of the past decade commanding forces throughout the CENTCOM region. At the two-star level, I commanded 10th Mountain Division and Task Force-180 in Afghanistan. At the three-star level, I commanded Multi-National Corps-Iraq. Most recently, as Commander of U.S. Forces-Iraq, I commanded all forces in that country and oversaw the successful transfer of responsibilities to the Iraqi Security Forces and U.S. State Department representatives, as well as the transition of military forces and equipment out of Iraq. I have worked closely with partners from across the Interagency and have existing relationships with civil and military leaders throughout the CENTCOM AOR. My past experiences have afforded me an in-depth understanding of the nuanced challenges and opportunities that exist in that region of the world. I also served previously as Director of the Joint Staff and as CENTCOM Chief of Staff. These experiences have provided me with an understanding of the command as well as some of the relationships and processes that exist at the highest levels.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND OPPORTUNITIES

Question. If confirmed as the Commander of CENTCOM, you will be responsible for all military operations in the CENTCOM area of responsibility.

In your view, what are the major challenges and opportunities that would confront you if you are confirmed as the next Commander of CENTCOM?

Answer. The Middle East represents an extremely complex and dynamic environment. Ethnic, sectarian and ideology-based conflicts are continuing to play out within countries and between countries across the region. Challenges abound; as do opportunities. Among the many challenges we are faced with is the significant threat posed by violent extremist organizations. Our priorities in the near-term are: (1) Afghanistan—we must continue to support the mission, with some ~66,000 servicemembers still serving in country; (2) Iran—we want to see a non-nuclear Iran that respects its neighbors; (3) Syria—we would like to see an end to the civil war and a stable government; and (4) The broader Middle East—we want a region where stability and security prevails; we want the conditions set to allow for economic growth and opportunity; and, representative government that is underpinned by rule of law. In general, we want a region where all States play a constructive role in managing and maintaining stability. Our key opportunities lie in the domain of collective security and building regional partners' security capacities. Many of our partners in the region have shown interest and made steady progress to date in taking on their share of regional security. We will continue to encourage this interest and capacity building across the region.

Question. If confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges and opportunities?

Answer. I will address these challenges and opportunities using four principle levers: military-to-military engagements, plans and operations, security cooperation programs, and posture and presence. CENTCOM will employ these levers always focused on working by, with and through our partners to the greatest extent allowable to bolster regional security and promote stability. Military-to-military engagements lay the foundation for and bolster our broader diplomatic and political relationships. It is often the bedrock of the relationship and affords us the trust necessary to dialogue quietly about contentious issues. Plans and operations are developed and executed in conjunction with our fellow combatant commands, interagency organizations and international partners as necessary to address developing contingency and crisis situations. Security Cooperation Programs build partner capacity as the responsible way to reduce U.S. presence in the region and effectively support their ability to carry more of the region's security burden. Posture and presence in the future will be leaner but supported by a base infrastructure that enables rapid reinforcement.

Question. One challenge with which you may have to deal, if confirmed, is the impact of the combination of sequestration and the Continuing Resolution on the ability of the Military Services to meet the demands of the combatant commanders as well as the execution of your operating budget. Admiral Winnefeld, the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff was recently quoted as saying, "We are taking a very close look at how we 'appetite suppress' some of the demand signals that are out there," he said. "We find that there are some forces out there in the world today that have been asked for and have been provided to (combatant commanders) that might be servicing a lower level of interest."

What is your understanding and assessment of the impact of pending Defense budget cuts to CENTCOM's operational planning, requests for forces, and operating budgets? If confirmed, how would you prioritize the use of available funds?

Answer. All Service Chiefs have been clear and consistent in saying that sequestration will have devastating impacts on operations. That said, they've also been clear in stating that they will continue to support the ongoing operations in Afghanistan, first and foremost. But, there is shared concern about the impact of cuts on the readiness of forces responding to emerging contingencies. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Military Service components to address any concerns they have with meeting our high priority operational requirements. I will also defend the authorities which support our strategic partnerships which are vital to our ability to promote regional security and stability throughout the region.

Question. In your opinion, what are your considerations or alternatives if an adequate aircraft carrier presence in the Gulf cannot be sustained by the Navy beyond March 2013?

Answer. The prudent measure is to maintain continuous aircraft presence in the Arabian Gulf region, with two carriers in assessed periods of heightened risk. Maintaining a credible naval force in the region covered by sufficient aviation combat power is essential for demonstrating an enduring commitment to regional partners, building trust and relationships, and the rapid projection of power in a crisis. While naval and air component commanders continue to work alternative strategies to deliver combat power in the Arabian Gulf from a single carrier positioned outside of the Gulf, these alternatives are predicated upon uninterrupted access to overseas bases and facilities.

Question. If sequestration were to occur, what would be your assessment of the level of risk to the U.S. national security objectives in the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. Sequestration would significantly increase the risk to ongoing missions in the CENTCOM AOR. Certainly we can expect that if sequestration occurs those units that are required to address emerging challenges will be less ready than in the past or have less capability. While the effects of sequestration will negatively impact all of the services and combatant commanders, sequestration will arguably have the greatest operational impact on the CENTCOM AOR due to geography, the pace of ongoing combat operations and the likelihood of numerous contingencies.

DEFENSE STRATEGIC GUIDANCE

Question. The Defense Strategic Guidance, "Sustaining U.S. Global Leadership: Priorities for the 21st Century Defense", announced by President Obama on January 5, 2012, includes, among other things, the intention of the administration and the Pentagon to "rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific region." In his associated remarks, Secretary Panetta explained that the "U.S. military will increase its institutional weight and focus on enhanced presence, power projection, and deterrence in Asia-Pacific. . . . At the same time, the United States will place a premium in maintaining our military presence and capabilities in the broader Middle East."

What do you anticipate will be the impact of this guidance on the operations and activities of CENTCOM?

Answer. The guidance does increase emphasis on the Asia-Pacific region while enhancing U.S. technological capabilities in the PACOM area of responsibility (AOR). However, our Defense Strategic Guidance reflects a global strategy. The world we live in remains complex and extremely volatile. In fact, much of the instability resides in the CENTCOM AOR where significant challenges persist. While I understand that in an era of constrained resources we must prioritize; the combatant commander is responsible for ensuring that, at all times, the command is postured to protect vital national interests in the region. If confirmed, I will continue to assess conditions in the CENTCOM AOR and request the resources required to sustain operations.

READINESS OF FORCES

Question. What is your assessment of the readiness of U.S. Forces that have been deployed to Operation Enduring Freedom?

Answer. Our forces are the best-trained, best-equipped, and most experienced in our Nation's history; and, that includes forces deployed to Afghanistan in support of Operation Enduring Freedom (OEF). Pre-deployment training at the various joint training centers provides tailored counterinsurgency scenarios and incorporates up-to-the-minute lessons learned from troops on the ground in Afghanistan. I have worked hard in my current position as Vice Chief of Staff of the Army to ensure that all levels of command are appropriately focused on ensuring the continued and future readiness of U.S. Forces in theater.

Question. Have you observed any significant trends in or apparent gaps with respect to personnel, equipment, or training readiness in units as they deploy to or upon their arrival in Afghanistan?

Answer. No. Overall, the readiness of units arriving in the AOR has been high and the Services have done well preparing units to deploy. Where issues have arisen, the Services have been adaptive and they have routinely incorporated feedback from theater thereby making necessary adjustments in force preparations.

Question. What are your views, if any, on the growing debate over whether U.S. Forces are putting too much emphasis on preparing for counterinsurgency and irregular warfare operations or too little emphasis on preparing for high intensity force-on-force conflict and full spectrum operations?

Answer. This debate reflects how the U.S. military has adapted over the past decade-plus of war. Army doctrine reflects this adaptation, stating that our formations must be capable of performing unified land operations across a broad range of operations: offense, defense, stability, and defense support to civil authorities. There is a recurring dialogue between commanders at all echelons to ensure that there is a shared understanding of the essential tasks that must be trained. The commanders' assessment of the situation, mission, time, and resources drives how commanders execute unit training and preparation. Ultimately, this is a dynamic process. It is at the heart of the military's efforts to build and sustain readiness, and it ensures that our formations are capable of accomplishing the mission across the full range of operations.

Question. What is your opinion on adding a third maneuver battalion to the Brigade Combat Team structure?

Answer. The addition of the third maneuver battalion will greatly enhance the depth, versatility and combat capability of our Brigade Combat Teams (BCT). Analysis shows that the redesigned BCT will provide equal capacity to meet combat commander demand while providing a more robust formation at the point of decision. The three battalion design is more lethal, survivable and flexible. Importantly, it also increases the commander's options as the formations execute operations across the full range of military operations. Ultimately, the addition of the third maneuver battalion is a key development for the Army as it transitions from current fight and postures for the next conflict.

AFGHANISTAN COUNTERINSURGENCY STRATEGY

Question. Do you support the counterinsurgency strategy for Afghanistan?

Answer. Yes, I support the current approach of: (1) building Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF) capacity; (2) countering violent extremist organizations; and (3) setting conditions for final transfer to ANSF control and change of mission by the end of December 2014.

Question. If confirmed, are there changes you would recommend to the U.S. strategy in Afghanistan?

Answer. The current strategy is showing progress; and, I have every confidence in the commanders leading the effort. That said, if confirmed, I will continually assess the situation on the ground, consult with U.S. leaders, partners, regional leaders and NATO commanders and provide my best military advice on this matter to my chain of command. I will also follow up with the members of this committee, as requested.

Question. What is your assessment of the progress of the campaign in Afghanistan?

Answer. Efforts to counter the insurgency and prevent terrorist safe havens have been and remain effective. Coalition operations have continued to focus on degrading insurgent networks while building the capacity of our ANSF partners to maintain security. We were largely successful during the 2012 fighting season and we met our campaign objective to force the enemy out of population centers. We continue to transition the responsibility for security to the ANSF and we have seen a decrease in violence in areas under ANSF responsibility. That being said, challenges remain—particularly in areas along the border with Pakistan and areas in southern Afghanistan where the Taliban continues to operate. There also remain the dual challenges of narcotics and corruption that threaten long-term stability. Afghanistan's nascent government and upcoming elections scheduled for 2014 also pose significant challenges with respect to maintaining the gains achieved in recent years.

SECURITY TRANSITION IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. President Obama and Afghan President Karzai recently announced that the transition to an Afghan lead for security throughout Afghanistan will occur this spring, a few months ahead of schedule. As part of the ongoing transition, coalition forces are shifting increasingly to an advise-and-assist mission but will continue to support Afghan security forces until the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) mission concludes by no later than the end of 2014.

Do you support the announced transition of the security lead to Afghan security forces throughout Afghanistan by this spring?

Answer. Yes, I support plans for ANSF assuming the lead for security across all of Afghanistan by mid-2013, as agreed to at the Chicago NATO Summit in May 2012. The current security situation and capability of ANSF supports continued adherence to the transition plan. Afghans have already assumed the lead through much of the country and have validated NATO's incremental decisions to make these transfers. That said, we will certainly incorporate lessons learned from our experiences in Iraq. Among them we recognize that ISAF will be called upon to provide critical enablers and advisory support to the ANSF as they assume the lead for security operations. ISAF will also be required to maintain sufficient combat power to respond to contingencies and conduct operations alongside the ANSF.

Question. Do you support the shift in the mission of coalition forces to an increasingly advise-and-assist role in support of Afghan security forces?

Answer. Yes. The current situation supports the shift to an advise-and-assist mission in support of ANSF. If confirmed, I will monitor changing conditions and dialogue with commanders, regional leaders and partners to ensure the situation supports the employment of general purpose forces in a Security Force Assistance (SFA) role. Balanced SFA enables ISAF to provide tailored forces that support sustainable development of the ANSF as they move into the lead, as well as special and general purpose forces to support developing Afghan Army and Police operations through 2014. The ultimate aim is to build ANSF capacity and set conditions for them to assume lead for the security of their country. Much like in Iraq, as the ANSF capabilities and capacity improve, coalition forces will provide less frequent training and advice at the lower levels and focus efforts at the higher echelons to better integrate our enabler support.

Question. Do you agree that the success of the mission in Afghanistan depends on having Afghan security forces, rather than coalition forces, taking the lead for security and conducting unilateral operations to the maximum extent?

Answer. Yes. History has shown that indigenous forces are best suited to assume lead responsibility for the security of their country. A great deal of the country has already transitioned to ANSF in the lead, and we have seen low levels of violence in these transitioned areas. ISAF will continue to provide critical enablers and advisory support to ANSF formations as they assume lead responsibilities.

Question. What is your assessment of the capacity and performance of the Afghan security forces in assuming the lead for security in areas designated for transition, including in contested areas?

Answer. Over the past several years, we have helped grow the ANSF into a force that will eventually reach 352,000. The ANSF is steadily improving in military capability and professionalism. There is still work to be done before they will be self-sufficient and capable of providing sustainable security for the long term. However, the ANSF is on track to assume full security responsibility across Afghanistan by the end of 2014. During 2012, the Afghan National Army demonstrated their ability to plan, conduct and sustain large-scale operations. Their combat enabler capabilities are still developing due to late fielding, but they are improving in their ability to conduct fire support, rotary wing support and even limited medical evacuation.

Question. Do you believe that a responsible transition of the mission for U.S. Forces in Afghanistan from combat to a support role should be based on conditions on the ground in Afghanistan?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will work closely with leaders in theater, to include General Dunford, to assess the conditions on the ground and provide my best military advice with respect to the transition of mission to my chain of command.

Question. Under the current conditions in Afghanistan, would you support making such a transition by no later than the end of 2014?

Answer. I support the current plan to complete the transition by the end of 2014, per the President's policy. If confirmed, I will continue to assess the situation, along with the leaders on the ground, and provide my best military advice on the timeline and related transition requirements.

Question. What conditions, if any, would drive you to recommend to the President to not transition from a combat to a support role?

Answer. We are transitioning from leading partnered counterinsurgency operations to providing Security Force Assistance through training, advising and assisting the ANSF based on the current assessment of conditions on the ground. A number of factors were considered when making the decision on pace and course of our transition efforts. Indeed, it would be difficult to name a single factor that would drive a commander to recommend a change to the current plan. If confirmed, I will continue to assess conditions on the ground and provide my best military advice to my chain of command.

DRAW DOWN OF U.S. FORCES IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. In September 2012 the drawdown of the 33,000 U.S. surge force in Afghanistan was completed, bringing U.S. troop levels down to approximately 68,000. President Obama recently reaffirmed his pledge to continue the drawdown of U.S. Forces from Afghanistan at a steady pace. He also stated he would soon announce the next phase of the U.S. drawdown based on the recommendations of the ISAF Commander and other commanders on the ground in Afghanistan.

What is your understanding of the missions to be conducted by any residual U.S. Force that may remain in Afghanistan after 2014?

Answer. My understanding of the missions to be conducted by residual U.S. Forces remaining in Afghanistan after 2014 will be counterterrorism; train, advise, and assist the ANSF; and provide support to Department of State civilian missions. Most importantly, force protection is inherent in everything we do in theater.

Question. In your current position as Vice Chief of Staff of the Army, have you provided any recommendations on the size and missions of any residual U.S. Force that may remain in Afghanistan after 2014?

Answer. No.

Question. Based on your experience as the Vice Chief of Staff of the Army and your experience in the Iraq drawdown, what missions and force size do you recommend for a residual U.S. Force in post-2014 Afghanistan?

Answer. I am not currently in a position to provide such a recommendation. I would defer to the current CENTCOM commander and the commander on the ground to provide their recommendations.

Question. In your view, how should the requirement to provide force protection for our troops be taken into consideration in any decision on the size of a residual U.S. Force in Afghanistan post-2014?

Answer. Force protection is an inherent part of everything we do and therefore must be included in the planning effort.

Question. How does the early transition to Afghan lead for security announced by Presidents Obama and Karzai impact our mission and objectives for the 2013 and 2014 fighting seasons?

Answer. The transition is and has always been conditions and capability based. The early transition announcements reflect the improving security situation in Afghanistan and ANSF's capabilities to assume the lead and should have no impact on our mission objectives.

Question. What force structure do you think is appropriate for the 2013 and 2014 fighting seasons?

Answer. If confirmed, I will assess the force structure capabilities and capacities that we will maintain over the next 2 years to ensure they continue to meet our objectives. We will transition to full security lead by the Afghans in the spring and we will need to ensure that we have set the proper conditions for successful elections in 2014. We will also need to ensure that we have the proper forces to smoothly transition to the train, advise and assist mission by December 2014.

Question. What, in your view, should be the pace of reductions in U.S. Forces during each of 2013 and 2014?

Answer. This is an operational maneuver. As such, the pace of reductions should be based on the commander's assessment, the enemy situation, conditions on the ground, to include ANSF capabilities, and mission requirements in order to maintain the campaign's momentum and to avoid jeopardizing the gains we have made. At the same time, we must be clear that we will not abandon Afghanistan. This is a decisive time in the country's history and decisions we make now regarding degrees of support, how the U.S. drawdown proceeds, to include the preservation of enablers in terms of logistics, medical evacuation, communications, and air support will be essential for our partners.

LOGISTICAL CHALLENGES

Question. What is your assessment of the speed and reliability of logistical convoys through the Pakistan Ground Lines of Communication (GLOC) to support our forces in Afghanistan?

Answer. Movement in Pakistan is subject to a number of recurring challenges including environmental conditions, political factors and the ongoing security situation. We have cleared out nearly all cargo previously stranded in Pakistan as a result of the closure that began in November of 2011, and we recently commenced test shipments of new cargo. We anticipate challenges as the Government of Pakistan (GOP) struggles internally to implement new transit processes that were agreed to during 2012. The GOP appears committed to resolving these issues and facilitating successful, sustained cargo movement. It is our intent to use the PAK GLOC consistent with route capacities, GOP capabilities, the security situation, and environmental conditions.

Question. In your view, what improvements, if any, need to be made in light of the logistical throughput rate of the Pakistan GLOC?

Answer. The current proven capacity of the PAK GLOC will support the volumes that we anticipate being shipped via Pakistan. Infrastructure improvements are not required to support anticipated volumes, but may provide a positive impact supporting longer term nation building, transit and trade in the region.

Question. To what extent has CENTCOM developed a common operating picture to improve its processes for tracking equipment and supplies in Afghanistan?

CENTCOM leverages both automated systems of record and manual reporting processes to obtain a common picture of equipment and supplies in Afghanistan. In addition, CENTCOM is partnering with the Joint Staff and U.S. Transportation Command (TRANSCOM) to develop a common operating picture to track the end-to-end retrograde process.

Question. General Austin, you served as the Commanding General of U.S. Forces-Iraq during the withdrawal of U.S. Forces from Iraq consistent with the 31 December 2011 deadline in the U.S.-Iraq Security Agreement.

Taking into account your experience in Iraq, what are the biggest risks and mitigation strategies associated with drawing down U.S. Forces from Afghanistan and retrograding military equipment to the United States?

Answer. The geographic and topographic complexities of Afghanistan will make the retrograde of materiel and personnel very challenging. The largest risk to retrograde operations is the threat of disruption to PAK GLOC and the Northern Distribution Network (NDN) operations. To mitigate this risk, the CENTCOM Materiel Recovery Element (CMRE) was established to increase both volume and velocity of retrograde efforts. Transition and retrograde will also need to be conducted while contending with an able and determined enemy. As the size of our footprint shrinks, force protection and availability of enablers will increase in importance.

Question. How do you intend to address any conflicts between the objectives of mission accomplishment in the 2013 and 2014 fighting seasons and the logistical challenge of drawing down forces and retrograding military equipment?

Answer. The accomplishment of our mission in 2013 and 2014 fighting seasons will be inextricably linked to the imperative of drawing down forces and retrograding equipment. The drawdown and retrograde are in themselves significant military operations that must be fully nested within the ground tactical plan and plans for operational maneuver. Fighting season considerations, force levels and retrograde actions cannot be considered in isolation. The ground commander must plan operations, assess risk and mitigate conflicts as a whole to ensure all efforts within theater are nested and synchronized.

STATUS OF FORCES AGREEMENT FOR AFGHANISTAN

Question. As called for in the Enduring Strategic Partnership Agreement signed in May, the United States and Afghanistan are holding talks on a Bilateral Security Agreement, which will provide essential protections for any limited U.S. military presence in Afghanistan after 2014.

Do you agree that it is essential that any status of forces agreement for U.S. military forces in Afghanistan after 2014 provide immunity for U.S. troops from prosecution in Afghan courts?

Answer. Yes. Exclusive jurisdiction is an essential requirement.

Question. If confirmed, would you recommend that the United States withdraw its military forces from Afghanistan if those forces do not have such immunity?

Answer. Yes. Without jurisdiction over our troops, our activity in Afghanistan must be limited to traditional security assistance. Combat and training activities cannot be conducted without this protection.

Question. Based on your experience in the Iraq drawdown, what are the risks associated with removing all U.S. military forces from Afghanistan?

Answer. Removing all U.S. military forces threatens the achievements gained in Afghanistan over the last 12 years of sustained combat. Such a withdrawal could open the door to a return of al Qaeda, collapse of the Government of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan and lead to increased instability in the region. Also, it could delay the maturation of Afghan forces at a critical point in their development.

AFGHANISTAN NATIONAL SECURITY FORCES

Question. What is your assessment of the progress in developing a professional and effective Afghanistan National Security Forces (ANSF)?

Answer. ANSF operational effectiveness continues a general upward trend as they continue to improve and professionalize. The ANSF have increasingly taken the lead in areas previously secured by U.S. surge forces, and have been able to expand their reach, occupying patrol bases and combat outposts that had previously been too dangerous to hold. The ANSF have also increased their abilities to plan, carry out, and sustain high-level kinetic actions involving multiple ANSF forces.

Question. What is your assessment of the capacity of the ANSF to take the security lead and to conduct unilateral operations?

Answer. The ANSF have made substantial progress during the past year, and are steadily building a force that will assume full responsibility for security operations throughout Afghanistan by the end of 2014. The ANSF are unilaterally conducting the vast majority of operations in Afghanistan, although many of these are routine patrols. Force generation and development efforts continue to yield advancements in operational effectiveness. During the previous year, ANSF made strides in performance, increasingly moving into the lead for security operations. As of the end of the last reporting period, ANSF partnered with ISAF on more than 90 percent of all operations and was in the lead in more than 50 percent of these actions.

Question. What do you see as the main challenges to building the capacity of the ANSF and, if confirmed, what recommendations, if any, would you make for addressing those challenges?

Answer. There are five key challenges to building the capacity and capability of the ANSF: leadership, logistics, counter-IED, attrition and literacy. Counter-IED continues to pose a significant challenge. Attrition rates have improved; however, we must continue to monitor levels. We must also continue to help the ANSF to professionalize the force; train and develop leaders; build their enabler capacity; and, further expand literacy which will have a lasting impact on the country. If confirmed, I will work closely with General Dunford to ensure that he has the resources necessary to develop a sufficient and sustainable ANSF that can operate independently of coalition assistance.

Question. Do you support plans for building and sustaining the ANSF at 352,000 personnel?

Answer. Yes. The target end strength provides the capacity for achieving security and stability in Afghanistan.

Question. Do you agree that any reductions in the ANSF from this 352,000 level should be based on security conditions in Afghanistan at the time those reductions would be expected to occur?

Answer. Yes. A sufficient and sustainable ANSF is necessary for Afghanistan's long-term stability and security. The current ANSF sustainment plan will maintain Afghan forces at surge strength of 352,000 through 2018, to allow for continued progress toward a sustainable secure environment in Afghanistan. As security conditions on the ground continue to improve, ANSF will undergo a gradual, managed force reduction to a final force structure that is both adequate to meet security requirements and fiscally sustainable in the long term.

INSIDER THREAT

Question. In 2012 the number of so-called "green-on-blue" incidents, in which ANSF personnel or ANSF impersonators attacked U.S. or coalition soldiers, increased significantly. The rise in the number of insider attacks has led U.S. and Afghan military leaders to take a number of precautions against such insider threats, including expanding Afghan counterintelligence efforts to identify possible Taliban infiltrators, increasing cultural sensitivity training, and expanding the "Guardian Angel" program to protect against the insider threat in meetings between coalition and Afghan forces.

What in your view are the causes of the increase in insider attacks and what has been their impact on the military campaign in Afghanistan?

Answer. Insider attacks are an insurgent tactic designed to create a seam and sow mistrust between ISAF and ANSF forces. Most likely the increase in insider attacks reflects a combination of factors including the increase in the number of ANSF personnel and a greater number of Coalition Force (CF) trainers living and working with the ANSF. Overall, these attacks, while tragic, have not had a significant impact on the campaign.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact of these green-on-blue attacks on the level of trust between coalition and Afghan forces?

Answer. Clearly these types of attacks have the potential to impact morale and to compromise bonds among coalition members. However, during my recent visit to Afghanistan I did not see indications of either low morale or mistrust among coalition and Afghan forces.

Question. What is your assessment of the measures that have been taken by ISAF and Afghan leaders to address the insider threat? Are there additional steps that you would recommend to address this threat, if confirmed?

Answer. Since January 2012, there has been a significant increase in the ISAF and ANSF efforts to mitigate insider attacks. In August 2012, ISAF and the ANSF forces formed the Insider Threat Action Group and the Insider Threat Mitigation Team to jointly identify and implement insider threat mitigation efforts. Steps are being taken by Afghans to institute a number of insider threat countermeasures and supplement the vetting process in order to remove undesirable members of the ANSF. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Commander, ISAF, to ensure appropriate measures are being taken and the necessary resources allocated to protect coalition forces.

Question. In light of the spike in insider attacks, do you see a need to reconsider current plans for embedding small Security Force Assistance Teams of U.S. military advisors with Afghan military units to assist in the transition to an Afghan security lead?

Answer. Presently, no; but, this is a critical question and if I am confirmed, I will work with General Dunford as conditions warrant to evaluate the potential risks to our embedded advisors as transition progresses.

RECONCILIATION

Question. In your view, what should be the role of the United States in any reconciliation negotiations with the Afghan Taliban and other insurgent groups?

Answer. Achieving a durable peace in Afghanistan will require some form of political settlement among Afghans. That settlement must ultimately be brokered among the Afghans themselves. Afghanistan is adamant that the Afghan Government must maintain control of any reconciliation negotiations. The U.S. role should acknowledge that the Afghanistan Government is the lead for reconciliation and focus on acting as a mediator and encouraging other nations to play a constructive role.

Question. What additional steps, if any, should the United States be taking to advance the reconciliation process?

Answer. The United States could work to bring other key AOR partners with a vested interest in securing a stable Afghanistan into the reconciliation dialogue to offer their assistance in support of the peace process.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of Afghanistan's neighbors, in particular Pakistan, in the reconciliation process?

Answer. Neighbors in the region have legitimate interests in Afghanistan and need to play a constructive role in the reconciliation process. Specifically Pakistan must take steps to ensure that militant and extremist groups cannot continue to find safe haven in Pakistani territory. It should actively support the Afghan-led process. Ultimately, Pakistan and the other regional neighbors will benefit from improved stability in Afghanistan.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. Special Operations Forces depend on general purpose forces for many enabling capabilities, including intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR); logistics; and medical evacuation. Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command, has said "I have no doubt that special operations will be the last to leave Afghanistan" and has predicted that the requirement for special operations forces may increase as general purpose forces continue to be drawn down.

If confirmed, how would you ensure adequate enabling capabilities for Special Operations Forces (SOF) as general purpose forces continue to draw down in Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with SOCOM to assess SOF enabling requirements and source them with existing CENTCOM assets or through the request for forces process.

Question. The find-fix-finish operational model is greatly enhanced by opportunities to capture and interrogate enemy personnel, but that capability may be eroded as the U.S. military and intelligence footprint is reduced. An inability to mount capture operations could lead to a greater emphasis on lethal actions, potentially affecting public opinion.

What long-term risks are imposed on counterterrorism operations in Afghanistan as a result of fundamental changes in the operational environment for SOF?

Answer. As coalition and U.S. SOF are reduced in size and scope with the drawdown, the ANSF will play an ever-increasing greater role in counterterrorism. U.S. and coalition operational risk is reduced as these forces step back and settle into a train, advise and assist capacity. Long-term strategic risk lies with the capability and capacity of ANSF SOF to efficiently and effectively execute counterterrorism. However, this risk is also reduced through adequate ANSF SOF training and with the provision of adequate operational enablers to ANSF SOF.

Question. Last April, the United States and Afghanistan signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) on the "Afghanization" of direct action counterterrorism missions in Afghanistan, which reflected the shared intention of having Afghan security forces in the lead in the conduct of such operations with U.S. Forces in a support role.

Why is it important for Afghan Special Operations Forces to be in the lead on night raids?

Answer. As a sovereign nation, Afghanistan certainly should be in the lead in these types of operations. Historically, indigenous forces defeat insurgencies. Successful transition will be characterized by our Afghan partners taking increasing responsibility for the planning and command of these night operations.

Question. General Allen and others have praised the Village Stability Operations (VSO) and Afghan Local Police (ALP) programs—both U.S. Special Operations missions—as critical elements of the counterinsurgency strategy in Afghanistan. However, President Karzai recently stated his position that U.S. Forces should withdraw from Afghan villages.

What are your views on the value of these programs and do you believe they should be part of the long-term strategy in Afghanistan (i.e. post-2014)?

Answer. Denying adversaries control over populations is essential to prevailing in a contest to establish governance. The VSO and ALP programs have proven effective by enabling local security and re-establishment or re-empowerment of traditional local governance mechanisms. "Bottom-up," population-focused stability efforts to improve security and development undermine hostile influence and control in contested, strategically important areas. These programs will prove valuable and effective as part of the long-term strategy in Afghanistan.

Question. What is your understanding of President Karzai's position with regard to the VSO and ALP programs?

Answer. President Karzai desires an Afghanistan that is protected and secured by Afghans. His support for the VSO and ALP programs hinges on them being Afghan-led, and the traditional "arbaki" (local militia) aspect of the programs. Support for these programs at the local level has heavily influenced his support for them at the national level.

Question. Recently, the Special Operations Joint Task Force-Afghanistan (SOJTF–A), was established to improve coordination among U.S., coalition, and Afghan special forces. This new command structure unified, for the first time, command of all capacity building, counterinsurgency, and counterterrorism activities conducted by special operations forces in the country.

Do you believe unified command of all special operations activities is important and if so, why?

Answer. Yes. Synchronization and unity of effort among special operations activities is absolutely critical and what a unified command provides. The recent establishment of NATO Special Operations Component Command-Afghanistan, and the Special Operations Joint Task Force-Afghanistan (NSOCC–A/SOJTF–A) into a combined organizational structure provides a robust, properly sized and structured headquarters that avoids duplication and ensures the best use of available funding, manpower and infrastructure.

Question. Do you believe general purpose forces could be assigned to the new Special Operations Joint Task Force, as has been done previously, to augment special operations forces carrying out the Village Stability Operations and Afghan Local Police programs?

Answer. General purpose and Special Operations Forces are task organized to produce superior results. It is my experience that when different forces work together they achieve outcomes that exceed their capabilities when operating alone.

AFGHAN PUBLIC PROTECTION FORCE

Question. What is your opinion of the progress and future prospects for the Afghan Public Protection Force (APPF) and its ability to transition all ISAF fixed-site and convoy security missions by March 2013?

Answer. National Training Mission-Afghanistan (NTM–A) assesses that APPF cannot achieve complete transition before September 2014 even though Presidential Decree (PD) 62 requires that all ISAF sites and convoys currently secured by Private Security Companies (PSC) be transitioned to APPF by 20 March 2013. According to PD62, if policy does not change it will be illegal to contract services of PSCs after 20 March 2013. ISAF does not currently have the process or manpower in place to undertake this task and the APPF lacks the capacity to replace all PSC-provided functions at ISAF locations. ISAF is finalizing a contingency plan relating to APPF.

NO CONTRACTING WITH THE ENEMY

Question. A year ago, at the request of the Department of Defense (DOD), we enacted the "No Contracting with the Enemy Act," which gives CENTCOM important new tools to ensure that DOD funds do not go to support individuals and entities that actively support the insurgency or actively oppose U.S. or coalition forces in Afghanistan. Earlier this month, DOD officials informed us that little action has been taken pursuant to these new authorities.

What is your understanding of the reasons for CENTCOM's failure, to date, to make aggressive use of the No Contracting with the Enemy Act?

Answer. Based on my experience in Iraq, I understand the importance of preventing funds from getting into the hands of the enemy. If confirmed, I will certainly work to ensure that CENTCOM is in compliance with the "No Contracting with the Enemy Act" provisions.

Question. What steps, if any, will you take if confirmed to ensure that CENTCOM takes full advantage of the authority provided by Congress to ensure that DOD funds do not go to support individuals and entities that oppose our interests in Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I will rely on my commanders in Afghanistan and intelligence sources to identify companies or persons that may be subject to the "No Contracting with the Enemy Act". When presented with evidence of support to the enemy or opposition to the United States or coalition, I will issue findings against those companies or persons in accordance with the authorities granted to me by Congress.

AFGHANISTAN AIR FORCE

Question. How do you believe the delays and disruptions in programs to buy airlift and light tactical aircraft for Afghanistan's air force have affected Afghanistan's ability to accept responsibility for its own security?

Answer. To date, there have been no known short-term impacts. However, as the transition continues, the ANSF will experience more equipment and personnel challenges without planned aircraft enablers. ANSF will be required to rely more on indirect fires and mobile land forces with reduced close air support.

U.S. STRATEGIC RELATIONSHIP WITH PAKISTAN

Question. What is your assessment of the strategic relationship between the United States and Pakistan? What would you consider to be areas of shared strategic interest between the two countries?

Answer. The strategic relationship between the United States and Pakistan remains strained, but is improving. Pakistan's willingness to cooperate on key U.S. goals has been limited primarily to issues such as counterterrorism and Afghanistan. As such, we have reduced the scope of our security assistance to focus on those areas where our strategic interests overlap, namely counterterrorism and counterinsurgency capabilities.

Question. What do you consider to be the major challenges in the U.S.-Pakistan strategic relationship?

Answer. Challenges do exist in the U.S.-Pakistan relationship. Among them, Pakistan's at-times divergent interests in Afghanistan, its existential fear of India and its nuclear arsenal remain roadblocks to establishing a long-term, strategic partnership. That said, Pakistan is, and will remain important to achieving U.S. goals in the region, especially as we transition in Afghanistan. The reality is that most challenges can be managed by exercising strategic patience and taking the long view on the relationship.

Question. If confirmed, what changes, if any, would you recommend for U.S. relations with Pakistan, particularly in terms of military-to-military relations?

Answer. The overall military-to-military relationship continues to improve and I believe we should seek to continue this trend. The continued importance of the Pakistan military lends credence to the continued provision of security assistance as an important engagement tool for maintaining access and influence. We must continue our "whole-of-government" approach towards Pakistan to ensure all avenues of engagement remain open.

U.S. SECURITY ASSISTANCE TO PAKISTAN

Question. Since 2001, the United States has provided significant security assistance to Pakistan. In addition, the United States has provided significant funds to reimburse Pakistan for the costs associated with military operations conducted by Pakistan along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border and other support provided in connection with Operation Enduring Freedom.

In your view, how effective has the assistance and other support that the United States has provided to Pakistan been in promoting U.S. interests?

Answer. Overall, U.S. support to Pakistan has been moderately effective in promoting U.S. interests. At best, our assistance has enabled the Pakistani military to increase its effectiveness against violent extremists. It has also enabled us to sustain military-to-military relations. However, the high level of financial support has not fully translated to the desired effects the United States anticipated.

Question. Do you support conditioning U.S. assistance and other support to Pakistan on Pakistan's continued cooperation in areas of mutual security interest?

Answer. Putting specific conditions on U.S. assistance helps to ensure that our support to Pakistan furthers U.S. interests. Without such caveats, Pakistan may be tempted to apply our support towards efforts they deem to be in their national interest, which may or may not overlap with ours.

COMBATING TERRORISM

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda (AQ) and its associated forces to the U.S. Homeland, U.S. interests overseas, and Western interests more broadly?

Answer. Despite the immense pressure placed on al Qaeda leadership in Pakistan, Afghanistan, Iraq and the Arabian Peninsula, the global al Qaeda movement remains resilient. Regional instability in CENTCOM's AOR and evolving security conditions resulting from the Arab Spring are creating opportunities and potential safe havens for the AQ movement. AQ, its affiliates and allies are exploiting weak governments in places like Yemen to gain new footholds, plan attacks against U.S. Forces, our interests, those of our Western partners and potentially the U.S. Homeland. AQ's affiliates and allies pose an enduring and persistent threat to the U.S. Homeland and Middle East stability and security.

Question. Within the CENTCOM AOR, what do you consider the highest counterterrorism priorities?

Answer. I believe the counterterrorism priorities are Pakistan, Afghanistan, Yemen, Iraq, and, in the near-term, Syria. Despite our efforts, the AQ movement remains resilient due to the rapidly changing and emerging geopolitical environment in the Middle East and North Africa. AQ senior leadership in Pakistan will likely retain their safe haven and continue to provide leadership and moral authority to AQ affiliates as U.S. and coalition forces withdraw. AQ in the Arabian Peninsula is emerging as the most dangerous of the AQ affiliates and persists as the Yemeni Government tries to dislodge the group from its southern Yemen safe haven. AQ in Iraq is reconstituting, increasing attacks meant to destabilize the Iraqi Government and incite sectarian conflict. Finally, AQ in Iraq's Syria-based offshoot, the Al-Nusrah Front, is increasing in capability and influence.

Question. What is your understanding of the Department's role in the U.S. strategy to combat terrorism in the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. The Department's role in the U.S. strategy to combat terrorism in the CENTCOM AOR is to disrupt, dismantle, and defeat al Qaeda and any Violent Extremist Organization (VEO) that poses a direct threat to U.S. assets, allies, and interests abroad. The Department must be part of a "whole-of-government" approach to combating long-term terrorism threats. Combined with diplomatic and economic mechanisms against state-enablers of terrorism, DOD can provide intelligence collection, training, support, and targeting to support counterterrorism efforts.

Question. Given your current knowledge of CENTCOM programs, do you believe the Command's resources are aligned in a manner consistent with these counterterrorism priorities?

Answer. Yes. CENTCOM resources are utilized to employ a whole-of-government approach to reach many of its desired end states mentioned above. Partnerships with U.S. Government entities such as the State Department, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Drug Enforcement Agency, the U.S. Agency for International Development, and the like are paramount in the efficient utilization of resources.

IRAQ LESSONS LEARNED

Question. Did you agree with the President's decision on the withdrawal of U.S. military forces from Iraq? If so, why? If not, why not?

Answer. Yes. Given the unwillingness of the Iraqi Government to grant protections and immunities to our servicemembers, thereby putting them at risk from prosecution in Iraqi courts, the United States had very few options. Our mission in Iraq today, which operates as part of the diplomatic mission, has been very successful at sustaining the crucial military-to-military relationship with the Iraqi Armed Forces.

Question. What do you believe are the major lessons learned from the Iraq invasion and the follow-on efforts to stabilize the country through 2011?

Answer. I believe the most significant lesson learned was that the U.S. military is as capable and resilient—people, equipment, systems, and leadership—as at any time in our history, and it reaches its full potential when integrated and synchronized across a joint framework that has unity of purpose and effect. The second lesson I took away from our Nation's commitment in Iraq was the need for a thorough, interagency, multi-national approach to planning and execution that delivers flexible military plans and operations that can be adjusted to account for the ever-changing conditions of warfare. The third lesson I took away from Iraq in December 2011 was that the military instrument of power has limitations and is best used as part of a whole-of-government(s) approach to the complex challenges we see today across the globe. Finally, I re-learned the value of close, personal relationships between coalition, host nation, interagency and other partners as teams of teams work to make progress in support of national goals.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment, if any, of the Department's adaptations or changes in policy, programs, force structure, or operational concepts based upon these lessons learned?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Department has applied several lessons learned, specifically to the approaching transition in Afghanistan. In my current position, I can see our approach to challenges is informed by experiences in Iraq. I am not in a position to assess the changes at the Department level, but there is a clear intent to use not only experiences in Iraq, but also experiences in combating terror and military engagements/operations over the past decade to inform policy, program, force structure, and operational concept decisions in the current and future environment.

Question. If confirmed, what additional changes, if any, would you propose making to policy, programs, force structure or operating concepts based on the lessons of combat and stability operations in Iraq?

Answer. Our relationship with the Iraqi security forces is incredibly important and robust. If confirmed, I will continue our efforts to improve the capability of Iraqi security forces while transitioning to a normal security relationship. Our goal has been and will continue to be a self-sufficient Iraqi military that provides for the defense of Iraq. Maintaining an appropriate sized Office of Security Cooperation in Iraq (OSC–I) with the required authorities is critical to this effort. Iraq's nascent government teeters between democracy and oligarchy. Although this problem cannot be solved solely through military means, OSC–I's success in maintaining strong military-to-military relations will afford other U.S. Government agencies the time and space needed to achieve U.S. objectives.

SECURITY SITUATION IN IRAQ

Question. What is your assessment of the current security situation in Iraq?

Answer. The tenuous security situation in Iraq reflects an immature government and security institutions, ethno-sectarian divisions and daunting external challenges. Following an unsuccessful effort by opposition political parties to unseat Prime Minister Maliki through a no confidence vote, Sunni opposition to perceived central government sectarianism and authoritarianism has intensified; and Kurdistan Regional Government and Government of Iraq security forces remain in a tense stand-off in the disputed areas around Kirkuk. Additionally, although well below 2006 levels, Iraq has been unable to break the cycle of extremist violence that has plagued the country since the withdrawal of U.S. Forces. Specifically, al Qaeda in Iraq has proven its resilience by maintaining a consistent tempo of high profile attacks against primarily government targets over the past year.

Question. What are the main challenges to stability and security in Iraq over the coming months?

Answer. The main challenges to stability include heightened Arab-Kurd tensions, unresolved sectarian tensions, extremist violence intended to undermine the government, and the potential for spillover from the Syrian conflict. The threat of an Arab-Kurd conflict has increased steadily in the past year as virtually every aspect of the Arab-Kurd relationship has worsened. Lagging political progress resulting from a lack of political reconciliation has resulted in increasing Sunni political opposition to the Shia-dominated government and made a return to sectarian violence possible. Al Qaeda in Iraq has continued its cycle of violence and appears to be well postured to sustain current levels of violence into the future. The Syrian conflict has the potential to exacerbate many of the existing tensions already present in Iraq: galvanize the Sunni opposition, strengthen AQI, flood the country with refugees, and make weapons available to extremists, all stressing the nascent Iraqi Government.

U.S.-IRAQ STRATEGIC RELATIONSHIP

Question. The withdrawal of U.S. Forces from Iraq at the end of 2011 has been described as the beginning of a new chapter in the strategic relationship between the United States and Iraq. The U.S.-Iraq Strategic Framework Agreement sets out a foundation for a normalized U.S.-Iraqi relationship in areas of mutual economic, diplomatic, cultural and security interests. Secretary of Defense Panetta and the Iraqi Minister of Defense recently signed a MOU for Defense Cooperation between the Ministry of Defense of the Republic of Iraq and the Department of Defense of the United States.

How do you see the U.S.-Iraq strategic relationship developing in the coming years and in what areas do you see potential for developing that relationship?

Answer. The domestic and regional political challenges facing Iraqi leaders are not likely to subside and could complicate our overarching strategic relationship. However, we have been quite successful over the past year in sustaining our military-to-military relationship with the Iraqi Security Forces. I believe this could serve as a launching point to further expand our economic, cultural and diplomatic relationships under the Strategic Framework Agreement.

Question. What do you see as the greatest challenges for the United States-Iraqi security relationship over the coming years?

Answer. Domestic challenges, including ethnic and sectarian tensions and a lack of inclusiveness in the political system, if not effectively addressed, will complicate our security relationship. Meanwhile, we may have differing views from our Iraqi partners on regional conflicts, such as that in Syria, which may limit Iraq's willingness to partner with us.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the recently concluded MOU? In your view, how does this agreement on defense cooperation promote U.S. security interests with respect to Iraq and the region?

Answer. In my current position I am unable to provide an informed assessment of the recently concluded MOU. I understand the MOU is an official commitment between the U.S. Government and the Government of Iraq for a long-term security relationship. If confirmed, I will work with leaders in both nations to sustain, establish, and develop programs that pursue our shared goals. In the strategic realm, this agreement draws Iraq one-step closer to our Nation.

OFFICE OF SECURITY COOPERATION IN IRAQ

Question. In fiscal year 2012 and fiscal year 2013, Congress authorized the Secretary of Defense to support the transition in Iraq by providing funds for the activities and operations of the OSC–I. In the report to accompany the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, the conferees expressed their expectation that the administration will accelerate the transition of the OSC–I to a normalized status comparable to Offices of Security Cooperation in other countries in the region, and that funding for OSC–I activities and operations will be transitioned out of DOD to other sources, as is the case for offices of security cooperation in other countries.

Do you support the transition of the OSC–I to a normalized office of security cooperation comparable to those in other countries in the region?

Answer. Yes. I fully support DOS's transition for Iraq as it was intended at the outset of planning. The normalization and transition activities of OSC–I are a reflection of the development of our security relationship with the Government of Iraq and represent a significant milestone towards an enduring strategic partnership.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the transition of the OSC–I to a normalized status, including funding from sources other than the DOD, is completed in a deliberate manner?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will ensure that the OSC–I transition is planned and executed in a deliberate manner that meets all policy and legal requirements.

Question. Based on your experience during the drawdown of U.S. Forces in Iraq, do you agree that setting a target date is critical for ensuring that the transition of the OSC–I to a normalized status occurs in a deliberate manner?

Answer. The conditions and requirements for the drawdown in Iraq were bounded by a timeline, which is a different situation than transition of a security cooperation mission, but I would say that planning for strategic transitions should balance conditions, risks, and timelines that are in line with U.S. policy. As time passes, leaders will assess changing conditions and risk to mission to ensure that timelines are met or extended in a manner that best achieves the goals of the transition. In the end, the U.S. and Iraqi goal should be a security cooperation organization of the right size and with the right amount of resources to effectively pursue a positive, long-term strategic relationship. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that conditions and risks are clearly stated and options are presented that reflect the results of deliberate planning.

Question. If confirmed, what timeframe would you recommend as an appropriate target for transitioning OSC–I to a normalized status?

Answer. In my current position I am unable to provide an informed recommendation for a target date, but I have every confidence in the leadership team in Iraq and the planning for the current approach to the transition. If confirmed, I would consult with the interagency team to ensure that the military components of the transition were properly aligned and prepared for transition. I would also provide best military advice on the execution of the transition, presenting options that ensured our goals were met and our relationship with Iraq strengthened. If conditions change, I would also make case-by-case recommendations on programs that could be considered for acceleration or delay.

SYRIA

Question. The civil war in Syria continues and President Assad's commitment to continuing his regime's ongoing operations appear unwavering despite broad international condemnation. To date, the United States has limited its support to opposition forces to non-lethal assistance to forces on the ground, as well as technical assistance to elements of the opposition working to build a cohesive political entity.

In your view, what is the proper role on the U.S. military in this conflict?

Answer. This is a complex problem requiring a regional solution. Certainly at this time, based on the complexity and volatility of the conflict, a regionally-led diplomatic and political strategy, with the United States in support, has the best chance of succeeding and enduring. However, we do need to remain vigilant and conduct appropriate planning to contain two emerging threats, the loss of control by the Syrian regime of its CW stocks and Advanced Conventional Weapons and the growing influence of violent extremists like the Al-Nusrah Front. Both of these emerging threats have the potential to spillover from Syria into neighboring countries, all of whom are U.S. allies and partners.

Question. In your view, should the United States provide other kinds of support to opposition groups on the ground in Syria, including the provision of lethal support?

Answer. Based on the divergent interests and fractured nature of the armed opposition groups in Syria, there would be great risk to providing them with lethal aid at this time. The influential role of violent extremists like the Al-Nusrah Front within the opposition and the close proximity of Iranian surrogates and Lebanese Hizbollah to the conflict increase the chance of lethal aid finding its way into the hands of malign actors opposed to U.S. interests. The United States is best served by looking for opportunities to provide humanitarian aid and non-lethal assistance to acceptable elements of the opposition while working with regional partners to develop a diplomatic and political solution to the conflict.

Question. In your view, what should be NATO's role with respect to Syria (i.e. should NATO consider a military intervention, the creation of a no-fly zone, or other military operations to protect civilians and support opposition forces)?

Answer. Any viable and enduring solution to the Syria crisis must rely heavily on leadership and participation from our regional partners. Having said that, NATO is currently providing Turkey with ballistic missile defense to hedge against potential Syrian military aggression. Any further role will be determined through consultation with Turkey and our other NATO allies.

Question. In your view, would the removal of the Assad regime be a strategic defeat of Iran in the region?

Answer. The loss of Assad will be a significant blow to Iran's prestige and regional influence and will at least temporarily degrade its operational reach into the Levant by calling into question its longtime logistics hub in Syria. However, consistent with its hedging strategy, Iran will seek to develop other avenues for supporting its proxies and surrogates throughout the region and possibly even focus more attention on countries with large Shia populations like Iraq and Lebanon.

Question. In your view, what role, if any, has the Government of Iraq played with regard to supporting the Assad regime or the armed Syrian opposition?

Answer. The Government of Iraq is attempting to remain neutral regarding the Syrian crisis and prefers a diplomatic solution to end the conflict. Understandably, Iraq is worried about spillover and is seeking to bolster the security of its border. Although the Iraqi Government is not directly aiding the Assad regime, it may have tacitly supported Assad through Iranian over-flights to Syria. Iranian aircraft, overflying Iraqi territory, have transported humanitarian aid to the Assad regime and it is likely these shipments have included lethal aid. Iraqi authorities have conducted some cargo inspections, but have not fully addressed U.S. demands to ensure over-flights do not carry lethal aid.

IRAN

Question. Iran continues to expand its nuclear program and has failed to provide full and open access to all aspects of its current and historic nuclear program to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

What is your assessment of the military and political threat posed by Iran?

Answer. Iranian military capabilities are significant as compared to its neighbors, and thus enable Iran to pursue a policy focused on reducing U.S. regional influence and asserting Iranian dominance in the region. The expansion of Iran's military and nuclear program over the last decade provides, in part, Tehran the confidence to threaten and coerce neighbors; disrupts international trade and commerce; and targets U.S. and partner interests in the region. Iran also maintains a significant asymmetric capability via its threat network, led primarily by the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps Quds Force (IRGC–QF) and its regional surrogates, and to a lesser degree the Ministry of Intelligence and Security. Iran uses this threat network to covertly execute its strategic objectives in the region, advance its destabilizing agenda to include the provision of financial and lethal aid, and could use this network to attack United States' interests and our allies.

Question. What is your assessment of U.S. policy with respect to Iran?

Answer. U.S. policy, aimed at preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, is appropriate and critical to avoiding a regional arms race and preserving stability in the Middle East. The U.S. Government's dual track strategy of engagement combined with pressure in the form of sanctions and diplomatic and political isolation is the right approach, and most likely to provide an enduring solution to the challenge posed by Iran's nuclear pursuits. The current strategy has rallied international support and significantly degraded Iran's economy, and as we sharpen the choice for the regime in Tehran, our parallel efforts of building our regional partners' military capabilities and maintaining credible deterrence remain critical elements of our broader multi-vector approach.

Question. What more do you believe the United States and the international community can and should do to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons?

Answer. I believe we should continue to employ the dual track strategy of engagement and pressure to achieve our goals. Whenever possible we should continue to strengthen the international sanctions regime so as to increase the pressure on the Iranian Government, while continuing to work with our international partners to underscore to Iran the costs it will bear for its nuclear non-compliance, as well as the deepening isolation it will face on the regional and global stage. Meanwhile, as we draw down forces in Afghanistan and as the overall size of the U.S. military presence within the Middle East decreases, it will become increasingly important that the United States maintain appropriate military capability in the region in order to be able to respond to a range of contingencies. This capability will also reassure our partners as we continue to build partner capacity in response to increasing Iranian malign activity. U.S. Government actions vis-a-vis Iran are closely knit together so as to achieve a "whole-of-government" approach to this problem set. By combining our efforts with the activities of our partners and friends worldwide, we have the best chance of achieving the objectives we seek in dissuading Iran from the pursuit of a nuclear weapons capability.

Question. In your view, what are the risks associated with reducing U.S. presence in the Middle East with respect to the threat posed by Iran?

Answer. There are significant risks associated with a reduced U.S. regional presence. U.S. Forces demonstrate our resolve and our commitment to regional security and the free flow of commerce, as well as a reflection of our continued efforts to build the capacity of regional partners. U.S. Forces provide a deterrent to Iranian overreach and their drive for regional hegemony, and ensure we are prepared to respond to a range of regional contingencies. However, the United States should not carry this burden alone. An appropriately sized force contributes to increased burden sharing by training with regional partners to enhance their capacity to better defend themselves. Nonetheless, we must balance CENTCOM's regional risk assessment with DOD and Service requirements to manage the overall readiness of the Force and the costs of associated deployments. This places a premium on building partner capacity and working by, with and through our regional partners to achieve a better balance of shared defense requirements. If confirmed, I will assess CENTCOM's force posture, and my staff and I will work closely with the Joint Staff to determine the correct U.S. presence in the Middle East.

Question. In your view, what has been the effect of sanctions against Iran—how effective have they been and should additional unilateral or multilateral sanctions be levied against Iran?

Answer. Iran's economy has been severely impacted by the unprecedented international sanctions that have been imposed, especially the sanctions against the Central Bank of Iran (CBI) and the EU oil embargo. These sanctions have reduced the availability of hard currency and resulted in a sharply depreciated currency and high inflation rates. I expect these conditions to be exacerbated by additional sanctions that went into effect on 6 February that prevent foreign banks from repatriating Iran's oil revenues, effectively locking them up overseas. These restrictions will likely cause further deterioration of Iran's economy, such as expanding trade deficits, reduction in the availability of hard currency, a further depreciated Rial and higher inflation.

Question. In your view, what role should CENTCOM play in countering Iran's support of international terrorism throughout its AOR?

Answer. CENTCOM, in very close coordination with SOCOM, plays a pivotal role in deterring Iran's support to terrorist organizations and countering Iran's malign influence. The Iranian Threat Network (ITN) is a worldwide network whose elements execute direct action, intelligence operations, influence building and terrorism against United States' interests, as well as partner nations. From the time of its creation, in response to the 1979 Iran crisis, CENTCOM has been crucial in defending U.S. interests within the Middle East. We will continue to work with our regional partners to build capacity to counter international terrorism in and outside the AOR. CENTCOM will continue to be the U.S. military's lead for defending U.S. interests in the region, maintaining the free flow of international commerce and protecting regional partners.

EGYPT

Question. What is your assessment of the security situation in Egypt?

Answer. In the near-term, large-scale civil unrest related to the ongoing political and economic crises presents an immediate threat to stability and security in the country. Internal security forces have struggled to control the types of large-scale demonstrations seen in Egypt in the past 2 years. Additionally, Egypt's security situation is impacted by the growth of violent extremist organizations in the Sinai Peninsula and increased arms smuggling from Libya and Sudan. The situation on the ground is further exacerbated by the government's inability to stabilize the political system. The poor security climate is hindering Egypt's economic recovery because it discourages foreign investment and the return of Egypt's large tourist economy.

Question. What is your assessment of the U.S.-Egypt security relationship?

Answer. The Egyptian Armed Forces (EAF) has proven to be a reliable partner for us as we navigate Egypt's internal transition and seek to promote regional stability and security. We have relied on it during times of crises and it has been responsive and professional in its actions. EAF has announced its intentions and followed through in consistent fashion. Egypt indirectly supports U.S. regional objectives by allowing unfettered overflight permissions and Suez Canal transit courtesies not typically afforded to other nations. Additionally, Egypt's strategic importance and regional leadership role make it one of the most important partners in CENTCOM's theater of operations. Close defensive ties allow for open dialogue to discuss hard issues and identify areas for enhanced cooperation.

Question. What is your assessment of the role Egypt plays with respect to regional stability? In your view, should the U.S. Government continue to provide defense articles and services, including but not limited to the F–16s, purchased by the Egyptian military using U.S. Foreign Military Financing funds?

Answer. By providing equipment and training the United States has helped Egypt to maintain a strong and disciplined professional defense force which is critical to ensuring Egypt's continued role as a regional leader, able to act as a moderating influence and contribute actively to the resolution of regional conflicts. For the past 30 years, the F–16 aircraft has been a key component of the relationship between the U.S. military and the Egyptian Armed Forces (EAF). Maintaining this relationship and assisting with the professionalization and development of the EAF's capabilities to secure its borders is an essential element of our efforts to stabilize Egypt and the region.

Question. Egypt has been criticized for its perceived failure to act along the Egypt-Gaza border to counter the smuggling threat posed by cross-border tunnels. Egypt has also played an important role, however, in ensuring peace on the southern border of Israel.

What is your assessment of Egypt's efforts to counter the flow of rocket and other advanced munitions into Gaza?

Answer. While Egyptian security forces have interdicted weapons shipments crossing Egyptian territory, their capabilities are limited and their success sporadic. Weapons coming into Egypt primarily from Sudan and Libya continue to transit the Sinai into Gaza. Extremists and militants are leveraging the lack of security in the Sinai and Egypt's inconsistent initiatives to their advantage.

AL QAEDA IN THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

Question. A number of senior U.S. officials have indicated the most significant threat to the U.S. Homeland currently emanates from Yemen.

What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) to the United States?

Answer. Despite suffering severe territorial, personnel, and resource losses over the last year, attacking the U.S. Homeland remains a pillar of AQAP's overall strategy. As such, a small cadre of operatives continues to work tirelessly to develop plots against the West. While those operations appear to be stalled in the conceptual stages, the group's history and continued access to innovative bombmakers and western operatives suggests AQAP is capable of advancing an operation with little to no warning, particularly if counterterrorism pressure subsides.

Question. What is your assessment of the current U.S. strategy to counter al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula?

Answer. The CENTCOM strategy to counter threats in Yemen is outlined in a detailed plan of actions, activities and operations. I am not currently in a position to assess this strategy. However, I do believe that our overall approach to countering AQAP must involve our interagency and regional partners. Only by effectively employing our network can we defeat the AQAP network. If confirmed, I will study this challenge further and look to pursue a whole-of-government approach.

Question. What is the appropriate role of the U.S. military in countering the threat of al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, and how should this role be coordinated with other agencies and departments in prosecuting an interagency strategy?

Answer. CENTCOM, in coordination with U.S. Government agencies and the Host Nation, supports and conducts enabling and security operations to promote a secure and stable Yemen in order to neutralize threats against U.S. interests. CENTCOM supports a whole-of-government approach to improving the overall stability of Yemen. The goal is to set the conditions for Yemen to become a secure, stable and responsibly governed nation capable of providing for its own security and the needs of its population. CENTCOM Yemen Country Plan balances actions to disrupt and deny AQAP, security assistance activities, and support for other U.S. Government agencies' efforts to improve government capacity and economic development.

REGIONAL BALLISTIC MISSILE THREATS AND RESPONSE

Question. Iran has hundreds of short- and medium-range ballistic missiles today that are capable of reaching forward-deployed U.S. Forces, allies, and other friendly nations in the CENTCOM AOR. Syria also has an inventory of ballistic missiles that pose a threat to the region. The Ballistic Missile Defense Review Report of February 2010 stated that the United States intends to pursue a Phased Adaptive Approach to ballistic missile defense against such missile threats in various regions, including the Middle East.

Do you believe that such a phased adaptive approach will provide CENTCOM with the missile defense capabilities needed to defend our forward deployed forces and our allies and partners in the region?

Answer. Yes, I believe a phased adaptive approach will provide CENTCOM the missile defense capabilities needed. As a framework, this approach phased over time and adaptive in terms of tailoring capabilities to specific threats, allows for effective mission command through continuous analysis and innovative methodologies. Additionally, continuing to assist our partners as they receive new Ballistic Missile Defense systems and upgrade older systems will remain a high priority. It is imperative we work together to increase our ability to defend ourselves and counter the threat.

Question. What role do you see for the Aegis Ballistic Missile Defense system with Standard Missile-3 interceptors in U.S. missile defense capabilities in the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. The role of the Aegis Ballistic Missile Defense (BMD) system with SM–3 missile in the AOR is to provide layered, upper and lower tier protection, weighted coverage, and defense in depth of key force projection assets supporting CENTCOM CONPLANS against SRBM/MRBMs. These elements provide the ability to engage ballistic missiles at multiple levels (upper and lower tier) and ranges. The Aegis BMD system with SM–3, in coordination with Patriot, provides our only capability to execute layered defense in the CENTCOM AOR.

Question. In addition to U.S. missile defense capabilities in the CENTCOM AOR, what role do you see for other nations in the AOR to contribute to regional missile defense capabilities, such as UAE interest in purchasing the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) system?

Answer. CENTCOM, in close coordination with the Department of State and the Office of the Secretary of Defense, is working hard to get countries in the Gulf to realize the importance of cooperative defense, particularly in the area of air and missile defense. To date, partners such as UAE, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia have either purchased or are in the process of purchasing THAAD systems. The message to them and others is simple, no one can stand alone on this issue; cooperation and synchronization are critical to the successful defense of the region.

CENTRAL ASIAN STATES

Question. The Central Asian states along the NDN have played important roles during the past few years in supporting U.S. and coalition forces in Afghanistan. These countries could also play a key role for the retrograde of U.S. and coalition equipment out of Afghanistan over the coming months and years.

What is your assessment of current U.S. military relationships with the Central Asian states, including Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan?

Answer. The Central Asian States remain key supporting partners for our Afghanistan Strategic Partnership. As we transition in Afghanistan, securing access to the NDN for logistical resupply and retrograde operations is of particular importance as we seek to promote stability and assure our partners of our continued commitment to the region. The development of the NDN has been a critical area of investment to that end and cooperation with our Central Asian partners will gain additional importance post-2014.

Our relationship with Uzbekistan continues to improve in a deliberate, balanced way driven by regional security considerations, expansion of the NDN and mutual benefit.

Tajikistan's ability to build and maintain counterterrorism, border security, and counter narcotics capabilities is paramount in protecting our mutual interests from the threat of violent extremist organizations. We continue to use the Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, and Tajikistan (KKT) route of the NDN as well as explore options to facilitate the transport of goods in the event of a crisis within this region.

The Kyrgyz Republic is a key partner for U.S. efforts in Afghanistan. The NDN network routes and the Transit Center at Manas remain key factors in successful operations in the region. However, the Kyrgyz Government has consistently stated there will be no foreign military at Manas after the current lease expires in July 2014.

Question. What role do you foresee the Central Asian states playing in the retrograde of U.S. equipment out of Afghanistan?

Answer. The Central Asian States remain key supporting partners for our Afghanistan Strategic Partnership. As we transition in Afghanistan, securing access to the NDN for logistical resupply and retrograde operations is of particular importance as we seek to promote stability and assure our partners of our continued commitment to the region. The supply lines through the Central Asian States provide the United States and NATO flexible and redundant retrograde options. CENTCOM will retrograde consistent volumes of equipment through the Central Asian States in order to maintain these routes as a hedge against geopolitical uncertainty that could impact other routes.

Question. What security challenges do you see in this portion of the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. There are several violent extremist organizations (VEOs), to include al Qaeda and other Afghanistan- or Pakistan-based groups such as the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan that have expressed interest or intent to operate from and within Central Asia. The VEOs benefit from narcotics, arms trafficking, and smuggling which are pervasive threats in the region. These activities threaten legitimate commerce and the flow of strategic resources. The proliferation of material for weapons of mass destruction, associated delivery systems and the spread of technical expertise from and through the Central Asian States is another concern. Across the region there is a considerable lack of sustainable development; in the absence of economic opportunity, poor and disenfranchised communities can serve as hotbeds for the spread of violent extremism.

INDIA

Question. How does the fact that India is in the U.S. Pacific Command area of responsibility (AOR) while Pakistan is in the CENTCOM AOR affect the United States' ability to treat the region's challenges holistically?

Answer. The Unified Command Plan (UCP) "seam" between Pakistan and India does not degrade our ability to address the larger region. The CENTCOM and PACOM AOR share many of the same challenges, threats and opportunities. CENTCOM and PACOM routinely coordinate with each other to ensure unity of effort when dealing with the region's challenges.

Question. In your view, how does our military cooperation and engagement with India affect our efforts in Pakistan and Afghanistan?

Answer. Pakistan, naturally, has concerns about any military cooperation between the U.S. and India. This affects both our relationship with Pakistan and, indirectly, our efforts in Afghanistan. However, we make clear to Pakistan that our military cooperation and engagement is not a threat to Pakistan and that this is not a zero-sum game. We have important relationships and strategic partnerships with both countries that are not at the expense of either one.

COUNTER PIRACY OPERATIONS OFF THE HORN OF AFRICA

Question. Over the past few years, U.S. Forces have participated in a multi-national mission to counter piracy off the coast of Somalia. More recently, evidence suggests that the mission has achieved some measure of success, although the assigned task force continues its counter-piracy efforts.

What is your assessment of the mission thus far?

Answer. Attacks continue but with limited pirate successes due to changes implemented by the commercial shipping industry and coalition naval presence which have placed a financial strain on Somali pirates. While we are currently experiencing success, piracy activity remains driven by the desire of pirates to gain multi-million-dollar ransoms with little risk.

Question. In your opinion, how long should we continue the current mission as constituted and at what point should we consider a change to the strategy?

Answer. While the mission has achieved a measure of success, it would be premature to shift our strategy as piracy will exist until it becomes cost prohibitive. The lower numbers in pirate success rates is also based on the introduction of newer, less experienced pirate groups which could change with time. The presence of counter-piracy Task Forces not only contributes to security, but facilitates global commerce and regional prosperity. Furthermore, Maritime Security Operations offers the best opportunity to work with partners to deny violent extremists free use of the sea which also contributes to overall regional security.

Question. What do you see as the most appropriate maritime strategy in this region of the world, given the threats of weapons trafficking, human trafficking, and piracy?

Answer. The most appropriate strategy is to continue our leadership role as expressed in the President's Maritime Security Policy and the NSS Counter Piracy Action Plan in conjunction with the international community. Specifically, the U.N., NATO, and the EU; and the maritime industry in general. The use of proven tactics and procedures within DOD and the Coalition, combined with the practice of industry best management procedures (such as vessel protection and disruption techniques) have reduced the unlawful maritime activity in the Horn of Africa. The combination of military operations and industry's response has resulted in suppression of these activities. However, in order to prevent the re-emergence of this activity, we must continue to work in partnership with the international community to suppress and strive towards the eradication of this threat to free international maritime security.

Question. Given that Somalia has established a new Federal Government, how should U.S. policy toward pirate groups based in Somali territory be modified?

Answer. CENTCOM's efforts, in conjunction with the international community, have produced positive results in increasing the maritime security in the Somali Basin. We must continue to work as part of a cohesive whole-of-government effort, both within the U.S. Government and with the appropriate international organizations (such as the U.N., NATO, and the EU) and in conjunction with the Somali Government, to continue our successes in reducing the maritime security threat expressed by the pirate groups, both ashore and at sea.

ISRAEL

Question. While Israel is not part of the CENTCOM AOR, it does play a role in the Command's AOR.

In your assessment, what are the most significant threats facing Israel in the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. The greatest threat to Israeli security is the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran. Despite sanctions and significant pressure from the international community, the Iranian regime continues to take steps that could support the development of a nuclear-weapons program. The potential of an Iranian nuclear weapon, coupled with Iran's advancement of Theater Ballistic Missiles (both accuracy and quantity), presents Israel with what they assess to be intolerable threats to their security. Hezbollah also represents a significant existential threat to Israel. Other significant threats to Israel's security include Iranian proxy elements and Palestinian rejectionists such as Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad (PIJ). Finally, regional instability provides VEOs with opportunities to gain new footholds in areas near Israel. For instance, al Qaeda-aligned groups such as the al-Nusrah Front in Syria continue to gain strength in key Syrian cities and may target Israel when the Assad regime collapses. Similarly, violence and domestic concerns plague Egypt, which provides for under-governance in the Sinai, allowing greater freedom of action for AQ-inspired groups.

Question. If confirmed, what do you view to be your role with respect to the defense of Israel?

Answer. EUCOM is the lead military agency charged with defending Israel; however, CENTCOM has always worked very closely with EUCOM, SOCOM, and the Department of State to ensure there are no seams or gaps in our regional plans. As with our other allies in the Middle East, we must honor our commitments to Israel to support them during crisis. As the Middle East continues to deal with challenges in Egypt, Syria and Lebanon it will be critical for CENTCOM, EUCOM and SOCOM to closely coordinate our efforts to maintain a stable region and provide appropriate support to Israel.

ARAB SPRING

Question. The Arab Spring has changed—and will likely continue to change—the political dynamics in the Middle East and North Africa. These changes require the United States to adjust our military-to-military and defense civilian relations in this region. Some observers argue that the United States should reduce significantly our military-to-military contact in countries as a result of the ongoing changes and others advocate more robust and stepped-up contact with our partners in this region.

In your view, what should be the posture of the U.S. Government on military-to-military and defense civilian relations in the region, particularly with respect to Egypt and Bahrain?

Answer. Military-to-military engagements lay the foundation for and bolster our broader diplomatic and political relationships in the region, to include in Egypt and Bahrain. Much of this work is ongoing, but as resources decrease and American forward presence in the region declines, military-to-military engagements and working by, with, and through our partners will become even more important. This type of engagement is often the bedrock of our relationships and affords us the trust necessary to dialogue quietly about contentious issues.

BUILDING PARTNER CAPACITY AND SECURITY ASSISTANCE

Question. In the past few years, Congress has provided DOD a number of temporary authorities to provide security assistance to partner nations, including the global train and equip authority ("section 1206"), Global Security Contingency Fund (GSCF), and the niche authority for Yemen's Ministry of Interior Counterterrorism Unit.

What is your understanding of the purpose of the section 1206 global train and equip authority and Global Contingency Security Fund?

Answer. The purpose of section 1206 authority (Global Train and Equip) is to enhance the capacity of foreign nations to conduct counterterrorism operations with either their national military forces or maritime security forces. Additionally, the authority allows the Department to improve partner nations' capabilities to participate in or support military and stability operations in which the U.S. Armed Forces are a participant.

The GSCF is similar in some aspects to the section 1206 authority. Both seek to improve the capability of a foreign country's national military forces to conduct counterterrorism operations or help a partner nation participate in or support military operations consistent with U.S. foreign policy and national security interests. However, the GSCF is not as narrowly defined or restricted as section 1206. GSCF can be used for border security, internal defense, justice sector programs (including law enforcement and prisons), and stabilization efforts within a country where instability challenges the existing capability of civilian providers to deliver such assistance. Additionally, more organization, such as within a nation's Ministry of Interior, would be a potential recipient of GSCF funds; section 1206 restricts funding to a country's Ministry of Defense or Maritime Security forces.

Question. In your view, what should be our strategic objectives in building the capacities of partner nations in the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. Our strategic objectives in building partner capacities in the AOR include partners that are capable of deterring, defending, and cooperating against attack; controlling their borders; mitigating ungoverned spaces; enhancing stability; and maintaining cooperative, interest-based relations with their neighbors; and Regional Partners in the AOR that remain accessible and cooperative with the United States.

Question. The funding pool available for security assistance and other military-to-military engagement activities devoted to the CENTCOM AOR tends to be allocated to specific countries.

What is your understanding of the role CENTCOM plays in developing U.S. security assistance priorities (e.g., section 1206, Foreign Military Financing, International Military Education and Training Assistance, Combatant Commander Initiative Fund)?

Answer. CENTCOM collaborates with the DOS and each Security Cooperation Office (SCO) to develop security assistance programming priorities which are aligned with the Department's Security Cooperation Guidance and supports the Theater Campaign Plan as well as the individual Country Plans. These priorities and recommended funding levels are submitted to DOD for inclusion in the President's budget request each year.

U.S. CONTRIBUTIONS TO INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING MISSIONS

Question. In testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on July 29, 2009, the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations (U.N.) stated that the United States "is willing to consider directly contributing more military observers, military staff officers, civilian police, and other civilian personnel—including more women I should note—to U.N. peacekeeping operations." General Dempsey has said the United States "should consider opportunities for U.S. personnel to contribute to U.N. peacekeeping missions" and that "experience shows that even a small number of trained and experienced American servicemembers can have a significant, positive effect on U.N. operations."

In your view, should the United States increase the number of personnel it contributes in the form of staff positions and military observers to U.N. peacekeeping missions and other international peace operations?

Answer. Overall, I agree with General Dempsey's position; however, our first priority remains our significant troop commitments in Afghanistan.

Question. In your view, what are the advantages and disadvantages of contributing additional military personnel to U.N. operations in the form of staff positions and military observer positions?

Answer. U.N. peacekeeping operations are a cost-effective alternative to unilateral U.S. military action. Such missions support U.S. interests around the world, promoting stability and saving civilian lives. U.S. military personnel make significant contributions to these efforts, particularly in specialized areas such as logistics and intelligence. However, the competing requirements of additional participation in U.N. peacekeeping operations must be weighed against potential costs, to include the increase in the operational tempo of the force.

Question. In your view, would an increase in the number of U.S. military personnel assigned to U.N. peacekeeping missions in the CENTCOM AOR help you advance the theater campaign plan?

Answer. While this is not an issue that I am ready to fully assess, there are many important factors to balance in making such an assessment, including ongoing U.S. military commitments and engagements in the AOR and perceptions in the region that would result from an increase in U.S. peacekeepers. I would need to study the issue further to ensure that while addressing one issue we do not inadvertently create additional issues.

NATIONAL STRATEGY TO COMBAT TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME

Question. Criminal networks are not only expanding their operations, but they are also diversifying their activities, resulting in a convergence of transnational threats that has evolved to become more complex, volatile, and destabilizing. The Director of National Intelligence recently described transnational organized crime as "an abiding threat to U.S. economic and national security interests," and stated that "rising drug violence and corruption are undermining stability and the rule of law in some countries." In July 2011, the President released his Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime: Addressing Converging Threats to National Security. One of the priority action areas designated in the strategy is "enhancing Department of Defense support to U.S. law enforcement."

What is your understanding of the President's strategy to combat transnational criminal organizations?

Answer. The President's plan for combating transnational criminal organizations is reflected in the National Security Strategy. As part of a whole-of-government approach the DOD can bring to bear unique authorities and capabilities to augment those of our law enforcement and intelligence communities. Of note is the policy's call for increasing intelligence and information sharing as well as building international capacity, cooperation and partnerships.

Question. What is your assessment of the threat to the United States posed by transnational organized crime? Would you consider it a national security threat?

Answer. The growing interconnectivity among transnational organized crime (TOC), terrorist groups, and insurgencies threatens U.S. national security interests.

TOC exploits porous borders caused by regional unrest, the speed of global trade, and the growing demand for drugs and weapons to cooperate with terrorist and insurgent groups. Similarly, terrorist and insurgent groups mobilize TOC networks to undermine governments/State institutions and engage in illicit activities (i.e., narcotics trafficking, money laundering, small arms/light weapons sales, and counterfeit goods) to bolster their resources, which improves operational capability and effectiveness.

MASS ATROCITIES PREVENTION

Question. President Obama identified the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide as a core U.S. national security interest, as well as a core moral interest, in August 2011 under Presidential Study Directive 10.

What are your views on the role the United States plays in the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide?

Answer. The United States, as a world leader, has resources which it can bring to bear to aid in the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide. The decision to commit these resources clearly resides with the President. As a military commander, I understand my responsibility under the Law of Armed Conflict to protect civilians from physical violence and to contribute to a secure, stable, and just environment for civilians over the long-term.

Question. What are your views on the adequacy of the Department's tools and doctrine for contributing to this role?

Answer. Although the CJCS has the Department's lead for further developing operational principles, the geographic combatant commands will incorporate mass atrocity prevention and response as a priority in planning, activities, and engagements. By applying our lessons learned methodology to previous and future activities we will continue to expand and refine our capabilities and capacities to respond as a decisive element of a whole-of-government effort.

COUNTER THREAT FINANCE

Question. DOD and the Intelligence Community (IC) have begun investing more resources in identifying and tracking the flow of money associated with terrorist networks and illicit trafficking, but the opportunities for tracking and degrading illicit financing flows are not yet matched by the effort and resources devoted to them. Identifying and disrupting key individuals, entities, and facilitation routes enabling the flow of money that supports terrorism, production of IEDs, narco-trafficking, proliferation, and other significant national security threats could have an outsized impact on confronting these threats.

What are your views on the role of DOD in counter threat finance activities?

Answer. It is appropriate for DOD to play a supporting role in countering threat finance activities. DOD does bring unique capabilities to the effort of the broader interagency community. DOD can provide its intelligence analysis to identify critical network vulnerabilities as well as its strategic and operational planning expertise.

Question. Are there opportunities to replicate or improve upon the network-disruption efforts of groups like the Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization or the Afghanistan Threat Finance Cell in impacting other facilitation networks?

Answer. Yes. The Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization and the Afghanistan Threat Finance Cell multi-national and interagency approaches to the counter-IED and threat finance problem sets provide an effective framework that I believe may be applied to other networked problem sets such as narcotics and weapons trafficking. If confirmed, I will actively pursue such multi-nation and interagency solutions to the problems that we face in the CENTCOM AOR to the maximum extent possible.

Question. In your view, how should DOD coordinate and interface with other key agencies, including the Department of Treasury and the Intelligence Community, in conducting counter threat finance activities?

Answer. In keeping with OSD/Joint Staff/SOCOM (CTF DOD lead component) policies, DOD should coordinate counter threat finance activities with other agencies and departments through the Geographic Combatant Command's interagency process. This type of interface will ensure the IA receives one set of theater threat finance priorities, reduces redundant and conflicting DOD requests to the IA, and increases opportunities to disrupt adversary finance networks. Counter threat finance intelligence support (e.g., collection requirements, production) should be brokered through theater, component, task force J2s and directly with DOD's consolidated threat finance intelligence initiatives within the Defense Intelligence Agency.

LEBANON

Question. Over the past decade, the United States has provided over $500 million in security assistance to the Government of Lebanon.

In your view, what is the appropriate role for CENTCOM in Lebanon?

Answer. CENTCOM continues to act as a mentor and enabler of the Lebanon Armed Forces (LAF). Our relationship enables the U.S. and Lebanon to work toward mutually-supporting goals. A reduction of CENTCOM involvement in Lebanon would increase the temptation and necessity for Lebanon to consider taking aid from countries whose interests conflict with U.S interests.

Question. In your view, what are the U.S. national security interests in Lebanon?

Answer. The primary U.S. security interest in Lebanon is to strengthen the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) as a counterweight to Lebanese Hezbollah (LH) and, in doing so, reduce the malign influence of Iran in the region. Instability in Lebanon plays into the interests of LH, Syria, and Iran. The multi-confessional nature of the LAF makes it a unifying force in Lebanon acting as a stabilizing force to the detriment of our adversaries in the region.

Question. The current government in Lebanon includes Hezbollah, a designated foreign terrorist organization under U.S. law.

Given the involvement of Hezbollah in the Lebanese Government, what do you believe to be the appropriate level of engagement with the Lebanese Armed Forces?

Answer. The LAF has proven itself to be independent of Hezbollah influence despite Hezbollah's involvement in the Lebanese Government. To date, Hezbollah's involvement has had no impact on our relationship and current levels of engagement with the LAF. In light of the ongoing situation in Syria, our various forms of aid to the LAF are vital to maintaining peace internally while guarding against spillover violence from across the Syrian border. Our persistent efforts to provide military training and material support to the LAF have enabled them to be a more effective counter-balance to Lebanese Hezbollah (LH).

CHINA

Question. Over the past several years, much as been made of China's military growth and modernization and of China's influence throughout Asia, including the portions of the region that fall within the CENTCOM commander's area of responsibility. For example, many observers point out that China has developed and maintains a partnership with Iran based, at least in part, on economic and defense cooperation, and that China's policies toward Iran have hindered international efforts to deter Iran from developing a nuclear weapons capability.

Question. What do you see as the effect of China's economic and military growth on the CENTCOM AOR as a whole?

Answer. China relies heavily on energy resources found in the CENTCOM AOR (Middle East and Central Asia) to meet its growing domestic demand for energy and achieve its strategic objective of sustained economic growth. China seeks to build political and economic relationships with countries in the CENTCOM AOR to ensure that Beijing maintains access to the region's energy resources, but China plays little role in guaranteeing security and stability throughout the region. China has historically been a source of arms sales for countries seeking to upgrade their arsenals and/or procure cheaper alternatives to U.S. weapons.

Question. How does China's relationship with Iran, in particular, affect U.S. security interests in the region?

Answer. China is Iran's largest purchaser of crude oil. However, China reduced its imports of Iranian crude oil in 2012 compared to the previous year, in response to U.S. diplomacy. While China voted for sanctions on Iran in U.N. Security Council Resolution 1929, it has publicly opposed additional national sanctions that have been levied by the United States, European Union and others. Iran seeks to use its relationship with China to gain influence within the UNSC, seeking support from China during resolution votes. Iran will likely continue efforts to build on its relationship with China as it depends on Beijing to offset the high cost of business transactions due to sanctions.

DOD COUNTERNARCOTICS ACTIVITIES

Question. DOD serves as the single lead agency for the detection and monitoring of aerial and maritime foreign shipments of drugs flowing toward the U.S. On an annual basis, DOD's counter-narcotics (CN) program expends approximately $1.5 billion to support the Department's CN operations, including to build the capacity of U.S. Federal, State, and local law enforcement agencies, and certain foreign governments, and provide intelligence support on CN-related matters and a variety of other unique enabling capabilities.

In your view, what is the appropriate role of DOD—and by extension CENTCOM—in counterdrug efforts?

Answer. In the CENTCOM AOR, counterdrug authorities provided by Congress permit us to support our Federal law enforcement partners in their engagement with regional counterdrug security force organizations. These activities address many of the U.S. Government's, and by extension CENTCOM's, most pressing regional security issues. Counterdrug activities are often one of the few avenues for military engagement with our regional partners.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of the United States in countering the flow of narcotics to nations other than the United States?

Answer. The United States should always consider partnering with governments requesting counterdrug assistance when it supports U.S. national interests. Drug trafficking organizations are international by nature and the larger the coalition of the willing to address the illicit drugs business, the greater the global impact we could achieve. Counter-narcotics operations provide opportunities for developing military-to-military relationships and building partner capacity.

Question. Given that the vast majority of illegal drugs transiting in the CENTCOM AOR are not destined for the United States, should DOD invest resources in countering the flow of illegal drugs to or through the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. It is shortsighted to view illicit drugs trafficking activity through the prism of only what comes into the United States. Narcotics play a critical role in underwriting corruption, which poses the greatest strategic threat to the ISAF campaign plan. So, while only a relatively minor portion of Afghan opiates make their way to the U.S., their impact on U.S. Government engagement in the CENTCOM AOR is significant. An effective U.S. counterdrug strategy includes attacking the illicit drugs trafficking business at every opportunity from source to end user. Counter-narcotics operations provide opportunities for developing military-to-military relationships and building partner capacity.

STRATEGIC COMMUNICATIONS AND INFORMATION OPERATIONS

Question. Over the past decade, DOD has funded an increasing number of military information support operations (formerly known as psychological operations) and influence programs. The Government Accountability Office reports that DOD has "spent hundreds of millions of dollars each year" to support its information operations outreach activities. Many of these programs are in support of operations in Afghanistan, but Military Information Support Teams (MISTs) from U.S. Special Operations Command also deploy to U.S. embassies in countries of particular interest around the globe to bolster the efforts of the Department of State and the U.S. Agency for International Development. Further, the geographic combatant commands are increasingly moving into this operational space.

What are your views on DOD's military information support operations and influence programs?

Answer. Military information support operations (MISO) is a critical investment in deterrence and prevention of conflict when synchronized with interagency efforts. Integral to all phases of military operations, MISO serves to shape information environments and mitigate risk to mission and forces in advance of and during conflict.

Question. What unique value should such programs contribute in distinction from strategic communications and influence activities conducted by other government departments and agencies?

Answer. CENTCOM's Information Operations (IO) capability is unique in that it is opponent focused (military targets), tightly integrated with special and technical operations programs and inter-connected with the communications community both military and interagency. It has the flexibility to employ attributable and non-attributable means (within scope of policy) to achieve objectives unlike other Public Affairs and Defense Support to Public Diplomacy. CENTCOM's IO capability specializes in languages unique to the designated area of operations; staff and units of execution have hands-on experience understanding key opponent influence systems; and our IO is postured to rapidly target those opponents when authorized.

REGIONAL ALIGNMENT AND ROTATIONAL DEPLOYMENTS OF ARMY BRIGADES

Question. The Army plans to align general purpose combat brigades with regional combatant commands, including CENTCOM, to support theater engagement and security force assistance missions and to make those forces, and other supporting units, available on a rotational basis for deployment to those regions for training and exercises.

What is your understanding and assessment of the Army's capability and capacity to align combat brigades or other units with regional combatant commands?

Answer. As Vice Chief of Staff of the Army, I have been involved in the development of the Regional Alignment of Forces concept. I believe it is sound and will provide geographic combatant commanders with professionally trained and regionally attuned forces and capabilities that are both responsive and capable of meeting theater requirements. The Army is executing its first "proof of principle" of the Regionally Aligned Forces concept in fiscal year 2013 by aligning a brigade combat team to U.S. African Command (AFRICOM). The Army will conduct a subsequent comprehensive assessment of this effort that will further drive our understanding of our capability and capacity to execute this mission set going forward.

Question. What are your views, if any, on the use of general purpose forces for missions providing security force assistance to other nations' militaries?

Answer. Recent operations in Iraq and Afghanistan have demonstrated that general purpose forces are quite capable of executing the security force assistance mission set. Moreover, general purpose forces can be a key asset as we continue to build the military capacity of our allies. As an example, our military has a rich history of cooperative small unit training exercises across a range of combatant commands. Ultimately, such efforts must be synchronized with the combatant commander's Theater Security Cooperation plan.

Question. In your view, how, if at all, should a unit's regional alignment impact the assignment of personnel, selection of unit commanders, priority for cultural and language training compared to core combat training, and identification and acquisition of special equipment?

Answer. The Army is currently conducting a comprehensive analysis of requirements and impacts of the regionally aligned forces concept. This analysis will account for factors associated with doctrine, organization, training, materiel, leadership and education, personnel, and facilities. Further, the 2013 regional alignment of the brigade combat team to AFRICOM will inform this analysis. Factors associated with the alignment of divisions and corps will also inform this analysis. Ultimately, the Army seeks to support combatant commands while remaining operationally adaptable to respond to global contingencies, as required.

Question. If confirmed, how would you propose to implement the use of regionally aligned forces in support of your theater assistance and engagement strategies?

Answer. Use of regionally aligned forces to support CENTCOM theater assistance and strategy will not be fundamentally different than how other forces are now used. The significance of using such forces is that regional alignment will enhance relationships between planning staffs while improving the aligned units' familiarity with areas in which they will most likely be employed.

Question. In your view, how should funding responsibility be consolidated or distributed between the Military Departments and the combatant commands for training and employment of regionally aligned forces?

Answer. I believe the current construct established under the Goldwater-Nichols DOD Reorganization Act of 1996 adequately and efficiently defines the roles and responsibilities of the Services and defense agencies in supporting the combatant commands. The Services are and should continue to be funded to man, train and equip their forces in support of combatant command operational mission sets regardless of whether those forces are regionally aligned. However, combatant commanders should provide funds for training and exercises conducted in their AOR.

Question. In your view, is it feasible and suitable to satisfy theater engagement and assistance strategies completely with rotational forces? If not, why?

Answer. CENTCOM has successfully conducted operations, exercises and activities since its inception without permanently assigned forces. Like other commands, it plans and requests forces through the Global Force Management process. I have complete faith that all CENTCOM theater engagement and assistance strategies can be met with rotational forces, particularly regionally aligned forces.

NATO ALLIANCE

Question. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) alliance continues to be central to our coalition operations in Afghanistan and elsewhere, even as many NATO members have significantly reduced their national defense budgets in response to economic and fiscal pressures.

Do you agree that U.S. participation in the NATO alliance contributes to advancing U.S. security interests?

Answer. Yes, members of the NATO Alliance share the same concerns for national security as we do. Participation in the Alliance furthers international security and U.S. security interests.

Question. What are the greatest opportunities and challenges that you foresee for NATO in meeting its strategic objectives over the next 5 years, particularly with regard to NATO activities in the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. We are all operating in a challenging fiscal environment, and are seeking ways to more efficiently meet our strategic objectives. In this austere environment, there may be opportunities to expand interoperability and cost sharing through combined training exercises, utilizing our well-developed training facilities in Europe.

Question. In light of the reductions in national defense spending by some NATO members, are you concerned that the Alliance will lack critical military capabilities? If so, what steps, if any, would you recommend be taken to address potential shortfalls in alliance capabilities?

Answer. The impact of reduced spending will be felt throughout the alliance. We can work to mitigate the impact by exploring avenues of increasing interoperability, and perhaps achieving economies of scale through international cooperative research, development and acquisition.

Question. What is your assessment of the effectiveness of nations of the Middle East in recent NATO military operations in Libya?

Answer. Middle East nations have been effective in recent NATO operations and served as an integral part of the Coalition. A prime example would be the efforts by UAE, Qatar, and Jordan who flew combat sorties during Operation Odyssey Dawn in Libya. Continued training and exchanges with our partners in the Middle East forges bonds that can last generations and give us resources that when needed fulfill operational requirements and further strengthen our ties.

Question. What steps, if any, do you think CENTCOM should take to improve the interoperability of military forces from the CENTCOM region with the U.S. and other international security actors?

Answer. CENTCOM remains committed to working with coalition partners to improve stability, peace and security for all partnered nations in the CENTCOM AOR and neighboring AORs. Engagement is certainly less costly than war and ensuring the interoperability of our militaries is the requisite investment to achieve that goal. The most dramatic effect on interoperability can be achieved through increasing International Military Exchange and Training (IMET) funding for military career schools and education.

INTELLIGENCE, SURVEILLANCE, AND RECONNAISSANCE CAPABILITIES

Question. Since September 11, CENTCOM has received the overwhelming majority of the ISR support that DOD has been able to generate. The demand for more ISR has continued to outstrip the supply, even though the Secretary of Defense has taken extraordinary actions to ramp up the acquisition of more and more capable and varied ISR systems. Other combatant commands and other military missions and operations outside of the CENTCOM AOR have gone wanting.

Do you foresee, and if so to what degree, CENTCOM relinquishing existing ISR systems as forces are withdrawn from Afghanistan and as demand continues to grow in AFRICOM, PACOM and other AORs?

Answer. CENTCOM remains actively engaged with ISAF and USFOR–A on planning for ISR support through OEF Change of Mission and support to the Enduring Force Headquarters post-OEF. We have learned through experience that as our footprint shrinks the demand for ISR increases. CENTCOM will conduct an OEF Redeployment Conference and an OPLAN Development Conference within the next 60 days. Both events will enable us to further refine the ISR requirements in support of the drawdown and beyond. If confirmed, I will further assess the requirement for ISR in the CENTCOM AOR.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question. As with other combatant commands, a science and technology (S&T) advisor is assigned to support CENTCOM.

If confirmed, what would be your priorities for the CENTCOM Science and Technology advisor?

Answer. The Science Advisor acts as principle advisor to the commander on matters of science, technology, innovation, and fielding of material and non-material solutions for the command's most pressing capability gaps. If confirmed, I will charge the Science Advisor with the discovery, research, analysis and advocacy of new and emerging technologies and techniques which have the potential to provide solutions to our validated joint needs. I will require the Science Advisor to continue to discover, develop, and advocate for those technologies and techniques that will make our warfighters safer, more efficient, and more effective in the immediate and near-term. I will charge the Science Advisor to engage with partner countries to develop mutually required technologies that will also keep coalition forces safe, allow them to be more effective through better integration with U.S. Forces, and help build stronger partnerships for the future. I will also charge the Science Advisor with looking beyond the horizon to ensure CENTCOM warriors maintain their battlespace technology superiority during potential future conflicts.

OPERATIONAL ENERGY

Question. Several of your predecessors have established and published policies regarding operational energy and its important role in supporting the mission in Afghanistan. These policies have stressed better management of energy use in the battle space to provide a strategic and tactical advantage while increasing combat effectiveness and operational capability.

Do you plan to establish and publish similar policies regarding operational energy improvements?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to support the CENTCOM established policies and procedures regarding operational energy which are now in the refinement phase. These policies and procedures include a standing policy on Operational Energy which the Command has implemented and Service Components and Joint Task Forces have similarly adopted. I will also assess the Command's Operational Energy initiatives to identify areas where CENTCOM can further enhance combat power and ensure good stewardship of our finite energy resources.

Question. What is your assessment of how better operational energy management translates, if at all, into improving combat effectiveness?

Answer. Better operational energy management translates to fewer fuel convoys, thereby freeing convoy security forces to conduct other operational missions. Decreased energy consumption and spending also creates the potential to reinvest funds towards force protection and other needed capabilities which ultimately increase combat effectiveness.

Question. How do you plan to track fuel consumption at forward-deployed locations in Afghanistan?

Answer. The Afghan Sub-Area Petroleum Office (A–SAPO), an element of USFOR–A Headquarters, receives regular fuel consumption reports from sustainment forces providing fuel distribution services in Afghanistan. A–SAPO reviews these reports and forwards them to the CENTCOM Joint Petroleum Office.

CENTCOM AND DOD GLOBAL POSTURE REVIEW

Question. According to the 2010 Quadrennial Defense Review Report, DOD will conduct a global posture review that assesses U.S. strategic relationships and interests to identify where and at what levels the forward stationing of military forces supports those relationships and interests. The new strategic guidance released by the Secretary of Defense in January 2012 stated regarding the Middle East that "the United States will continue to place a premium on U.S. and allied military presence in—and support of—partner nations in and around this region."

What is your assessment of the current and future strategic requirement for basing U.S. military personnel and equipment in the Middle East?

Answer. At present, CENTCOM has sufficient access and basing to execute current operations and continually looks for ways to improve the flexibility and depth in the theater basing network to support potential surge operations if required, and mitigate risk caused by access denial and loss of access should it occur. The Command has been working with the Department on key elements of a posture strategy and is incorporating this in the planning process. CENTCOM has been revising its posture in theater for some time as we continue efforts to reset forces for current and future operational requirements. This process will continue as we work towards the successful completion of Operation Enduring Freedom.

Question. Aside from contingency operations, do you believe the number of U.S. Forces permanently stationed within CENTCOM is sufficient to meet U.S. national security objectives in the region?

Answer. In my current position I am unable to provide an adequate assessment of requirements and requisite forces in the CENTCOM AOR. However, if confirmed, I will work with DOD to define the right mix of capabilities to meet future steady state mission requirements and to provide a rapid response capability in the event of a crisis.

CENTCOM HEADQUARTERS

Question. Based on the drawdown in Afghanistan and completed redeployment out of Iraq, will you conduct a review of the size of the CENTCOM headquarters?

Answer. Yes. CENTCOM headquarters is undergoing a manpower and organization review now, assisted by the Army and Air Force Manpower Agencies. If confirmed, I will assess the study recommendations and shape the headquarters for future operations.

TREATMENT OF DETAINEES

Question. Section 1403 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2006 provides that no individual in the custody or under the physical control of the U.S. Government, regardless of nationality or physical location shall be subject to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.

If confirmed, will you take steps to ensure that all relevant DOD directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures applicable to U.S. Forces in Afghanistan fully comply with the requirements of section 1403 and with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will ensure that CENTCOM forces fully comply with all relevant provisions of DOD directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures applicable to U.S. Forces in Afghanistan, and that they fully comply with the requirements of section 1403 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 and with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

Question. Do you support the standards for detainee treatment specified in the revised Army Field Manual on Interrogations, FM 2–22.3, issued in September 2006, and in DOD Directive 2310.01E, the DOD Detainee Program, dated September 5, 2006?

Answer. Yes. I understand and support the standards for the treatment of detainees and will adhere to them, if confirmed. All detainees shall be treated humanely, and in accordance with U.S. law, the Law of War, and applicable U.S. policy. Humane treatment entails the following: no violence, no cruelty, no torture, and no humiliating or degrading treatment.

Question. Do you believe it is consistent with effective counterinsurgency operations for U.S. Forces to comply fully with the requirements of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. Yes. I believe all military operations, to include counterinsurgency operations, must be conducted in accordance with the requirements of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

Question. How would you ensure a climate that not only discourages the abuse of detainees, but that encourages the reporting of abuse?

Answer. If confirmed, I will set forth clear standards and expectations and demonstrate my personal commitment to those standards. I will ensure that guard forces are thoroughly trained in the humane treatment of detainees. Personnel at all levels will be trained on the importance of discouraging abuse and empowered to report any signs of abuse. Where appropriate, we will conduct routine inspections.

TRAUMATIC BRAIN INJURY

Question. On June 21, 2010, the Deputy Secretary of Defense issued a DOD-wide policy on the management of mild traumatic brain injury (TBI) in deployed settings.

What is your assessment of the effect of this policy in safeguarding servicemembers from further traumatic brain injury?

Answer. This has proven to be a very effective policy and I am confident it will contribute immensely in our understanding of mild TBI and how best to prevent, detect and treat these injuries. The current policy is based on the recently published DOD Instruction 6490.11 and ensures that all potentially concussive events (mild TBI) are identified, evaluated, treated and tracked by both the line leadership as well as those in the military medical community. This policy also limits the activity of those individuals identified with multiple concussions and ensures they receive complete and timely follow-up and are protected from the possibility of further brain injuries.

MENTAL HEALTH ASSESSMENTS AND TREATMENT IN THEATER

Question. The Army's Mental Health Advisory Team (MHAT) has made seven separate assessments over the past several years detailing the immediate effects of combat on mental health conditions of U.S. soldiers and marines deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan. The most recent study, MHAT VI, found that "soldiers on their third and fourth deployment report lower morale and more mental health problems," and that stigma continues to prevent some soldiers from seeking mental health care. These types of reports lend support to the fact that increasing numbers of troops are returning from duty in Afghanistan with post-traumatic stress, depression, and other mental health problems.

Do you have any views on how to best address the mental health needs of our troops in theater, in terms of both prevention and treatment?

Answer. Ensuring that the behavioral health and counseling services are readily available and accessible for our servicemembers remains a high priority. Services are emphasizing resiliency training for servicemembers with additional screening prior to deployment by qualified mental health providers focused on behavioral health (BH) disorders and wellness. Individuals, who have specific behavioral health conditions that require specific treatments, and have not demonstrated adequate resolution of their behavioral health condition or symptoms, are not permitted to deploy. For those in theater, the availability of Restoration Centers, telebehavioral health (TBH), and an easy-to-use crisis line in conjunction with deployed behavioral health providers have given servicemembers more options to take preventive measures and seek treatment. If confirmed, I will continue to emphasize the importance of mental health prevention and treatment for our servicemembers.

Question. Do you believe that mental health resources in theater are adequate to handle the needs of our deployed servicemembers?

Answer. Yes. To my knowledge the Behavioral Health (BH) resources available to our servicemembers in theater are adequate to handle the needs of our deployed troops. Keeping in mind that as our footprint changes our resources will change and we will have to ensure we maintain an adequate balance between number of servicemembers and mental health care providers.

Question. If confirmed, would you request additional behavioral health resources from the Services, if needed, to meet the needs of units deployed to the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. Yes. If additional behavioral health resources were deemed necessary, I would not hesitate to request such resources from the Services to fill any identified gaps.

SUICIDE PREVENTION

Question. The number of suicides in each of the Services continues to concern the committee. A number of these military suicides are committed in theater.

What is your assessment of CENTCOM's suicide prevention program?

Answer. The challenge of suicide represents the most difficult one I have faced in my 37-year career in the Army. While I'm not currently in a position to assess CENTCOM's suicide prevention program, I know from experience that an effective suicide prevention program requires involved and engaged leadership at every level. If confirmed, I will ensure suicide prevention receives the appropriate command and leadership emphasis throughout the CENTCOM organization.

Question. In your view, are there any unique stressors in the CENTCOM AOR that contribute to the number of suicides of servicemembers serving in, or who have recently served in, the CENTCOM AOR?

Answer. Certainly there are stressors in the CENTCOM AOR. These include exposure to combat environments, multiple deployments and high operational tempo. That said, the challenge of suicide is incredibly complex. While some of the stressors experienced in the CENTCOM AOR may contribute to acts of suicide or suicidal ideations, generally there is no single causal factor. In most cases, a combination of stressors lead an individual to take his/her own life or attempt to do so. That said, I do recognize that most CENTCOM forces are rotational. They are often required to operate in stressful environments away from their loved ones. If confirmed, as CENTCOM commander I will be mindful of these stressors and associated challenges and I will make sure my subordinate commanders are appropriately focused on them as well.

Question. If confirmed, what resources would you use to help prevent suicides in theater and to prepare redeploying servicemembers for transition to life back at home?

Answer. Prevention of suicide in theater and at home is a vital priority—the safety of all deploying, deployed, and returning servicemembers is always foremost among my priorities.

Confronting the difficult reality of suicide in the force requires regularly exercising a broad complement of health resources within fully supportive command culture. This process begins with recognizing the importance of taking care of people, which will always remain the most important asset in our military. It is imperative that we implement programs and separate suicide prevention initiatives that comprise a comprehensive approach to suicide prevention throughout the life cycle of the training and deployment so that servicemembers can receive appropriate counseling, assistance, respite, and support. Continuing to educate Leaders at all levels regarding behavioral health and its resources, both in theater and out, along with the installation of resiliency training will assist with identifying servicemembers who may need additional resources while decreasing the stigma associated with behavioral health treatment. All resources available to servicemembers need to be actively engaged to educate and support our servicemembers to ensure a seamless transition during all phases of a deployment.

SEXUAL ASSAULT

Question. Sexual assaults continue to be a significant issue in the military. Victims of sexual assault report that they are victimized twice: first by attackers in their own ranks and then by unresponsive or inadequate treatment for the victim and failure of the chain of command to hold assailants accountable. Secretary Panetta has recently announced several new initiatives to address the sexual assault problems in the military, including comprehensive assessments of initial training of enlisted personnel and officers, creation of special victim capabilities, and limiting initial disposition authority to Special Court-Martial Convening Authorities in the grade of O–6 or higher.

What is your assessment of the sexual assault prevention and response program in CENTCOM?

Answer. I am not currently in a position to assess CENTCOM's sexual assault prevention and response program. However, if confirmed, I will make sexual assault prevention a leadership focus throughout the command and ensure that the sexual assault prevention and response programs in CENTCOM subordinate commands and components are effective and vigorously maintained and supported. Training must be high quality and engaging. Commanders and leaders must be present and involved in training. They must also take an active role in selecting unit sexual harassment/assault representatives and victim advocates. It is extremely important that the right individuals be selected for these key positions.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources available in the CENTCOM AOR for providing appropriate support to victims of sexual assault?

Answer. I am not currently in a position to assess the adequacy of the training and resources available in the CENTCOM AOR. However, if confirmed, I will make sure that the appropriate support is provided to victims of sexual assault, both those in the CENTCOM AOR and in CONUS. That said, I believe that sexual assault prevention and response training must begin before leaving home station. Forces who have conducted training prior to deployment are much better equipped to prevent sexual assault in the first place and address reports of sexual assault if/when they do arise.

Question. What is your assessment of the capability in the CENTCOM AOR to investigate allegations of sexual assault and to hold assailants accountable for their acts?

Answer. I believe that CID, AFOSI, and NCIS are capable of investigating any sexual assault that occurs in the CENTCOM AOR. Commanders have the ability to hold servicemembers accountable when they have been accused of sexual assault. Commanders can pursue the same options while deployed as they would in garrison, up to and including a general court-martial, and I will make it a priority to ensure they have the resources in theater to do so.

INTELLIGENCE SUPPORT FOR INDIRECT ACTIVITIES

Question. Some observers contend that the national intelligence agencies focus their assistance to the Defense Department in Afghanistan and Iraq on special operators engaged in direct action operations. As a consequence, it is alleged, general purpose forces and Special Operations Forces engaged in indirect activities, including foreign internal defense and population protection, receive less intelligence support.

If confirmed, how would you ensure that general purpose forces and Special Operations Forces engaged in indirect activities receive adequate intelligence support?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure our forces, regardless of whether they are engaged in direct action or indirect activities, receive the intelligence support they need to effectively execute and accomplish their mission. I will clearly state my Priority Intelligence Requirements and allocate Intelligence, Surveillance, and Reconnaissance support in accordance with prioritized, theater requirements and capabilities.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS FORCES IN SUPPORT OF COUNTRY TEAMS

Question. U.S. Special Operations Command deploys personnel to work with country teams in a number of priority countries where the United States is not engaged in direct action operations, but rather trying to stop the spread of violent extremism. Their mission is to support the priorities of the Ambassador and the geographic combatant commander's theater campaign plan against terrorist networks.

Please describe the potential value of these special operations personnel to CENTCOM and the country teams they are supporting.

Answer. Our Special Operations Forces (SOF) are the best in the world and are a key component in maintaining the U.S. Government's access into a host nation, and advancing interoperability with the host nation's military. These objectives are aligned with the Ambassador's overarching engagement strategy and the activities of the country team. They excel when operating in the strategic environment under austere conditions, and are particularly adept in keeping a small footprint on the ground. These characteristics make them particularly useful and valuable in our Theater engagement strategy, and a given when responding to crisis in the region.

Question. If confirmed, what, if anything, do you intend to do to make sure the goals of special operations personnel deployed to these countries are closely aligned with those of the Ambassadors with whom they are working?

Answer. If confirmed, it would be my responsibility to ensure that our operations and activities are aligned and integrated into the Ambassador's country specific objectives and our national security objectives. I recognize that my relationships with the Chiefs of Mission in the region will be critical to achieving necessary unity of effort. I will charge my subordinate SOF commanders at all levels to keep their lines of communication open with their respective Chiefs of Mission.

INTERAGENCY COLLABORATION

Question. The collaboration between U.S. Special Operations Forces, general purpose forces, and other U.S. Government departments and agencies has played a significant role in the success of counterinsurgency and counterterrorism operations in recent years. However, much of this collaboration has been ad hoc in nature.

What do you believe are the most important lessons learned from the collaborative interagency efforts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere?

Answer. Our experiences in Iraq and Afghanistan have taught us that to achieve our goals and objectives we must balance all instruments of national power. The complexity of the current operating environment requires a whole-of-government approach that leverages the individual strengths of the Interagency, to include our military and diplomatic partners and others. Unity of effort, based on a 'team of team' concept, is essential. We must identify common goals and objectives early on and work together to achieve them.

Question. How do you believe these efforts can be improved?

Answer. The nature of warfare today requires unity of effort. As such, I believe we should look to expand our collaboration with our interagency partners to include all stages of planning and operations. We must not wait until we are in the midst of crises. By working together on a routine basis, we will effectively align goals and objectives, improve communications and enhance the understanding of one another's methods and perspectives. This will ultimately enhance individual and U.S. Government effectiveness.

Question. How can the lessons learned in recent years be captured in military doctrine and adopted as "best practices" for future contingency operations?

Answer. Lessons learned from combatant command, combined/joint operations area, and unit/tactical level activities should be communicated to the Services for incorporation into professional military education, for civilian-military structural recommendations, and for inclusion in the next revisions of joint and Service-level doctrine.

UNIFIED COMMAND PLAN CHANGES

Question. It has been reported that Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM), is seeking changes to the Unified Command Plan (UCP) and other authorities that he believes would allow SOCOM to better support the requirements of the Theater Special Operations Commands (TSOCs). Reportedly, such changes would give the Commander of SOCOM combatant command authority over the TSOCs—including responsibilities for resourcing—and provide for more rapid deployment of Special Operations Forces to and between geographic combatant commands without the requirement for approval by the Secretary of Defense in every case. Operational control of deployed special operations forces would reportedly remain with the respective geographic combatant commander. Some have expressed concern that such changes could raise problems related to civilian control of the military, infringe upon the traditional authorities of the geographic combatant commanders, and make it more difficult for ambassadors and geographic combatant commanders to know what military personnel are coming into their areas of responsibility and what they are doing while they are there.

Please provide your assessment of whether such UCP changes are appropriate and can be made without conflicting with civilian control of the military, infringing upon authorities provided to the geographic combatant commanders, or raising concerns with the State Department.

Answer. If confirmed, I will review all recommended changes to the UCP. However, it has been my experience that Special Operations Forces are most effectively employed when fully integrated with conventional forces. This integration ensures better coordination, unity of effort and the ability to share critical resources.

Question. In your view, are there any countries that should be added or removed from the CENTCOM AOR as part of the review of the UCP?

Answer. I believe the current area of responsibility effectively and efficiently facilitates accomplishment of the CENTCOM assigned missions. If confirmed, I will continuously assess the CENTCOM missions and AOR and propose realignment if future conditions warrant.

SECTION 1208 OPERATIONS

Question. Section 1208 of the Ronald Reagan National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2005 (Public Law 108–375), as amended by subsequent bills, authorizes the provision of support (including training, funding, and equipment) to regular forces, irregular forces, and individuals supporting or facilitating military operations by U.S. Special Operations Forces to combat terrorism.

What is your assessment of this authority?

Answer. Section 1208 authority provides authority and funds for U.S. SOF to train and equip regular and irregular indigenous forces to conduct counterterrorism operations. This authority is considered a key tool in combating terrorism and is directly responsible for a number of highly successful counter-terror operations. Throughout the CENTCOM AOR 1208 facilitates multiple joint operations between Theater and National SOF partnering with host nation forces. These 1208 funded operations create capable responsive host nation forces closely partnered with U.S. SOF and represent the best opportunity to counterterrorist activities that threaten U.S. interests.

MILITARY INFORMATION SUPPORT OPERATIONS

Question. Al Qaeda and affiliated violent extremist groups work hard to appeal to local populations. In several cases throughout the CENTCOM AOR, most recently in Yemen, these efforts have allowed violent extremists to establish a safe haven, conduct operations, and expand their recruiting base. The composition and size of these groups in comparison to the U.S. Government permits it to make policy decisions very quickly.

Do you believe CENTCOM and other agencies within the U.S. Government are appropriately organized to respond effectively to the messaging and influence efforts of al Qaeda and other affiliated terrorist groups?

Answer. Al Qaeda exploitation of the information environment continues to mature and is a decisive part of the al Qaeda Senior Leader's campaign. While I'm not currently in a position to assess U.S. Government MISO capabilities, I recognize that CENTCOM must be able to dominate the information environment and ensure we do not unwittingly cede the information battle-space to the enemy.

Question. What steps, if any, do you believe CENTCOM should take to counter and delegitimize violent extremist ideologies?

Answer. CENTCOM plays a significant role in countering and delegitimizing violent extremist ideologies by eroding recruitment, reach, fundraising and communication capabilities through military information support and coordinated interagency operations.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Commander, CENTCOM?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

AFGHANISTAN TRANSITION

1. Senator MCCASKILL. General Austin, I am concerned about what appears to me to be a lack of civilian planning and a lack of coordination for the transition to our post-2014 involvement in Afghanistan. The Government Accountability Office recently released a report that found that the Department of Defense (DOD) is effectively managing on behalf of the Department of State (DOS) 20 assisted interagency acquisitions with an estimated value of almost $1 billion for basic support goods and services. In these cases, DOD has been involved in every aspect of the acquisition cycle, including planning, award, management, and oversight. I am concerned that DOS is not prepared to manage the contracts it will need in the post-2014 period in Afghanistan when the U.S. military largely leaves Afghanistan. What do you intend to do, if confirmed, to ensure that there is adequate coordination to ensure that DOS is not dependent on DOD to manage contracts in Afghanistan after 2014?

General AUSTIN. Based upon lessons learned from DOD to DOS transition in Iraq, U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) and DOS created the Afghanistan Contract Transition Working Group in 2012. This group is specifically addressing the transition of contracts from DOD to DOS post-2014. They are examining all contracts currently in place to assist DOS in determining which services need to continue after 2014 and to prepare DOS acquisition management personnel to assume control of contracting operations in Afghanistan. The group reports its progress on contract transition matters to the Afghanistan Executive Steering Group, a forum comprised of senior DOD and DOS leaders. If confirmed, I will continue to facilitate the efforts of this group.

SUSTAINABILITY REQUIREMENTS

2. Senator MCCASKILL. General Austin, Congress has been clear that greater analysis and assurances are needed to ensure that the reconstruction projects the United States is undertaking in Afghanistan are not only needed and wanted by the Afghan Government, but sustainable by the Afghan Government. Congress made this clear in the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2013, which stated that funding for reconstruction and development in contingencies will not be available for use until a sustainability assessment is conducted that accounts for the host country's ability to maintain these projects. This applies not only to DOD, but also DOS and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID).

Now that these sustainability requirements for infrastructure projects are law, it is up to these departments, including DOD, to implement the law effectively and aggressively. Should you be confirmed as the Commander of CENTCOM, you will play a key role in implementing the law as it pertains to projects in Afghanistan. What steps will you take to ensure we are funding sustainable projects in Afghanistan?

General AUSTIN. Prior to funding any infrastructure projects in Afghanistan, U.S Forces-Afghanistan (USFOR–A) conducts assessments to ensure we are implementing projects the Government of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan (GIRoA) wants, needs and can sustain. Sustainment estimates, which include personnel, training and funding resources, are continually refined throughout the project selection process in consultation with GIRoA. USFOR–A also ensures sustainment costs have been budgeted by GIRoA or other international agencies. In partnership with the USAID and U.S. Embassy Kabul, USFOR–A continues to build GIRoA's capacity to operate and sustain projects which are critical to Afghanistan's stability and economic development. If confirmed, I will ensure CENTCOM continues to aggressively support this oversight process.

SEXUAL ASSAULT

3. Senator MCCASKILL. General Austin and General Rodriguez, it is my understanding that the movie "The Invisible War" is being used to help educate senior leaders in the U.S. Armed Forces about the issue of sexual assault in the military. Have you seen the movie?

General AUSTIN. Yes.

4. Senator MCCASKILL. General Austin and General Rodriguez, as a leader in the U.S. Army, what have you learned about the issue of sexual assault facing servicemembers under your command?

General AUSTIN. All individuals deserve to be treated with dignity and respect, and they should be guaranteed living and working environments free of sexual harassment and sexual assault. During my tenure as VCSA, I have conducted a number of sensing sessions with soldiers of all ranks in order to hear their thoughts and concerns on the topic. These sessions have proven to be very informative and helpful to me and other senior leaders and commanders.

We take these issues very seriously and we are actively taking steps to reduce the incidence of sexual harassment and sexual assault in our ranks. Indeed, commanders are now, and must remain, critical players in establishing the right environments, caring for victims and holding offenders accountable within the military justice system. A key component in victim reporting is a command climate that fosters a bond of trust and confidence between Leaders and their subordinates. Culture change is on the horizon; the Army has seen the propensity to report by our female soldiers increase in recent years. This positive trend indicates that our female soldiers do, in fact, trust their chain of command.

We acknowledge that there is more work to be done to continue this upward trend and institutionalize our efforts, and our leaders remains focused and committed to continuing to contribute to this most critical endeavor.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOE MANCHIN III

AFGHANISTAN

5. Senator MANCHIN. General Austin, I am a strong supporter of bringing our troops home from Afghanistan as quickly as possible so we can focus on rebuilding America. The President's recent announcements to bring home 34,000 American soldiers within the next year and to move up the transition to Afghan combat lead by a few months are welcome, but I still believe that we need an even more aggressive timeline for withdrawal. Over the next 2 years, do you think there will be any opportunities for further expediting the timeline for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Afghanistan?

General AUSTIN. We are at a vital juncture in this campaign and the pace of the transition and withdrawal must remain consistent with the status of mission and conditions on the ground. However, at this time I cannot predict if there will be opportunities in the coming days to further expedite the withdrawal. If confirmed, I will work closely with General Dunford to continuously assess the situation and provide best military advice to our civilian leadership.

6. Senator MANCHIN. General Austin, our combat mission in Afghanistan is transitioning to one of training, advising, and assisting the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF). In light of this change, what are the milestones and measures of effectiveness that DOD is using to track the readiness of ANSF to stand on their own? I would like to see DOD carefully track and report to Congress on progress against these milestones because the sooner these targets have been reached, the sooner we can withdrawal troops dedicated to the training mission.

General AUSTIN. If confirmed, I will focus on several principal strategic level objectives over the next 2 years including: the transition of lead security responsibility to the ANSF; ensuring that we set the conditions for the 2014 Afghan Presidential elections; and, ensuring all necessary actions are taken to successfully achieve the full transition of security responsibility to the democratically elected Government of Afghanistan. Success in Afghanistan will ultimately hinge, in large measure, on the leadership within Afghanistan.

Having said that, keeping a close eye on milestones and measures of effectiveness to track the readiness of ANSF has been an evolutionary effort over the past several years. We have developed several tools used to assess and track ANSF capabilities and their ability to stand on their own. For example, NTM–A uses the Commander's Unit Assessment Tool to assess the condition of ANSF units in areas that include: leadership, operations, intelligence, logistics, equipping, personnel, maintenance, communications, training and education, and partnering. Capability Milestones are the measures of effectiveness used to track the ANSF readiness and performance at the ministerial level. These assessments are conducted quarterly and allow for advisors to focus efforts with the Afghans to continue improving their readiness and performance. I will work closely with General Dunford to provide DOD with progress reports against these milestones in support of congressional reporting requirements.

7. Senator MANCHIN. General Austin, this question is related to your current position as Vice Chief of Staff of the Army, and impacts your future position as Commander of CENTCOM because, as you aptly state in your advance policy questions, you inherently understand "the importance of taking care of people, which will always remain the most important asset in our military."

It has come to my attention that there are deployed Army battalions in Afghanistan that do not have the appropriate family support at home station. In September 2012, Secretary McHugh assured me that deployed battalions would have Family Readiness Support assistants, but I know of at least a few battalions that do not. Before voting for your confirmation, I would like to bring this matter to your attention. Will you commit that you have reviewed these policies in your current role, and that in your future role, you wholly agree that deployed units must have the appropriate family support?

General AUSTIN. I am grateful for the continued support that you have shown for our servicemembers and families. I absolutely agree that caring for our families is and must remain a top priority. They represent a critical part of our Army Team. They've made countless sacrifices over the years, and certainly we could not have accomplished all that we have over the past decade-plus of conflict without their support. I am aware of the issue that has prompted your concern; the senior Army leadership is currently addressing this matter directly. You have my full assurance that, if confirmed, as CENTCOM Commander I will make sure that the families of all of our deployed servicemembers receive the full support they merit and deserve.

8. Senator MANCHIN. General Austin, what opportunities do you see for encouraging other countries, particularly Afghanistan's neighbors, to do more to build ANSF capacity?

General AUSTIN. Presently, Afghanistan's neighbors are not in an economic position to provide equipment or technical training to the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF). However, all of Afghanistan's neighbors share a common interest in a stable and secure Afghanistan with an ANSF capable of preventing Violent Extremist Organization (VEO) safe havens and controlling the adverse regional effects of narcotics and criminal patronage networks. Initial ANSF capacity is established through the efforts of the International Security Assistance Forces (ISAF) Coalition and international donors. The future effectiveness of ANSF will depend on bilateral military engagement with Afghanistan's neighbors. Nowhere will ANSF bilateral engagement be more critical than along the remote and rugged border areas with Pakistan in which extremists and criminals seek sanctuary and who directly threaten both nations.

9. Senator MANCHIN. General Austin, are there things the U.S. military can do to encourage these partnerships to relieve the burden on our forces?

General AUSTIN. There are a number of things that U.S. Forces have done and are continuing to do to facilitate our continued partnerships. First, we are providing first-class training to coalition units deploying into theater. Second, we are working closely with our partners in the region to develop the tactics, techniques and procedures that promote multinational interoperability. Third, we assist countries in developing their own capabilities through training events and foreign military sales. Finally, we are continuing to develop military-to-military relationships at the highest level through strategic engagements that not only promote trust, but also help key leaders to understand our various military and political concerns.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JEANNE SHAHEEN

WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM AFGHANISTAN

10. Senator SHAHEEN. General Austin, in your testimony, you stated that you felt confident that the ANSF were on track to assume the lead in security this spring. In your examination of the ongoing operations, are you confident that the withdrawal of 34,000 troops this year will allow for adequate force protection of Americans still in theater?

General AUSTIN. The safety and security of our deployed forces remains our foremost priority. The planned withdrawal of 34,000 troops will be phased, as it was with the Surge drawdown, to ensure we are able to successfully conduct the required mission while providing sufficient force protection. Troops will be redeployed incrementally and on pace with base closure and retrograde.

11. Senator SHAHEEN. General Austin, from your experience with the Iraq withdrawal, what do you think that the United States should do differently as we prepare to withdraw from Afghanistan?

General AUSTIN. The Iraq withdrawal experience taught us two things: to begin planning earlier and to consider all possibilities, including not having a status of forces agreement (SOFA) that provides the legal protection for our military forces and civilians to operate in a sovereign nation. Redeployment planning and execution is underway and leaders have incorporated the critical lessons learned from Iraq including the possibility that the United States and Afghanistan may fail to agree to a Bilateral Security Agreement.

12. Senator SHAHEEN. General Austin, what best practices do you think are applicable to this new challenge?

General AUSTIN. Although the challenges in Afghanistan are different in many respects, ISAF is using the lessons learned from the Iraq drawdown to help shape their campaign plan. There are a few best practices that are critical to success: (1) synchronize retrograde operations with operational maneuver to ensure adequate force protection and enabler support as the size of our force decreases; (2) conduct all planning with DOS and other agencies to ensure all interagency missions are synchronized and set up for success through the transition process; (3) prepare for the possibility that no status of forces agreement will be in place for subsequent protection of U.S. troops and contractors; and (4) ensure the training and advising of the ANSF remain the focus, as the ANSF takes the lead for security across Afghanistan and as we redeploy our forces.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

TROOP MORALE IN AFGHANISTAN

13. Senator BLUMENTHAL. General Austin, I have heard from several Connecticut servicemembers and their family members deployed to Afghanistan that when they are not at the base during certain hours, they do not receive breakfast. I have also heard from servicemembers that the free wireless Internet provided in Internet cafes is occasionally too slow for them to communicate with family members back home via Skype. I understand that servicemembers must pay up to $100 per month if they would like high-speed Internet service in their living quarters. I have every confidence that you will ensure the welfare of all military personnel under your command. If confirmed, how would you address the welfare and morale issues of breakfast and adequate Internet use for our servicemembers deployed in Afghanistan?

General AUSTIN. The care of our deployed servicemembers is critically important and I consider this to be an operational issue. Mission requirements dictate the availability of certain resources and as our footprint gets smaller, we may necessarily see gaps in certain services due to operational requirements. That said, if confirmed, I will ensure that leaders continue to provide proper care and recreational opportunities within mission constraints.

JORDAN

14. Senator BLUMENTHAL. General Austin, the civil war in Syria is causing thousands to flee to the Jordanian Refugee Camp Zaatari where there are press reports of Jordanian outsiders entering the area and that it is not properly secured. If confirmed, would you consider providing specific training and technical assistance to the Jordanian military to improve security control at the Zaatari refugee camp, where conditions are worsening and the Government of Jordan is bearing the brunt of a crisis that requires a regional response?

General AUSTIN. The U.S. military routinely provides focused and effective training as well as technical assistance to the Jordanian Armed Forces. The majority of the training and assistance we provide increases their capacity and capabilities in order to ensure a secure and stable Jordan. With regards to security at the Zaatri refugee camp, the Jordanian Armed Forces do not provide any internal or perimeter security for the camp. The Government of Jordan relies on their police forces and Gendarme to provide security at Zaatri. The Jordanian Armed Forces provide security for the refugees at the border and while transporting them to Zaatri. Because the security providers at the camp are Ministry of Interior personnel, CENTCOM would need special authorities to provide any training or technical assistance should they ask for it.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

TACTICAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS

15. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Austin, several nuclear powers reside in the CENTCOM AOR. There is much concern about countries like Pakistan who have unstable governments, discontent populations, and a nuclear weapons capability. According to the Congressional Research Service and the Federation of American Scientists, Pakistan has approximately 90 to 110 warheads, recently passing India's inventory of 80 to 100 weapons. This appears to be a nuclear arms race in South Asia. What are your thoughts on tactical nuclear weapons?

General AUSTIN. The security and accountability of all tactical nuclear weapons in that volatile and beleaguered part of the world is of utmost importance to the United States, especially given our vital national interests located throughout the region. While Pakistan represents the only nuclear power in the CENTCOM AOR, we remain concerned about the persistent risk of proliferation and certainly the potential for an arms race in South Asia. If confirmed, I will also work closely with the Commander of PACOM to ensure that nuclear tensions between Pakistan and India are properly addressed. Meanwhile, our ultimate goal is to help to discourage Pakistan from maintaining tactical nuclear weapons given the inherent threat they pose to security and stability in the region. Larger nuclear weapons are contained on installations with multi-layered security and are more difficult to conceal. In contrast, tactical nuclear weapons are far easier to transport and conceal and thus more difficult to track.

16. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Austin, what is your message to leaders in Pakistan for future involvement?

General AUSTIN. We want to convey to them our belief that the significant risks associated with maintaining tactical nuclear weapons far outweighs any potential benefit. We also want to emphasize the grave need to ensure the proper security and accountability of these weapons. Ultimately, it is in both our countries' best interest to remain engaged at all levels in order to promote Pakistan stability and security and accountability of all nuclear weapons.

17. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Austin, what will be CENTCOM's role in engaging with Pakistani military leaders for responsible accountability and positioning of tactical nuclear weapons?

General AUSTIN. The development of tactical nuclear weapons as a potential counter to larger conventional forces is certainly an area of concern that merits our attention. The United States must continue to employ all elements of national power to aid and assist Pakistan in improving its overall nuclear security and to prevent the proliferation of nuclear material and technology. If confirmed, I will ensure that CENTCOM continues to promote U.S./Pakistan military-to-military engagements at the highest levels to promote the security and accountability of Pakistan's nuclear weapons program.

IRANIAN NUCLEAR WEAPONS CAPABILITY

18. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Austin, while they state otherwise, it appears Iran is actively pursuing a nuclear weapons capability. This is something we cannot allow and there must be a red line drawn prior to Iran acquiring this capability. What are the key indicators on Iran's path to nuclear weapons capability?

General AUSTIN. Key indicators could include: (1) Tehran ceases all cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency, which could result in the lack of verification of Iran's nuclear-related materials and facilities; (2) Uranium enrichment above the 20-percent level is detected; this would exceed Iran's current civilian use requirements and may have military implications; (3) Accumulation of large stockpiles of 20-percent enriched uranium; (4) Confirmation of nuclear weapons-related activities, many of which were outlined in the International Atomic Energy Agency November 2011 report annex; (5) Operation of a plutonium production reactor and establishment of a plutonium reprocessing capability; (6) Continued testing and growth of Tactical Ballistic Missile capabilities in the Iranian military.

19. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Austin, what are the red lines and what actions should we take?

General AUSTIN. The President has stated the United States cannot and will not allow Iran to develop or acquire nuclear weapons and avoiding a regional nuclear arms race is critical to preserving stability in the Middle East. Accordingly, CENTCOM is postured to provide the President of the United States (POTUS) with a range of military options, as required. That said, the best way to accomplish this goal is through diplomacy, both unilateral and with our allies and United Nation partners, and a tough sanctions regime. In parallel, the United States needs to continue to maintain a strong U.S. military presence within the Arabian Gulf region and build our regional partners' military capabilities to defend themselves and the region in the event of a crisis with Iran. If a crisis with Iran does occur, CENTCOM is prepared to defend U.S. interests and our partners' sovereignty and maintain the free flow of international commerce throughout the region.

20. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Austin, do you support the full range of policy options, to include the use of force?

General AUSTIN. Yes. Our Nation has vital national interests throughout the CENTCOM AOR that would be jeopardized by a regionally-hegemonic and aggressive Iran in possession of a nuclear weapon. Therefore, and as POTUS has stated, we will not tolerate a nuclear-armed Iran and stand ready to employ all instruments of national power to ensure Iran does not achieve such a capability. If confirmed, as the CENTCOM Commander, I will be prepared at all times to provide POTUS with a range of options for effective military actions across the spectrum of conflict.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

IRAN'S ACTIVITIES

21. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, what are Iran's activities now in Syria?

General AUSTIN. Over the past 2 years, Iran has focused on keeping the Assad regime in power to maintain the critical gateway to its regional surrogates and proxies. Iran is providing the Syrian regime money, weapons, military advisors, technical support, and is becoming directly involved in operations against opposition forces. Additionally, Iran is increasing support to pro-Assad Shia militants, including establishing, training, and equipping the Jaysh al Sha'bi militia.

22. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, what are Iran's activities in Lebanon, Yemen, Iraq, and Afghanistan?

General AUSTIN. The Iranian Threat Network (ITN) is a worldwide network consisting of the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps-Quds Force (IRGC–QF), Ministry of Intelligence and Security (MOIS), and their surrogates, business and logistics support. ITN actions, lethal or otherwise, are a problem common to nearly every troubled country in the region including Lebanon, Yemen, Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iran continues to exploit regional animosity toward Israel to gain influence in the Levant, portraying itself as the sole supporter of Palestinian and Lebanese resistance. Iran continues providing Hezballah with lethal military support, religious guidance, and funding for numerous outreach programs targeting Shia communities throughout Lebanon and specifically in southern Beirut. Iranian lethal aid includes several advanced weapons systems, such as anti-ship missiles, surface-to-surface missiles, unmanned aerial vehicles, several variants of manportable air defense systems, anti-tank guided missiles and tens of thousands of tactical rockets.

In Yemen, Iran has taken advantage of unrest since early 2011 to grow its influence. They are providing lethal and non-lethal support to segments of the Huthi rebel movement in Yemen, in hopes of building the group into a Lebanese Hizballah like element it can use to pressure the Yemeni Government. Iran is also establishing an Arabian Peninsula based weapons hub for training and exporting lethal aid to Yemen.

Iran is trying to expand its influence in Iraq by strengthening its political, economic, and military ties with the Iraqi Government and its senior leaders. Influence over Iraqi officials allows Iran to extend hard and soft power influence in key areas of Iraq. Iraqi airspace has been used to ferry lethal aid to Syria, uninhibited by perfunctory Iraqi inspections of aircraft. Tehran is also engaging Iraqi political leaders on all sides to ensure the current Iraqi political crisis does not devolve into conflict. Iran continues to support its Shia militant proxies, even though the groups have assumed a lower profile in Iraq over the past year.

In Afghanistan, Iran through the IRGC–QF, continues equipping and training the Taliban and other insurgents to undermine ISAF efforts to establish security and stability in Afghanistan. Iran's other influential efforts include overt support for the Afghan Government and economic and cultural outreach to the Afghan populace, particularly Shia minority populations. Politically, Iran seeks to maintain positive relations within the highest levels of the Afghan Government while attempting to steer Afghanistan away from a long-term Bilateral Security Agreement with the United States.

ARABIAN GULF

23. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, are we in a period of heightened risk in the Arabian Gulf region?

General AUSTIN. Yes. Iran's actions in the Arabian Gulf, of late, have been more aggressive as Tehran attempts to assert territorial claims that exceed internationally recognized limits. As Iran continues to actively challenge our presence in international airspace and waters of the Gulf, these events create the potential for miscalculation. Iran also continues improving the lethality and accuracy of its ballistic missiles and conducts military exercises with the stated purpose of closing the Strait of Hormuz, threatening not only its neighbors but also the global economy. Meanwhile, the International Atomic Energy Agency has reported that Iran continues to increase and improve its uranium enrichment activities, causing concerns over the potential military dimensions of its nuclear program.

24. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, what are the consequences of not having the second aircraft carrier in the Arabian Gulf region?

General AUSTIN. While the presence of a second aircraft carrier significantly enhances the flexibility and number of response options available to POTUS in the midst of a crisis, in its absence the United States still retains a robust response capability for any number of contingencies. That said, the lack of a second carrier would increase response times required to execute some military options in the region.

INTEGRATED AIR AND MISSILE DEFENSE FRAMEWORK

25. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, given regional threats and a need to balance Iran's nuclear ambitions, will CENTCOM continue to pursue a robust integrated air and missile defense framework with our Gulf Cooperation Council partners?

General AUSTIN. Yes. Developing a robust integrated air and missile defense framework with our Gulf Cooperation Council partners is central to demonstrating the U.S. resolve in the region. Iran possesses extensive ballistic missile capabilities that continue to grow in quantity and technological sophistication. Their disruptive behavior threatens the security interests of our regional partners and the vital interests of the United States and we must emphasize interoperability with our partners as they procure new and upgrade older missile defense systems. Ultimately, a layered U.S. and Gulf Cooperation Council missile defense architecture is necessary to effectively counter the Iranian tactical ballistic missile threat and preserve operational flexibility.

SEQUESTER RISKS

26. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, how will sequestration increase risk to our interests in the CENTCOM AOR?

General AUSTIN. Sequestration will significantly increase the risk to readiness and ongoing missions in the CENTCOM AOR as Chairman Dempsey and the Service Chiefs have stated. Sequestration will cause the Services to delay required maintenance to ships and other major systems, curtail pilot training hours, stall procurement decisions, and cancel contracts. While such actions may meet short-term sequestration goals, they introduce risk and likely result in greater expenditures later. The effects of sequestration will negatively impact all of the Services, thereby having a significant operational impact on the CENTCOM AOR due to its geography, the pace of ongoing combat operations, and the likelihood of numerous unforeseen contingencies.

SURVEILLANCE IN CENTRAL COMMAND

27. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, the 2002 $250 million wargame Millennium Challenge simulated a naval engagement in the Gulf and found that speedboats pose a serious threat to our CENTCOM forces, especially in the Strait of Hormuz. Given that, is persistent ISR that can track these speedboats still required?

General AUSTIN. Yes. The threat tactics employed during Millennium Challenge still pose a significant threat to our forces. Specifically, tactics such as swarming have been practiced and refined by the Iranians over the years. Iranian speed boats, which we categorize as Fast Attack Craft and Fast In-shore Attack Craft, pose a unique and significant threat to U.S. and coalition naval forces, as well as commercial shipping in the Arabian Gulf. These craft are integral to Iran's mine-laying and swarm tactics and thus pose a significant threat to the safety of navigation through the Strait of Hormuz and the shipping lanes of the Arabian Gulf. Given the low observable signatures and dynamic operations of these threats, persistent ISR is still required.

28. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, given what we know about Iran's missile capabilities, would you consider integration of fire control and persistent ISR valuable to the protection of our forward deployed troops?

General AUSTIN. Yes. CENTCOM forces and coalition partners will have only minimal time to react to missile launches in the Arabian Gulf. Rapid identification, verification, geolocation, and kinetic targeting of such threats is a must (find-fix-finish).

29. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, the Army recently announced that the Joint Land Attack Cruise Missile Defense Elevated Netted Sensor (JLENS) system would be demonstrated in the National Capital Region to provide exactly that kind of ISR and defense. Would such a system help counter threats such as those posed to U.S. Forces in the Gulf?

General AUSTIN. Persistent ISR systems such as JLENS, specifically designed for missile detection and tracking, would help to counter threats such as those posed to U.S. Forces in the Gulf. However, JLENS is not currently a program of record and is still in testing. If this system does become available for worldwide operational use, JLENS will offer persistent and multi-sensor capabilities optimized for point area defense. The fact that JLENS is tethered will prove a limitation requiring substantial planning and de-confliction to overcome the impact to air navigation, especially in nations who only grant the United States limited use of their airspace.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE FORCE

30. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, if General Dunford told you that he believes the pace of the withdrawal is jeopardizing our interests and a positive outcome in Afghanistan, would you support his request to slow the pace of withdrawal?

General AUSTIN. I will remain in close contact with General Dunford to assess the conditions on the ground, consider his best judgment in any major decisions regarding the campaign, including the pace of redeployment of our forces, and provide my best military advice to my chain of command.

31. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, if General Dunford says he needs more forces than planned after 2014, would you support that request?

General AUSTIN. I will work closely with General Dunford and consider his best judgment in any major decisions regarding the campaign, including the size of the forces required to meet the mission, as directed by the President. I will continue to work with General Dunford and his team, the Joint Staff and DOD, to assess conditions on the ground and provide my best military advice to my chain of command.

32. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, what will happen in Afghanistan if the United States withdraws too quickly or leaves too few troops in Afghanistan post-2014?

General AUSTIN. Campaign success through 2014 and beyond requires balancing many factors, including mission requirements, availability of resources, and risk to forces. Ultimately, the Afghans are responsible for securing their own country, and we have made a significant investment in training their forces to achieve this goal. That said, while it is hard to predict exactly what would happen if the United States were to withdraw too quickly, such a withdrawal could jeopardize the hard fought gains achieved over the last 12-plus years. Ultimately, withdrawing too quickly could result in increased instability in Afghanistan and throughout the region. If confirmed, I will work closely with General Dunford to ensure a responsible transition and withdrawal of U.S. Forces from Afghanistan.

SYRIA

33. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, why do you believe that the al Nusrah Front is increasing in capability and influence in Syria?

General AUSTIN. The "al Qaeda in Iraq" Syrian front organization, al-Nusrah Front, has achieved its current level of capability and influence because of two key variables. Al Nusrah has focused on outreach to the Syrian populace, tempering its vision of an Islamic state and building an outreach program that includes basic humanitarian assistance. This has some Syrians looking to al Nusrah as a viable alternative to the current Assad regime. This outreach is powerful when combined with the second key to al Nusrah's success, the experience its forces bring to the fight in Syria. This experience, gained largely in Iraq, includes not only tactics and strategies, but also logistics, organizational skills, and a discriminating use of violence. Al Nusrah Front strives to minimize civilian casualties and applies savvy propaganda when unwanted deaths occur, typically shifting the blame to regime forces or other Syrian opposition groups.

CONTRACTING WITH THE ENEMY

34. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, are you aware of section 841 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012, titled "Prohibition on Contracting with the Enemy in the CENTCOM Theater of Operations"?

General AUSTIN. Yes, I am aware of section 841 and the authority granted to the CENTCOM Commander to issue findings against companies and individuals actively supporting the insurgency.

35. Senator AYOTTE. General Austin, if confirmed, do you commit to aggressively implementing these authorities to save taxpayer money and ensure U.S. contracting funds do not end up in the hands of our enemies?

General AUSTIN. Yes, if confirmed, I will aggressively utilize the authority provided under section 841 to issue findings against companies and individuals found to be using proceeds from U.S. contracts to actively support the insurgency.

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

LLOYD J. AUSTIN III.

This 2nd day of December, 2013.

[The nomination of GEN Lloyd J. Austin III, USA, was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on February 26, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on March 5, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to GEN David M. Rodriguez, USA, by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and the chain of command by clearly delineating the combatant commanders' responsibilities and authorities and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These reforms have also improved cooperation between the Services and the combatant commanders, among other things, in joint training and education and in the execution of military operations.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. No. At this time I do not believe modifications are necessary. If confirmed, I will continue to be alert to the need for modifications.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. N/A.

Question. Do you believe that the role of the combatant commanders under the Goldwater-Nichols legislation is appropriate and the policies and processes in existence allow that role to be fulfilled?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you see a need for any change in those roles, with regard to the resource allocation process or otherwise?

Answer. No.

DUTIES

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Commander of U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM)?

Answer. The Unified Command Plan specifies the responsibilities of AFRICOM. If confirmed as the Commander of AFRICOM, I would ensure the accomplishment of those responsibilities. In my view, the most important requirement is to detect, deter and prevent attacks against the United States, its territories, possessions, and bases and to employ appropriate force to defend the Nation should deterrence fail. AFRICOM's responsibilities also reflect a new and evolving focus on building partner operational and institutional capacity at the country and regional levels and supporting the efforts of other U.S. Government agencies in the area of responsibility. These activities are consistent with and seek to further the U.S. Strategy for Sub-Saharan Africa, as released by the President in June 2012.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. In my 36 years of military service, I have served in numerous positions that prepared me for this command. For the greater part of my career, I have focused on the training and readiness of soldiers to build an effective team; preparing and leading soldiers for missions ranging from humanitarian assistance to combat operations. Leading soldiers has prepared me well to do the same for joint, multinational, and coalition forces. As the Commander of the International Security Assistance Force Joint Command in Afghanistan, I came to appreciate the values and challenges of training Afghan forces, working with 50 coalition countries, and numerous interagency, intergovernmental, and nongovernmental organizations. As Commander, Multinational Command Northwest-Iraq, I worked to increase the capacity of Iraqi security forces. At the same time ensuring our efforts were coordinated with numerous partner nations, interagency and intergovernmental agencies and nongovernmental organizations. If confirmed, I will continue this effort of partnership in AFRICOM.

Question. Do you believe that there are actions you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of the Commander of AFRICOM?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will schedule a series of briefings with the AFRICOM staff, Intelligence Community, Department of State, National Security Staff, and other interagency partners to better understand the challenges, expand the breadth and depth of my knowledge, and prepare myself for this position.

Question. If confirmed, what duties and functions do you expect the Secretary of Defense would prescribe for you?

Answer. The specific responsibilities of AFRICOM are defined in the Unified Command Plan which is approved by the Secretary of Defense and the President. If confirmed, I would expect to have discussions with the Secretary of Defense to confirm priorities for the command and to focus my efforts on those areas that require immediate attention.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. Section 162(b) of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense and from the Secretary of Defense to the combatant commands. Other sections of law and traditional practice, however, establish important relationships outside the chain of command. Please describe your understanding of the relationship of the Commander, U.S. Africa Command to the following offices:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. Subject to direction from the President, the Commander of AFRICOM performs duties under the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense. In addition, the Commander of AFRICOM is responsible to the Secretary of Defense for the readiness of the command to carry out its mission.

Question. The Under Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. A direct command relationship between the Under Secretaries of Defense and the AFRICOM Commander does not exist. However, I anticipate that the AFRICOM Commander will regularly interact, coordinate, and exchange information with the Under Secretaries of Defense on issues relating to AFRICOM affairs. The commander should directly coordinate with the Under Secretaries of Defense on a regular basis.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs.

Answer. The Commander of AFRICOM coordinates and exchanges information with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs as needed to discuss international security strategy and policy as it relates to African nations. The Commander of AFRICOM also coordinates as required for issues related to security cooperation programs and foreign military sales.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict and Interdependent Capabilities.

Answer. The Commander AFRICOM coordinates and exchanges information with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict and Interdependent Capabilities as needed to discuss matters related to special operations, counterterrorism, civil affairs, and information operations. The AFRICOM Commander also coordinates as required for capabilities development to support the accomplishment of AFRICOM operations.

Question. The Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. There is not a direct command relationship between the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the AFRICOM Commander. The Chairman functions under the authority, direction, and control of the National Command Authority. The Chairman will transmit communications between the National Command Authority and AFRICOM Commander as well as oversee the activities of the commander as directed by the Secretary of Defense. As the principal military advisor to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman is a key conduit between a combatant commander, interagency organizations, and the Service Chiefs.

The Vice Chairman serves on several councils and boards whose decisions affect AFRICOM including the Joint Requirements Oversight Council, the Defense Acquisition Board, the Defense Advisory Working Group, and the Senior Readiness Oversight Council. Interaction between the Commander of AFRICOM and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is important to ensure these boards and councils make informed choices on matters affecting the command.

The AFRICOM Commander will keep the Chairman and Vice Chairman informed on significant issues regarding the AFRICOM area of responsibility. The Commander will directly communicate with the Chairman and Vice Chairman on a regular basis.

Question. The Service Secretaries and Service Chiefs.

Answer. There is no direct command relationship between the Service Secretaries and Service Chiefs and the AFRICOM Commander. The Service Secretaries are responsible for all affairs of their respective Services including functions pertaining to the administration of and support for forces employed by AFRICOM. The Secretaries fulfill their responsibilities by exercising administrative control through the Service Component Commands assigned to AFRICOM. In this manner, the Secretary of the Army is the executive agent for AFRICOM Headquarters.

The Service Chiefs are responsible for ensuring the organization and readiness of each Service branch and for advising the President. The Service Chiefs are also members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and serve as advisers to the President, National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense. For matters affecting AFRICOM, I would anticipate regular communications between the Commander of AFRICOM and the Service Chiefs. The Commander, AFRICOM will rely on the Service Chiefs to provide properly trained and equipped forces to accomplish missions in the AFRICOM AOR.

Question. Commander, U.S. Special Operations Command.

Answer. The AFRICOM commander maintains a close relationship and communicates directly with the Commander, U.S. Special Operations Command, on issues of mutual interest. As a subordinate command of AFRICOM, Special Operations Command Africa and its units deploy throughout Africa supporting the AFRICOM commander's theater security cooperation program, deliberate plans, and operational contingencies.

Question. The other combatant commanders.

Answer. Formal relationships between the AFRICOM commander and the other geographic and functional combatant commanders will derive from command authority established by title 10, U.S.C., section 164, and from the Secretary of Defense when such relationships are established by him during operational missions. Combatant commanders closely coordinate as necessary to accomplish all assigned missions. These relationships are critical to the execution of our National Military Strategy, and are characterized by mutual support, frequent contact, and productive exchanges of information on key issues.

Question. The respective U.S. Chiefs of Mission within the AFRICOM area of responsibility (AOR).

Answer. Each Ambassador serves the President directly as his personal representative for each country. If confirmed, I will ensure that all activities of the combatant command in each country are fully coordinated with the Chief of Mission, consistent with U.S. policy.

Question. The respective U.S. Senior Defense Officials/Defense Attachés (SDO/DATT)

Answer. There is a supervisory relationship between the AFRICOM commander and the U.S. Senior Defense Officials/Defense Attachés. The U.S. Senior Defense Officials/Defense Attachés are formally evaluated by the AFRICOM Commander. This relationship ensures the Senior Defense Officials/Defense Attachés maintain close coordination with AFRICOM on all matters involving U.S. military forces in the country. As the AFRICOM commander, I will maintain a close working relationship with the U.S. Senior Defense Official in each country in order to coordinate activities between the command and the respective country's military.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND OPPORTUNITIES

Question. If confirmed as the Commander of AFRICOM, you will be responsible for all military operations in that region. In your view, what are the major challenges and opportunities that would confront you if you are confirmed as the next Commander of AFRICOM?

Answer. The security environment of the African continent is dynamic and, if confirmed, I will seek to counter emerging threats while strengthening African nations' capabilities to effectively address their own security challenges. A major challenge is effectively countering violent extremist organizations, especially the growth of Mali as an al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb safe haven, Boco Haram in Nigeria, and al Shabaab in Somalia. In order to effectively do so, AFRICOM relies on current African Partners and seeks the opportunity to develop new partnerships. Currently, there is an opportunity to assist the Nations of Libya, South Sudan and Somalia as they continue to develop their armed forces and develop governmental structures.

Question. If confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges and opportunities?

Answer. If confirmed, I will support the administration's whole of government approach implementing the U.S. Strategy Toward Sub-Saharan Africa. We will continue our commitment to protect our Nation from threats emanating from the African continent and strengthen the defense capabilities of our African partners and seek to develop new partnerships. If confirmed, I will review and assess AFRICOM's programs and strategy before taking any action.

U.S. OBJECTIVES IN AFRICA

Question. In his address in Ghana in July 2009, President Obama reaffirmed Africa's strategic importance to the United States and our national interests. He identified four priorities for the U.S. Government's engagement efforts: (1) supporting strong and sustainable democracies and good governance; (2) fostering sustained economic growth and development; (3) increasing access to quality health and education; and (4) helping to prevent, mitigate, and resolve armed conflict. In June 2012, the administration reaffirmed these priorities in the U.S. Strategy Toward Sub-Saharan Africa, emphasizing the increasing capacity of African states to take the lead on security issues on the continent, but also noting the continuing challenges.

In your view, what is AFRICOM currently doing to advance each of these objectives?

Answer. AFRICOM's primary contribution is in the area of helping to prevent, mitigate, and resolve armed conflict. The command works with African partner nation's military forces to strengthen their defense capabilities so that they are better able to address security challenges. AFRICOM's operations, exercises and theater security cooperation engagements focus on advancing this priority. The command's efforts to support military professionalization and security sector reform efforts help to inculcate respect for the rule of law, human rights, and military subordination to civilian authority—all of which reinforce the appropriate role of a military in a democratic society. AFRICOM's efforts play a mostly indirect but important role in supporting democratic consolidation and preventing a return to conflict in fragile, post-conflict states. A stable and secure environment is a precursor to significant advances in the other three areas: supporting strong and sustainable democracies and good governance; fostering sustained economic growth and development; and increasing access to quality health and education.

COUNTERTERRORISM PRIORITIES

Question. Within the AFRICOM AOR, what do you consider the highest counterterrorism priorities?

Answer. I consider the threat from al Qaeda and its affiliates to be the highest counterterrorism priority. The three groups in the AFRICOM area of responsibility—al Qaeda in the Islamic Mahgreb, al Shabaab, and Boco Haram—each present a threat to western interests in Africa. While each has not specifically targeted the United States, they have successfully carried out attacks on western interests and engaged in kidnapping. If they deepen their collaboration, they have the potential to be an even larger threat.

Question. Given your current knowledge of AFRICOM programs, do you believe the Command's resources are aligned in a manner consistent with these counterterrorism priorities?

Answer. Yes, countering violent extremist groups is the command's first priority.

AL QAEDA IN THE LANDS OF THE ISLAMIC MAGHREB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM)?

Answer. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb has publicly stated the willingness to attack U.S. and Western interests. The group's ability to conduct large scale terror attacks is restricted by the paucity of U.S. and Western targets in North Africa and successful Algerian security service counterterrorism efforts. Al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb's greatest threat to U.S. interests is likely a catalyst for instability in North Africa through weapons facilitation and training jihadists in northern Mali.

Since the group publicly announced merger with al Qaeda on 13 September 2006, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb has been committed to attacks against Western targets. On 10 December 2006, it attacked a bus carrying expatriate employees of the Algerian-American oil company Brown Root and Condor. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb has continued to conduct bombings in Algeria, predominantly in the coastal region east of Algiers. On 24 January 2012, Algerian security services disrupted an al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb plot to attack U.S. or western ships with a small boat. The attack was disrupted in the early planning stages, highlighting host nation's successful efforts to contain and neutralize the group. On 19 January 2013, Algerian security forces were also successful in defeating the militants holding hostages at the Amenas gas plant facility.

Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb has openly operated in northern Mali since the collapse of government control in mid 2011. Credible reporting indicates al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb is training jihadist from across the region, to include members of other al Qaeda affiliates such as Nigeria's Boco Haram. Coupled with arms flowing from Qadhafi era Libyan stockpiles, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb activities in northern Mali pose a long-term threat to security and stability in the region.

Question. In your view, does AQIM pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area? What capacity has AQIM demonstrated to plan and carry out actions threatening U.S. interests?

Answer. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb likely does not pose a threat to U.S. and Western interests outside its immediate operating area of Algeria and northern Mali in the near term, but could in the future. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb maintains intent and aspirations and will continue to work on increasing their capability with the help of other al Qaeda affiliates.

Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb leadership has threatened Europe in numerous public statements since 2006, yet continues to focus the majority of its efforts in North Africa. Public statements frequently mention Spain and France, playing on North Africa's colonial history with Europe to garner support from the large North African Diaspora. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb maintains aspirations and intent to attack U.S. and Western interests, and in 2012, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb leader made a public call to target U.S. Embassies after the attack on the U.S. mission in Benghazi, Libya. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb also poses a threat to Western aircraft flying in Algeria and Mali. The primary threat to westerners in North Africa remains hostage taking.

Question. In your view, what has been the impact of the recent expansion of AQIM's area of operations in northern Mali on the group's capacities and aims?

Answer. Due to the emergent safe haven in Northern Mali, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb has increased its ability to consolidate its resources. The French-led intervention in Mali and the return of Malian Forces to population centers in northern Mali have impacted al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb's ability to operate unimpeded. However, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb is able to coordinate training, distribute resources, and conduct attack planning, within its own ranks as well as with other foreign terrorist organizations. With this capabilitiy, al Qaeda in the Islamic Magreb will, at the very least, aggressively pursue the expansion of its influence to neighboring countries, and might begin planning to conduct attacks against Eurpoe or the homeland in accordance with general al Qaeda doctrine. French-led operations in Mali have disrupted and slowed al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, but there is still much work to be done.

Question. Does AQIM have the capacity to carry out attacks in Europe or on European commercial aircraft flying over Northwest Africa?

Answer. Prior to the start of the French-led intervention in Mali, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb's growing safe haven and freedom of movement in northern Mali did afford greater opportunity to plan and execute operations. I believe it is critically important to continue to work with our allies and partners to address this threat.

Question. What is your understanding of the extent to which AQIM has benefitted from the flow of arms from Libyan stockpiles since mid-2011—either in terms of arming itself or profiting from regional arms sales?

Answer. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb took advantage of the readily available stocks of weapons and ammunition accessible in Libya to expand and strengthen its safe-haven in northern Mali and make itself a more formidable military threat, as well as to indirectly benefit financially through long established smuggling networks already under its control.

Almost immediately following the early 2011 outbreak of hostilities in Libya, al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb began actively working to move weapons from Libya to its secure operating areas in northern Mali.

There is no indication yet that al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb is making significant profits from the sale of Libyan arms to third parties. However, the instability of increasing amounts of weapons available in the Sahel may lead to greater opportunities to conduct kidnaps for ransom, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb's primary source of revenue in the Sahel.

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by the Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa, an AQIM splinter faction that has recently emerged in Mali and controls significant territory there?

Answer. The Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa self-identifies as a terrorist organization, and has openly threatened Western interests in the region. It maintains a working relationship with the regional groups Ansar al-Dine and al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb. The group has also called for local and foreign fighters to join together in opposing an international military intervention in northern Mali.

Question. If confirmed, what efforts, if any, would you undertake to prevent and/or counter the spread of AQIM operations, fundraising activities, and ideology in North and West Africa?

Answer. Preventing and countering the spread of al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb takes a whole-of-government approach. Military efforts alone are only a part of the unified action required to achieve this whole-of-government approach and achieve lasting results. Currently, the Department of Defense (DOD) is executing a Global Campaign Plan for Counterterrorism that supports ". . . . U.S. Government efforts to disrupt, degrade, dismantle and defeat al Qaeda, its Affiliates and Adherents and other terrorist organizations. . . . " As part of unified action, and in concert with this global campaign plan, AFRICOM's theater strategy and theater campaign plan, with four subordinate campaign plans, orients on neutralizing al Qaeda networks in Africa. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb is a significant component of that network in North and West Africa and a major focus of AFRICOM's North-West Africa Campaign Plan.

Special Operations Command Africa is responsible for coordinating all activities to neutralize al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb. Their operations include a counter-ideology component to deny al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb recruitment and retention efforts and interfere with their fundraising. These operations also include working closely with our critical partners to expand their counterterrorism capabilities, enabling them to carry the fight to al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb through "train and equip" missions which provide needed capabilities and tactics, techniques and procedures. AFRICOM is also working with regional organizations like the Economic Community of West African States to increase their capabilities and capacity to thwart al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb and their affiliates and adherents.

Integral to all of this is AFRICOM's participation in the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership which is an interagency, Department of State, Department of Defense, and U.S. Agency for International Development, multi-year strategy aimed at defeating terrorist organizations and their ability to gain recruits.

If confirmed, I will assess the current operations and adjust as necessary in order to maintain consistent pressure on al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb and affiliated terrorist groups while ensuring appropriate support for our critical partners.

Question. What risks, if any, do you see accompanying greater potential AFRICOM engagement in regional efforts to expand government control and dismantle AQIM?

Answer. With the increasing threat of al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, I see a greater risk of regional instability if we do not engage aggressively. Our long-term fight against al Qaeda necessitates persistent engagement with our critical partners.

Strengthening the defense capabilities of African states and regional organizations is an essential element of the AFRICOM strategy and mission, and supports U.S foreign policy goals in Africa and the core principles of the U.S. National Strategy for Counterterrorism. Further, building partner capacity is a major component of the strategic and operational approaches within the Africa Command Theater Campaign Plan and subordinate campaign plans.

Recent events in North-West Africa—specifically the coup in Mali and loss of control of territory in the north—increased the threat of al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb to our African partners in the region and, ultimately, to the United States. The French-led intervention in Mali and the creation of an African-led International Support Mission (AFISMA) to help restore Mali's terroritorial integrity are positive steps to restoring stability to Mali. Our current efforts to support the French and AFISMA with planning support, intelligence sharing, aerial refueling, and airlift for French and AFISMA forces which will play a critical role in assisting international efforts to restore stability.

I feel we face an increased threat to the United States if we do not engage with select critical partners.

Question. To what extent does AQIM pose a threat to stability in Morocco and Tunisia?

Answer. Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb does not present an immediate threat to Morocco or Tunisia's stability, but that does not mean it or other extremists do not possess some capability or intention to conduct terror attacks in these countries. Within Morocco, the threat of an attack is degraded by the country's multi-dimensional counterterrorism strategy that includes regional and international security cooperation. However, these efforts do not completely negate the threat as evidenced by the 28 April 2011 Marrakesh bombing. Tunisia possesses a modest capacity to counterterrorism, but the concept is limited by perceptions of the former regime's heavy-handed and overly liberal use of previously established anti-terrorism legislation.

Question. Do you believe current legal authorities, including the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF), are sufficient to enable you to carry out counterterrorism operations and activities against AQIM at the level you believe to be necessary?

Answer. The current legal authorities, including the Authorization for Use of Military Force, to conduct counterterrorism operations and activities against al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb appear to be sufficient for operations in the AFRICOM area of responsibility. However, the Authorization for Use of Military Force is now 12 years old; and al Qaeda has dispersed and operates in areas far from the original battlefield. Given these evolutionary changes in the global security landscape, I intend to continuously review the current intelligence on al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb and assess whether the existing authorities are sufficient to take all necessary actions.

SOMALIA AND AL SHABAB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Shabab?

Answer. Al Shabaab is currently undergoing a significant transition in response to pressure from the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM), The Federal Government of Somalia, and allied Somali forces, but will remain a threat for the near to mid-term in Somalia and increasingly in East Africa. Unable to effectively combat pro-government forces' superior armor and weaponry, al-Shabaab has withdrawn to rural safe havens where it can evade enemy forces and project a largely asymmetric war, including improved improvised explosive and increased suicide bombings. No longer responsible for administrating large population centers, al-Shabaab can refocus its somewhat debilitated revenue streams on more weapons, fighters, and attack planning. External attacks, such as those in Kenya, are likely to be a continued focus as these attacks are a key component to al-Shabaab's strategy to expel regional militaries from Somalia.

Question. In your view, does al Shabab pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area?

Answer. Al Shabaab is an al Qaeda affiliate and is likely to remain dedicated to the principles of al Qaeda, including executing attacks on the west. Al Shabaab maintains the near-term capability to threaten Western interests in Kenya as some elements in the large Somali populations throughout Kenya support al-Shabaab financially, ideologically, and logistically. As part of a highly mobile population in East Africa, these supporters also maintain the ability to move in and out of regional nations in support of attacks. Al Shabaab's foreign fighters remain the greatest threat to Western interests regionally and internationally.

Question. In the last year, the United Nations-supported African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) and its regional partners have made substantial military progress against al Shabaab. How would you evaluate the success of these efforts and the prospects for longer term stability in Somalia?

Answer. AMISOM has made progress in reducing the territory under al Shabaab control. The capital, Mogadishu and the port of Kismaayo, formerly a key hub for al Shabaab, are now under the Somali Government and African Union Mission in Somalia control. African Union Mission in Somalia successes have provided space for the political process to work. However, the Somali Government is in the earliest stages of development and there is still a long way to go to ensure long-term stability. It will take the combined efforts of the international community to assist the Somali Government and people recover from more than 10 years of conflict.

Question. The State Department has provided security assistance to Somalia's nascent national security forces for several years through the AU peacekeeping mission and through contractors. What role, if any, do you see for AFRICOM in that effort?

Answer. AFRICOM supports Department of State efforts in preparing Africa Union peacekeepers deploying to Somalia as part of African Union Mission in Somalia by providing Global Peace Operations Initiative funding to African Union Mission in Somalia staff, providing secure communications to Africa Union Mission in Somalia contributing nations, and providing logistics training, excess equipment, and mentor support to Africa Contingency Operations Training and Assistance training in the region. In addition, AFRICOM has supplied niche intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance capabilities, and counterterrorism training to deploying African Union Mission in Somalia units, and additional communications via Department of Defense 1206 funding mechanisms. This is a critical effort and AFRICOM will continue to work with Department of State to support African Union Mission in Somalia troop contributing nations. If directed, AFRICOM is prepared to expand support to nascent Somalia security forces.

Question. Do you believe current legal authorities, including the 2001 AUMF are sufficient to enable you to carry out counterterrorism operations and activities against al Shabaab at the level you believe to be necessary?

Answer. The current legal authorities, including the Authorization for Use of Military Force to conduct counterterrorism operations and activities against al Shabaab appear to be sufficient for operations in the AFRICOM area of responsibility. However, the African Union Mission in Somalia is now 12 years old and al Qaeda has dispersed and operates in areas far from the original battlefield. Given these evolutionary changes in the global security landscape, I intend to continuously review the current intelligence on al Shabaab and assess whether the existing authorities are sufficient to take all necessary actions.

Question. What role, if any, do you see for AFRICOM in preventing further deterioration of the humanitarian crisis in Somalia, which according to experts remains among the worst anywhere in the world?

Answer. The primary factor undermining humanitarian support in certain famine and food insecure regions in Somalia is a general lack of security in ungoverned spaces and/or al Shabaab resistance to relief operations. Department of Defense support to regional militaries serves to facilitate and improve aid delivery, preventing a worsening of the humanitarian crisis in Somalia. Regional partners such as Ethiopia and Kenya have demonstrated a commitment to supporting humanitarian assistance operations, which, as a secondary benefit, also enhances Somalia's internal security. AFRICOM is well positioned to support the broader U.S. Government's humanitarian assistance effort, and to assist our regional partners in key areas such as logistics, medical, communications, and planning.

NIGERIA AND BOCO HARAM

Question. In the past year and a half, Boco Haram's attacks in Nigeria have become increasingly sophisticated and deadly. There is concern that the group is expanding ties with other violent Islamist groups on the continent. In a hearing before the committee in March of this year, General Carter Ham, the current Commander of AFRICOM, stated that Boco Haram has emerged "as a threat to Western interests."

Do you agree with General Ham that Boco Haram represents a threat to Western interests?

Answer. Yes. Although Boco Haram's primary target set is largely domestic, the group demonstrated a willingness to specifically target western interests within Nigeria when it launched a car bomb attack against the United Nations' headquarters building in Abuja in August 2011. Additionally, Boco Haram was involved in the abduction and subsequent murders of two western citizens in May 2011 and possibly a German in January 2012. Boco Haram's growing ties to the al Qaeda network, particularly al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, almost certainly exacerbates the threat Boco Haram poses to western interests.

Question. What is your assessment of Boco Haram's intentions to expand its scope of operations beyond domestic attacks? How do you assess its capability to do so?

Answer. Boco Haram's ties to external al Qaeda affiliates, particularly with al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, along with its larger regional presence and activities, will broaden its intentions to expand its scope of operations beyond domestic attacks. Boco Haram maintains presence beyond Nigeria in the neighboring countries Niger, Cameroon, and Chad. Additionally, there are indications that a sizable contingent of Boco Haram members is located in northern Mali, where they almost certainly augment al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb effort to secure its territorial gains and facilitate the establishment of an Islamic state. The group's demonstrated ability to conduct complex coordinated attacks with multiple vehicle-borne improvised explosive devices indicates Boco Haram already possesses the capability to conduct such an operation beyond domestic Nigerian targets.

Question. To what extent has Boco Haram benefitted from the flow of arms from Libyan stockpiles since mid-2011—either in terms of arming itself or profiting from regional arms sales?

Answer. Boco Haram has benefitted from the proliferation of weapons from Libya. Additionally, the large amount of weaponry al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb acquired from Libyan stockpiles, coupled with the the relationship between Boco Haram and al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, almost certainly resulted in additional arms provided to Boco Haram. There has been no indication yet of Boco Haram profiting from the sale of weapons.

Question. What is your assessment of the Nigerian Government's efforts to eliminate Boco Haram?

Answer. Nigeria's security response to Boco Haram has had some isolated successes, and the Nigerian Government almost certainly has the will and means to continue security operations. The Nigerian Government is conducting a three-pronged response to Boco Haram including extensive security and intelligence operations, limited co-option efforts, and a fledging public relations campaign. However, even if Nigeria manages to destroy all current Boco Haram factions and nodes, long-term stability in northern Nigeria is contingent on the Nigerian Government making a concerted political effort to resolve socio-economic issues like endemic poverty, poor economic prospects, political marginalization, and corruption.

Nigeria deployed a joint task force to counter Boco Haram in June 2011 and has steadily increased the size and scope of operations over the last year. Nigerian counterterrorism and counterinsurgency capabilities are still developing and the army and police often rely on heavy-handed static security operations. The army and police have been widely criticized for the excessive use of force which results in local resentment and undermines Nigeria's modest counterterrorism successes.

Last, while some in the government acknowledge that the use of excessive force by the Nigerian army and the continued socio-economic marginalization of northern Nigeria are alienating the population and helping Boco Haram. There has been little progress made in addressing alleged human rights abuses by the security services or underlying socio-economic issues in northern Nigeria.

The Nigerian Government has also indicated a willingness to pursue negotiations with Boco Haram. Boco Haram leadership has rejected negotiations, but more moderate fringe factions could still be co-opted.

Question. What is your assessment of Boco Haram's relationship with AQIM and Al Shabaab, respectively? Is there any evidence to suggest that Boco Haram and AQIM have developed operational links?

Answer. Boco Haram's connection to the broader al Qaeda movement is primarily through al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb. There are few indications that Boco Haram has direct connections to al-Shabaab, and those that exist indicate al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb acts as an intermediary.

Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb appears to provide support to Boco Haram, evidenced especially in the manner of its resurgence after the Nigerian Government crackdown on the organization in 2009. Malian government sources show that for several years Boco Haram has sent operatives to train with al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb elements in the Sahel. Boco Haram has confined the majority of its attacks to northern Nigeria; however, the targeting of Western interests within Nigeria, such as the United Nations' headquarters in Abuja, may indicate al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb influence on Boco Haram's target selection. In addition, specific tactics used, most notably that of the suicide vehicle borne improvised explosive devices is almost certainly the influence of al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb on Boco Haram operations.

Question. If confirmed, what role would you recommend for AFRICOM in building the capacity of the Nigerian security forces to respond to the Boco Haram threat?

Answer. Growing and deepening the relationship with the Nigerian Defense Staff is crucial to securing greater partnering opportunities. An approach to strengthen Nigerian security forces hinges on buy-in from senior defense leaders who are willing to address underlying issues to enhance leadership, anti-corruption, and equipment and supply procurement deficiencies. Nigeria is a prime example of where a whole-of-government approach is critical to address the complex Boco Haram threat which is exacerbated by underlying political, economic and social fractures.

Question. What risks, if any, do you see accompanying greater potential AFRICOM engagement in regional efforts to expand government control and dismantle Boco Haram?

Answer. My chief concern would be the risks associated with the performance of U.S. trained or equipped Nigerian defense forces continuing on a path of unprofessional activity—violence against civilians, illegal detainment, and ultimately, ineffective operations against Boco Haram.

Question. Do you believe current legal authorities, including the 2001 AUMF are sufficient to enable you to carry out counterterrorism operations and activities against Boco Haram at the level you believe to be necessary?

Answer. The current legal authorities, including the Authorization for Use of Military Force to conduct counterterrorism operations and activities against Boco Haram appear to be sufficient for operations in the AFRICOM area of responsibility. However, the Authorization for Use of Military Force has been in place for 12 years and al Qaeda has dispersed and operates in areas far from the original battlefield. Given the evolutionary changes in the global security landscape, I intend to continuously review the current intelligence on Boco Haram and assess whether the existing authorities are sufficient to take all necessary actions.

Question. Violent incidents, reportedly including indiscriminate killing of civilians, committed by Nigerian police and military services during operations intended to be against Boco Haram have risen significantly in recent months.

In your view, what measures should the United States incorporate into current and future military-to-military engagements to help stem these incidents?

Answer. Basic military professionalization underlies all engagement with Nigerian Defense Forces. This includes orchestration of a training program by AFRICOM and often delivered by U.S military judge advocates through the Defense Institute for International Legal Studies. The AFRICOM effort is to advance the rule of law in African militaries, address human rights laws, respect for international law, and the law of armed conflict. Increasing the intensity and depth of this program using Defense Institute for International Legal Studies and similar training resources would be an important step toward stemming indiscriminate violence.

Professionalization of military forces is also a key reason for a preference toward use of U.S. uniformed trainers. The objective is to model the U.S. Army's soldier code of conduct and ethics and also to demonstrate a disciplined Noncommissioned Officer Corps.

MALI

Question. What is AFRICOM currently doing to respond to the situation in northern Mali, including the significant expansion of AQIM's operational presence there?

Answer. It is my understanding that AFRICOM is accelerating its cooperation with Mali's neighbors and continuing to explore ways to counter the threat posed by al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb and its sympathizers while at the same time supporting international intervention efforts.

The situation in Mali's north is complicated by al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb's growing entrenchment into political and religious institutions, unaddressed grievances, vast ungoverned expanses, porous borders, and continuing spillover from the instability in Libya. A successful solution will require working closely with the international community—in particular Mali's neighbors and the Economic Community of West African States—to fully restore credible, elected political leadership in Mali while addressing the growing humanitarian crisis and strengthening the Malian security forces, ultimately restoring governance and security for the whole of Mali's territory.

Question. What is your understanding of the impact of the suspension of U.S. security assistance programs in Mali on AFRICOM's activities in Mali and the region?

Answer. Following the March coup, and pursuant to section 7008 of the Department of State Foreign Operations and Related Programs Appropriation Act, the United States suspended all security assistance to the Government of Mali on 19 April 2012. As a result, there currently is very little U.S. military engagement with Mali. U.S. law dictates that U.S. security assistance to Mali remains on hold until elections are held and a democratically-elected government takes office. Once legal and policy requirements are met, military engagements can resume, AFRICOM would then consider growing military professionals through the International Military Education and Training program, Counterterrorism Fellowship Program and the Department of Defense Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome Prevention Program.

AFRICOM and its components currently maintain border-security, peacekeeping, and counter-terrorism training with most of Mali's neighbors until a direct solution in Mali becomes possible.

Question. If confirmed, what steps would you propose to reshape the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership (TSCTP) and the Defense Department's complementary Operation Juniper Shield (formerly Operation Enduring Freedom-Trans Sahara) in light of regional security and governance setbacks stemming from the crisis in Mali?

Answer. The Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership continues to be the U.S. Government's regional construct for counterterrorism partnership in the Trans-Sahel and we will continue to work closely with our interagency and regional partners to further the Partnership's objectives.

LIBYA

Question. The recent attack on the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi which resulted in the death of four American citizens, including the American Ambassador, Christopher Stevens, demonstrated that post-conflict Libya is wrought with security challenges that have implications for the future of Libya and the region as a whole. Conversely, as Libya transitions to a representative government, the United States is presented with a historic opportunity to redefine U.S.-Libyan relations.

What role, if any, do you envision the United States playing in helping Libya build capable security institutions?

Answer. Department of Defense should have a supporting role to the broader U.S. Government and international community effort to establish security institutions in Libya. The Department of Defense sponsored Defense Institution Reform Initiative and Minister of Defense Advisor programs are approved for Libya. The Defense Institution Reform Initiative team made three visits to Libya. All support to the government of Libya will remain difficult until the security situation improves, and the U.S. Embassy, Tripoli can support temporary personnel.

Question. What is your assessment of the risks associated with the paramilitary forces that continue to have control of large swaths of Libya?

Answer. The hundreds of disparate militias still operating in Libya a year after the revolution represent a significant threat to the future stability of Libya. Their continued presence undermines the authority of the government and creates the potential for continued armed conflicts over territory, ethnic ideology, and revenge killings, as well as creating a more permissive environment for al Qaeda and other violent extremist organizations to operate. The post-Revolutionary Libyan Governments have attempted several programs to disarm, demobilize, and integrate these militias into military and security services, but the pace for progress remains slow. It is too early to tell if current Prime Minister Ali Zeidan's Government will continue to rely on loosely affiliated militias to provide security throughout Libya.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact of the proliferation of weaponry from Libyan military stockpiles into neighboring countries?

Answer. The availability of weapons from depots in Libya has invigorated illicit arms smuggling across Africa, particularly in the northwest. The Sahel ranks among the world's principal smuggling routes and is maintained by militants from local Tuareg tribes who assist in trafficking arms. After the collapse of the Qadhafi Government in Libya, hundreds of looted missiles, Kalashnikov rifles, rocket propelled grenades, and small weapons were sold throughout the Sahel. Additionally, experts estimate Libya had as many as 20,000 first-generation manportable air defense systems before the uprising, at least some of which are likely in the hands of terrorist organizations and militias seeking to incite further instability in Africa and the Middle East. Armed Tuaregs fighting for Qadhafi returned to homelands in Mali and Niger and smuggled weapons that fueled the Mali rebellion, further destabilizing the region and reinforcing a safe haven for al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb.

Question. In your view, what role, if any, should AFRICOM play in assisting the Libyans with addressing the threat to stability posed by paramilitary forces?

Answer. AFRICOM should have a complimentary role in assisting Libya with their militia threat, supporting USAID as the lead U.S. agency for Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration. AFRICOM should support proposals for 1206 (counterterrorism) and 1207a (border security) to develop a core capacity for the Libyan military with personnel that have come under the government's control. AFRICOM should also support Foreign Military Sales cases using Libyan national funds to strengthen the military infrastructure.

Question. What do you view as the most significant challenges to the Libyan Government in building capable and sustainable security institutions?

Answer. The Libyan Government's most significant challenge is its lack of control of the militias operating in Libya. This condition is exacerbated by the proliferation of conventional weapons and unsecured borders. Together, this is leading to a rise of terrorist activity, particularly in Eastern Libya.

Question. In what ways can the United States be most effective in assisting the Libyan Government in building capable and sustainable security institutions?

Answer. The United States can be most effective by assisting the Libyan efforts at disarmament and working with the individual services in Libya to assist them with their development. AFRICOM has organized visits by the Libyan Air Force and Navy Chiefs of Staff. Increasing the International Military Education and Training to better facilitate Libyan participation in U.S. senior service schools, English language training, and other training in the United States will also be beneficial.

Question. With the experience of Benghazi as context, do you feel that the mechanisms for rapidly moving forces from EUCOM to respond to crises in AFRICOM are adequate? Are there improvements to this process that you recommend?

Answer. The newly assigned Commander's In-extremis Force, Army allocated Regionally Aligned Force, and the Special Purpose Marine Air Ground Task postures AFRICOM to better plan for and respond to contingencies. We recommend the Commander's In-extremis Force be placed in Europe for a shorter response time to the continent. We will continue to closely coordinate with the Department of State and country Ambassadors to ensure an accurate understanding of U.S. Africa Command's response times and capabilities as we support activities on the African continent. Additionally, with tighter budgets and declining resources, we must look at more agile ways to share resources between forces assigned to Europe and Africa.

ALGERIA

Question. In your view, what is the appropriate role for Algeria to play in addressing transnational security threats in the Sahel, including AQIM? If confirmed, what steps would you take to encourage Algeria to play a more active and constructive role in addressing security threats emanating from northern Mali?

Answer. Algeria's military is the most capable of any country in north Africa. As such, I view Algeria as a regional leader, capable of coordinating the efforts of the Sahelian countries to address transnational security threats. Algeria shares our concerns with the situation in northern Mali. Their knowledge of conditions on the ground in northern Mali is invaluable to the United States. To ensure continued Algerian cooperation on northern Mali, any military solution must be United Nations authorized, internationally supported, and use African forces. If confirmed, I would continue to encourage Algerian regional leadership through regional exercise and conference participation, senior leadership engagement and high-level bilateral dialogues.

Question. What is your assessment of the operational and logistical capacities of the Algerian-led joint operational command structure for the Sahel, known as the CEMOC?

Answer. The Algeria-based Combined Operational General Staff Committee plays no significant role in regional counterterrorism activity and is unlikely to carry out counterterrorism military operations for the foreseeable future. Contributing Combined Operational General Staff Committee members possess varied operational and logistical capabilities, but the Combined Operational General Staff Committee organization lacks operational experience and has not demonstrated any logistical capacity since its 2010 inception. The Combined Operational General Staff Committee's one major accomplishment has been the creation of the Unity Fusion Liaison, located in Algiers, Algeria, which is a mechanism for sharing operational intelligence between the four member nations (Algeria, Mali, Mauritania, and Niger) as well as Burkina Faso, Libya, and Chad. Bilaterally, however, participating Combined Operational General Staff Committee countries have conducted joint training and localized operations.

CONGO/GREAT LAKES

Question. What is your assessment of the threat to regional stability posed by the ongoing military mutiny, known as the M23, in eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC)?

Answer. The March 23 mutiny—the armed group known as M23—in eastern DRC is destabilizing the entire Great Lakes region. Over the course of this crisis, we have been concerned by reports of enhanced external support to M23. We have strongly urged all neighboring governments to take all necessary measures to halt and prevent any and all support to M23 from their territory and we have underscored to Rwanda that any support to M23 must permanently end. Furthermore, the security forces focus on the March 23 Movement has allowed other armed groups in the region to expand, resulting in increased ethnic violence and attacks on civilians across eastern DRC. The humanitarian situation in eastern DRC has deteriorated, and we remain gravely concerned about the hundreds of thousands of people displaced by insecurity and violence in Kivus. Additionally, numerous medical aid organizations have removed most staff from the area due to unacceptable security risks. While the Armed Forces of the Democratic Republic of Congo have been unable to end the M23 rebellion militarily, the Democratic Republic of Congo has engaged with M23 in discussions in Kampala, and we continue to urge the presidents and leadership of the Democratic Republic of Congo, Rwanda, and Uganda to continue their direct dialogue to address the root causes of instability. We support the United Nation's efforts to establish a Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework among the governments in the region.

Question. In your view, in what ways (if at all) have U.S. security sector reform efforts in DRC had a measurable impact on the operational and logistical capacity, degree of command and control, and transparent civilian oversight of the Congolese military?

Answer. Assisting DRC military has been a challenge. The desired end-state is for a disciplined, professional military that respects human rights, rule of law, and civilian authority. The United States provides DRC officers with training and assistance in leadership development, military justice, civil-military relations, and respect for human rights. The challenge is translating these efforts into long-term institutional capacity. Although progress is slow, there have been some improvements. Logistical capacity is one example: the U.S.-led Defense Institutional Reform Initiative complements European Union efforts to develop logistics doctrine by helping DRC military translate their doctrine into strategic and operational guidance.

True security sector reform in DRC will require full commitment by the government and a unified multilateral effort among the international community. A memorandum of understanding between the U.S. Government and the Government of the DRC on security force assistance is forthcoming. This document will establish ground rules for security assistance and provide a path for improved cooperation with measurable conditions.

Question. What is your assessment of the performance of the U.S.-trained Light Infantry Battalion (LIB, known as the 391st) in its two deployments to date (first in Dungu, for operations to counter the Lord's Resistance Army, and currently in Goma, for operations to counter the ongoing M23 rebellion)? What has been the impact of the LIB training program—which was carried out in 2010 and supported by AFRICOM advisors—on the overall capacity, control, and oversight of the Congolese forces? If confirmed, would you support additional U.S. operational and logistical training for the Congolese military?

Answer. The 391st Light Infantry Battalion (LIB) has been scrutinized because of its standing as a U.S. trained unit. There are, however, limited metrics to measure the battalion's combat effectiveness and performance in protecting civilians. During a 2012 assessment, AFRICOM's Counter-Lord's Resistance Army Control Element found that morale was high and the officers and enlisted soldiers appear motivated, organized and trained in small unit maneuver and tactics. While the unit appears tactically proficient, they have had limited engagements against Lord's Resistance Army and March 23 Movement targets. This prevents a full understanding of the combat effectiveness of the 391st LIB. It can be noted, however, that during a minor firefight with March 23 Movement, the 391st stood its ground.

The 391st LIB illustrates the larger institutional challenges within DRCs military and broader defense sector reform. While this unit is highly respected by senior military and government leaders within the DRC, it has not had a significant impact on the overall capacity, control and oversight of Congolese forces. The rebellion by the March 23 Movement underscores that the Armed Forces of the Democratic Republic of Congo remains a fractured military with a profound need for national-level security sector reform. Broad security sector reform will require full commitment by the government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and a unified multilateral effort among the international community—a single U.S. trained battalion will not change the core institutional challenges within the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Question. If confirmed, what changes (if any) would you propose to U.S. security assistance for Rwanda in light of the Rwandan military's alleged role in supporting the M23 in contravention of United Nations sanctions?

Answer. Ensuring peace and security in Darfur, Sudan is a key U.S. policy priority. Rwanda supports this policy priority by providing 3,200 peacekeepers to the United Nations—African Union Mission in Darfur, and 850 peacekeepers to the United Nations Mission in South Sudan. While we continue to support Rwanda's participation in United Nations peacekeeping missions in Africa, we recognize that the March 23 Movement would not be the threat it is today without external support including evidence of support from the Rwandan Government. As the United States has made very clear, Rwanda must permanently end all forms of support to Congolese armed groups. For these reasons, we also cut approximately $200,000 of fiscal year 2012 Foreign Military Financing (FMF) to Rwanda, as required by law. The Department continues to closely monitor reports of external support and we will continue to respond appropriately.

Question. What is your assessment of the current operational capacity of Burundian troops serving in the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM)? In your view, what has been the impact of U.S. military training for Burundian troops deploying under AMISOM on Burundi's internal stability and on regional stability in the Great Lakes?

Answer. The Burundian National Defense Forces operating as part of AMISOM are very good tactically at the lower level (squad-company) and have interacted well with the Uganda People's Defence Force in shared sectors. However, they lack staff planning ability at battalion and higher levels.

The training the United States has provided to the Burundians has helped to integrate their forces at the lower levels and unified their armed forces, which, as recently as 5 years ago, were still fighting remnants of a civil war. Burundi works with neighboring countries to improve security in border areas. They are increasingly concerned with instability in the Kivu area of Democratic Republic of the Congo and the resulting refugee flows. Their focus, however, remains on African Union Mission in Somalia and internal stability.

BUILDING PARTNER CAPACITY AND SECURITY ASSISTANCE

Question. In the past few years, Congress has provided DOD a number of temporary authorities to provide security assistance to partner nations, including the global train and equip authority ("section 1206"), Global Security Contingency Fund (GSCF), and the associated transitional authorities for East Africa within the GSCF statute.

What is your understanding of the purpose of the section 1206 global train and equip authority and GSCF?

Answer. Section 1206 since its inclusion in the 2006 National Defense Authorization Act has allowed AFRICOM to increase capability of our partners to conduct counterterrorism activities. AFRICOM has concentrated its efforts in the east and northwest areas where the greatest threat exists. The 1206 authority is more responsive than other security cooperation methods such as Foreign Military Financing and is a critical tool. All combatant commands must compete annually for funds under this program. This annual competition challenges a longer-term approach to program development for partner nations. While AFRICOM does not have U.S. Forces employed in stability operations, the counterterrorism aspects of 1206 have been heavily used in support of partner nations requirements against al Shabaab and al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb or to provide security in countries that may be threatened by them. Section 1206 is a particularly valued tool since it allows AFRICOM to select programs that best meet partners' needs. The dual-key nature of 1206, requiring Department of State and Department of Defense secretary approval, effectively supports interagency efforts to strengthen capacity building programs. However, there are inherit limitations of 1206 in terms of 1 year funding which makes it difficult to put together complex or sustained projects that are required for sustained engagement.

While 1206 specifically addresses counterterrorism, the GSCF is intended as an interagency approach to address broader issues. The GSCF is in its early stages of development, but should bring a responsive ability to address a broad range of security issues not limited just to counterterrorism. Funds to implement the authority must come from both Department of Defense (80 percent) and Department of State (20 percent). Under the current authority which expires in 2015, once funds are placed in the Security Contingency Fund, they are available until expended. This enables planning a bit farther into the future. To date, however, it is authority without a corresponding appropriation. As the Security Contingency Fund process matures, I believe we will see a more coordinated effort between Department of Defense and Department of State in key partner nations.

Question. In your view, what should be our strategic objectives in building the capacities of partner nations in the AFRICOM AOR?

Answer. AFRICOM's capacity building efforts seek to provide partner nations with the capability to solve their own problems and directly further the U.S. Strategy Toward Sub-Saharan Africa. When African nations work together to defeat terrorists like al Shabaab, threats to our homeland are decreased. When the United States is perceived as a positive influence in other regions, it assists our efforts across the board.

Building Partnership Capacity is the baseline to all of AFRICOM's strategic lines of effort in Africa. The intent is to enable African partners to develop the defense capabilities necessary for the command to achieve its objectives. It is preferable to avoid crises that may demand the introduction of U.S. Forces, therefore the Command strives to enable African partners to build stability, control borders and ungoverned terrain, defeat terrorist groups, and develop militaries that are professional and obey the rule of law.

An example of AFRICOM's partnership building engagement is the ongoing efforts with African partners that are deploying troops to various peacekeeping missions throughout the continent, including to the African Union Mission in Somalia. The Command has provided training and equipment that have proved to be instrumental in the success these forces have made in both maintaining stability and combating terrorist groups. The Command has also assisted Africans in developing rotary wing medical evacuation capabilities to be used in peacekeeping operations.

Other areas of focus are providing training and equipment for partners for the purpose of developing strong border controls to prevent trafficking of weapons and narcotics which can destabilize a country.

In the maritime domain, the Command has assisted regional organizations in developing agreements, operations, and training for maritime security, as well as developing courses for peacekeepers at select African Union regional peacekeeping training centers.

All of these efforts combine to develop capacities among African partners that allow Africans to solve many of their own security problems. This is cost effective, does not require U.S. Forces, and prevents conflict.

Question. The funding pool available for security assistance and other military-to-military engagement activities devoted to the AFRICOM AOR is extremely small and tends to be allocated to specific countries.

What is your understanding of the role AFRICOM plays in developing U.S. security assistance (e.g., section 1206, Foreign Military Financing, International Military Education and Training assistance, Combatant Commander Initiative Fund, et cetera. . . .)?

Answer. AFRICOM provides input to all of the security assistance processes annually, based on Department of Defense guidance, AFRICOM strategy and theater campaign plan prioritization. The command submits proposals to take advantage of authorities such as 1206 and has successfully utilized the Combatant Commander Initiative Fund—specifically this year the Command was able to fund attendance of Libyan officers to U.S. schools. AFRICOM depends on its input to these programs to get its mission accomplished. Security Cooperation is the primary means to affect conditions on the continent.

DEFENSE STRATEGIC GUIDANCE

Question. The Defense Strategic Guidance, "Sustaining U.S. Global Leadership: Priorities for the 21st Century Defense", announced by President Obama on January 5, 2012, includes, among other things, the intention of the administration and the Pentagon to "rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific region." In his associated remarks, Secretary Panetta explained that the "U.S. military will increase its institutional weight and focus on enhanced presence, power projection, and deterrence in Asia-Pacific."

What do you anticipate will be the impact on the operations and activities of AFRICOM?

Answer. The impact on the operations and activities of AFRICOM will be minimal. In fact, based on the interconnectivity between Africa and the Asia-Pacific region, AFRICOM's activities may become more important. The eastern portion of AFRICOM's area of responsibility abuts the Indian Ocean, a centrally important component of the global commons, reflecting historic trade ties and encompassing sea lanes of communication that link Africa to the Middle East, Europe, and the rising powers of India and China in the Asia-Pacific region.

Several key strategic geographic points exist around the African continent that are essential to the flow of commerce. For example, Camp Lemonnier in Djibouti sits on the western side of the Bab el-Mandeb waterway from Yemen and the Arabian Peninsula. The waterway is only 20 miles across and must remain open to ensure the health of the global economic system. Other important choke points include the Mozambique Channel and the Cape of Good Hope.

Africa is a pivotal point to the Middle East and Asia-Pacific providing critical access to the Indian Ocean region and an overwatch position for Iran. It also serves as an essential platform supporting U.S. Central Command Counter-Violent Extremist Organization operations.

AFRICOM will continue to counter piracy threats emanating from Somalia in support of international efforts to promote a lawful maritime environment and global trade in the Indian Ocean region. The command will continue to strengthen the defense capabilities of African partners to solidify security gains in Somalia that underpin the development of effective governance, economic growth, and development.

DOD COUNTER-NARCOTICS ACTIVITIES

Question. DOD serves as the single lead agency for the detection and monitoring of aerial and maritime foreign shipments of drugs flowing toward the United States. On an annual basis, DOD's counter-narcotics (CN) program expends approximately $1.5 billion to support the Department's CN operations, including to build the capacity of U.S. Federal, State, and local law enforcement agencies, and certain foreign governments, and provide intelligence support on CN-related matters and a variety of other unique enabling capabilities.

In your view, what is the appropriate role of DOD—and by extension AFRICOM—in counterdrug efforts?

Answer. In my opinion, AFRICOM's role in support of broader Department of Defense counternarcotics efforts should focus on three primary areas. First, capacity building efforts with partner nations on the African continent are critical to helping civilian law enforcement agencies, Gendarmes, and military organizations combat the growing menace of narcotics trafficking. Working hand in hand with partners in the Drug Enforcement Agency, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Customs and Border Protection, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs, among others, the command is able to bring the full weight of U.S. experience from the decades-long domestic fight against narcotics to bear in helping to solve this problem in Africa through training, equipping and information sharing initiatives. Second, through Counterthreat Finance efforts, the command works with U.S. interagency partners to track down and ultimately seize illicit proceeds that go directly to Drug Trafficking Organizations. Third, statutory requirement to serve as the lead U.S. agency for Detection and Monitoring allow the command to bring our tremendous technology assets to bear, and a robust cadre of intelligence analysts can lend great value to the International Community in analyzing and dismantling drug trafficking organizations.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of the United States in countering the flow of narcotics to nations other than the United States?

Answer. The United States has tremendous equities in helping to stem the worldwide manufacturing and distribution of illicit drugs, regardless of whether these drugs end up in the United States. In places like West Africa, drug trafficking and manufacturing is having a tremendous destabilizing effect through corruption of often senior government officials, increased rates of drug usage (and corresponding increases to rates of Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome among Africans, and proceeds of illicit trafficking going towards organizations operating on the continent and internationally. Working with international partners through such organizations as the European Union and the Economic Community of West Africa States, AFRICOM seeks to integrate their capacity building efforts with those who share common interests in seeing African partners increase their ability to effectively address this problem. These integration efforts will also allow all international parties to better utilize funding for counternarcotic efforts.

Question. Given that the vast majority of illegal drugs arriving in Africa are not destined for the United States, should DOD invest resources in countering the flow of illegal drugs to or through Africa?

Answer. It is my opinion that current Department of Defense resources being invested in counternarcotics efforts are funds well spent in spite of the fact that many of the drugs are not intended for the United States. The destabilizing influence of narcotics trafficking, coupled with the financial benefits realized by terrorist organizations operating in Africa, make a compelling case for overall U.S. Government involvement in solving this problem. The cost funding an effective counternarcotics program in an African partner nation is far less than the cost of dealing with the consequences of not addressing this problem which could result in increased regional instability. Additionally, the capacity building and resources provided to African partners under the counternarcotics program are also effective in helping to improve border control and reduce the trafficking of other illicit goods like weapons and persons.

Question. Illicit trafficking is a growing concern in Africa. West Africa is a node for Latin American drugs transiting to their primary destination in European markets. In addition, drugs and their precursors originating on other continents are transshipped through Africa. Despite the increase in illicit trafficking across the African continent, AFRICOM has secured a limited amount of funding for its counternarcotics efforts.

What is your assessment of the current AFRICOM counternarcotics program?

Answer. It is my understanding that the AFRICOM counternarcotics program has improved the capacity of African nations to more effectively address their challenges in this area. To date, the program's efforts have primarily been focused in West Africa, working with countries such as Ghana, Senegal, and Cape Verde. The command's capacity building efforts have had a direct, positive impact on these countries' capabilities, as evidenced by the October 2011 seizure in Cape Verde of 1.5 tons of cocaine, which was directly supported by the Counter Narcotics-funded Cape Verde Maritime Operations Center. Additionally, the Counter Narcotics program has taken the lead in coordination with the Department of State in developing the West African Cooperative Security Initiative, a whole-of-government approach that better integrates all U.S. Government counternarcotics efforts in this important region.

Question. Based on your review of the current program, if confirmed, what changes, if any, are you interested in exploring?

Answer. If confirmed, I will assess the current program before recommending changes. The Counter Narcotics program has been effective in establishing a presence and making a difference in West Africa, however, this is not the only region of Africa with a narcotics trafficking problem. East Africa, particularly Kenya and Tanzania, is experiencing an increase in heroin trafficking across the Indian Ocean from Afghanistan and Pakistan destined for U.S. and European markets. Additionally, in the Sahel region of North Africa, cocaine and hashish trafficking is being facilitated by, and directly benefitting, organizations like al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb leading to increased regional instability.

LORD'S RESISTANCE ARMY

Question. Despite pressure by the Ugandan People's Defense Forces (UPDF) and efforts by U.S. Special Operations personnel to support them, elements of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA)—including Joseph Kony—continue to operate and commit atrocities against civilian populations in the Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and South Sudan. Some observers have identified operational concerns with this mission, including that: (1) supported forces are trying to find an elusive foe in an area roughly the size of California, much of which is covered in thick jungle; (2) technical support to U.S. Forces and their UPDF partners from the defense and intelligence community continues to be inadequate; and (3) limitations continue to be placed on the ability of U.S. Special Operations personnel to accompany UPDF partners outside of main basing locations, thereby limiting the level of direct support they can provide.

In your view, what is the objective of Operation Observant Compass?

Answer. The Governments of Uganda, the Central African Republic (CAR), the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) and Republic of South Sudan, in collaboration with the African Union, continue to dedicate material and human resources to bring an end to the threat posed by the LRA. They are leading this effort, and the United States is committed to supporting this regional effort. Through our engagement, we are strengthening partnerships and regional cooperation.

The United States is providing cross-cutting support to advance four objectives: (1) the increased protection of civilians; (2) the apprehension or removal from the battlefield of Joseph Kony and senior LRA commanders; (3) the promotion of defections and support for the disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration of LRA fighters; and (4) the continued humanitarian relief of affected communities.

Question. In your view, what is the appropriate level of priority to be accorded to AFRICOM's efforts to counter the Lord's Resistance Army in central Africa, compared to other AFRICOM objectives?

Answer. The command's number one priority is East Africa with particular focus on al Shabaab and al Qaeda networks. This is followed by violent extremist and al Qaeda in North and West Africa and the Islamic Maghreb. AFRICOM's third priority is counter-LRA operations.

Question. If confirmed, will you promptly review and report back to the committee on your assessment of this mission?

Answer. This deployment is not open-ended and we will continue to regularly assess and review whether we are making sufficient progress. I commit to reporting to the Committee on this deployment at any time you request.

Question. Each of the countries currently affected by the LRA face other security threats viewed by their governments as more serious to their national well-being and, as a result, these countries place a lower priority on addressing the LRA problem.

If confirmed, how would you seek to strengthen the impact of Operation Observant Compass while recognizing those competing national priorities of our partners in the counter-LRA fight?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to work to maximize the success of Operation Observant Compass by seeking, within the parameters of the current mission, to deepen cooperation with Ugandan and other regional forces and increase intelligence that is appropriate to the operating environment.

SUPPORT TO UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING MISSIONS IN AFRICA

Question. In testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on July 29, 2009, Ambassador Susan Rice, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations (U.N.), stated that the United States "is willing to consider directly contributing more military observers, military staff officers, civilian police, and other civilian personnel—including more women I should note—to U.N. peacekeeping operations." Admiral Mullen has said he views "U.N. peacekeeping operations to be extremely important and cost effective in comparison to unilateral operations" and that "the success of these operations is very much in our national interest."

In your view, should the United States increase the number of personnel it contributes in the form of staff positions and military observers to U.N. peacekeeping missions and other international peace operations?

Answer. I agree with Ambassador Rice and Admiral Mullen and support an increase in contributions to U.N. peacekeeping operations. United Nations peacekeeping operations play a vital role in advancing the goal of improved peace, stability and security throughout Africa. Peacekeeping operations support United Nations objectives, while they also help to advance U.S. security interests. The U.S. role in United Nations peacekeeping operations, whether in the form of civilian police, staff officers, or military observers, may offer the United States a cost-effective way to continue to advance our mission and interests.

Question. In your view, what are the advantages and disadvantages of contributing additional military personnel to U.N. operations in the form of staff positions and military observers' positions?

Answer. In considering increasing U.S. personnel contributions to U.N. peacekeeping operations, it is important to balance the advantages and disadvantages that accompany any decision to deploy American military personnel. As Admiral Mullen described, United Nations-led peacekeeping operations can be cost effective, especially in comparison to unilateral operations. For the majority of these operations, sharing the manpower and financial burden among donor organizations and countries allows the international community to do more with less. U.S. personnel support to U.N. operations offers the United States the unique opportunity to build relationships and trust that could be of future benefit. When U.S. military personnel work in partnership with other U.N. members' military personnel, they build long-lasting relationships centered on trust and a sense of shared purpose, while gaining invaluable cultural, regional, and international experience which helps to further our national interests.

Careful thought and planning must accompany any decision to establish or increase the U.S. participation in U.N. peacekeeping operations. It is vital that we understand the security risks to our troops and personnel, while we also have a complete understanding of how U.S. personnel will operate within the U.N. mission. The posting of U.S. personnel to U.N. missions and operations always require a clearly defined chain of command in order to mitigate any potential problems or concerns. Any increase in U.S. support for U.N. operations will necessarily incur a personnel cost and commitment that must be understood, accepted, planned for, and managed. Finally, and most importantly, significantly increasing the U.S. presence, or in some cases even creating a U.S. presence for small U.N. operations, carries the risk of overshadowing other participating nations.

NATIONAL STRATEGY TO COMBAT TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME

Question. Criminal networks are not only expanding their operations, but they are also diversifying their activities, resulting in a convergence of transnational threats that has evolved to become more complex, volatile, and destabilizing. The Director of National Intelligence recently described transnational organized crime as "an abiding threat to U.S. economic and national security interests," and stated that "rising drug violence and corruption are undermining stability and the rule of law in some countries" in the Western Hemisphere. In July 2011, the President released his Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime: Addressing Converging Threats to National Security. One of the priority action areas designated in the strategy is "enhancing Department of Defense support to U.S. law enforcement."

What is your understanding of the President's strategy to combat transnational criminal organizations?

Answer. The Department of Defense plays an important supporting role in the implementation of the President's strategy, which declares that transnational organized crime is a threat to national and international security. The strategy provides a valuable framework from which AFRICOM can address this complex problem set, in partnership with other U.S. Government agencies and foreign partners. Illicit drug trafficking is but one facet of an interconnected transnational threat that is directly destabilizing many countries in Africa. As part of a whole-of-government approach to combating transnational organized crime, the Department of Defense can bring to bear unique authorities and capabilities to augment those of our law enforcement, intelligence, and foreign partners so we address the threats transnational organized crime pose in a coordinated manner.

Question. What is your assessment of the threat to the United States posed by transnational organized crime operating in the AFRICOM AOR?

Answer. Transnational organized crime in the AFRICOM area of operations threatens U.S. interests by taking advantage of failed states and contested spaces, forging alliances with corrupt government officials and some foreign intelligence services, destabilizing political, financial, and security institutions in fragile states, undermining competition in world strategic markets, using cyber technologies and other methods to perpetrate sophisticated frauds, creating the potential for the transfer of weapons of mass destruction to terrorists, and expanding narcotics, weapons, and human trafficking networks. Terrorists and insurgents are increasingly turning to criminal networks to generate funding and acquire logistical support, amplifying the threat to U.S. interests.

Question. What role does AFRICOM play in combating transnational organized crime and in training and equipping partner security forces that have been tasked with combating it?

Answer. AFRICOM conducts a number of programs that directly support the President's transnational organized crime strategy and Department of Defense guidance that addresses transnational organized crime. In addition to the command's Counternarcotics and Law Enforcement Assistance program, there are a variety of security cooperation programs that fund military-to-military capacity building and operations that enable partner nations to more effectively deal with security threats directly relating to transnational organized crime within their borders. The Command's newly-established Counterthreat Finance program is another important tool that allows the command to go after financial proceeds from these illicit activities.

COUNTERTHREAT FINANCE

Question. A number of officials in DOD and the Intelligence Community have called for investing additional resources in identifying and tracking the flow of money associated with terrorist networks and illicit trafficking.

What are your views on the role of DOD in counterthreat finance activities?

Answer. The Department of Defense is not and should not be the lead in this effort. Department of Defense does have unique capabilities and capacities that can be brought to bear to augment the efforts of the broader interagency community.

Question. What do you believe is the appropriate role, if any, of AFRICOM in supporting counterthreat finance activities?

Answer. The Department of Defense in general, and AFRICOM specifically, routinely contribute to threat finance activities with intelligence analysis to identify critical network vulnerabilities, providing strategic and operational planning expertise and organizing and executing engagement activities to help shape the environment. Countering threat finance activities supports efforts to counter violent extremists, drug traffickers and other illicit and destabilizing activities. Additionally, the Kingpin Act has proven to be an effective tool for the command to use to go after the highest-level drug traffickers through direct financial sanctions.

AFRICOM'S MILITARY SERVICE COMPONENT COMMANDS

Question. AFRICOM does not have any assigned forces and—as a result—is required to compete for forces within the global request for forces process. Given the Department's focus on the greater Middle East and Asia-Pacific, do you believe the AFRICOM Commander will be able to secure the necessary personnel to accomplish its partnering and engagement mission within its AOR? If not, how would you assess the risk to U.S. strategic interests in the region?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to assess the requirements AFRICOM currently fulfills regarding partnering and engagement missions and report those finding back to this committee in a timely manner.

However, to my understanding, the command has adequate access to resources to accomplish its partnering and engagement missions. AFRICOM's access to rotationally allocated resources has increased over the past 2 years through efforts such as the allocation of a Special Purpose Marine Air Ground Task Force in fiscal year 2012 and the allocation of a U.S. Army Regionally Aligned Force in fiscal year 2013. These assets provide much needed flexibility to respond to opportunities for engagement that arise on the continent. For example, the Special Purpose Marine Air Ground Task Force has filled a key role in our support to the African Union Mission in Somalia by providing a 10-week training course for deploying African troops. This engineering focused course teaches deploying troops valuable route clearing techniques against Improvised Explosive Devices, increasing survivability of deployed troops and reducing the threat to civilian populations. The efforts of the Special Purpose Marine Air Ground Task Force, coupled with a wide variety of other U.S. Government programs, are helping Africa Union Mission in Somalia forces to make a positive difference.

The threat to U.S. strategic interests including the global economic system and American citizens at home and abroad will continue to increase if the partnership and engagement missions are curtailed or reduced. There are many opportunities to partner with stable African partners and to develop partnerships with newly emerging governments. As opportunities arise, other entities see opportunities to capitalize on undergoverned and ungoverned spaces on the continent. The attack on the U.S. Embassy in Benghazi and the subsequent unrest in many areas across the continent in the days that followed are illustrative to the impact these threats can have if partners are not capable of establishing and maintaining a secure environment for their citizens.

REGIONAL ALIGNMENT AND ROTATIONAL DEPLOYMENTS OF ARMY BRIGADES

Question. The Army plans to align general purpose combat brigades with regional combatant commands, including AFRICOM, to support theater engagement and security force assistance missions and to make those forces, and other supporting units, available on a rotational basis for deployment to those regions for training and exercises.

What is your understanding and assessment of the Army's capability and capacity to align combat brigades or other units with regional combatant commands?

Answer. The Army is in the process of developing its Regionally Aligned Force concept and is conducting a "proof of principle" with a brigade combat team aligned to AFRICOM in fiscal year 2013. The Army's objective is to enhance its support of combatant commanders. Regionally Aligned Force brigades receive training in culture, geography, language, and gain an understanding of the militaries they will engage during their mission alignment.

Question. What are your views, if any, on the use of general purpose forces for missions providing security force assistance to other nations' militaries?

Answer. Iraq and Afghanistan have proven that general purpose forces are fully capable of providing significant security force assistance to partner nations. As we reduce the rotational requirement to combat areas we can use these forces to great effect in Africa. General Purpose Forces will have to be fully flexible to do their primary mission and to work in the area of security cooperation and security force assistance.

Question. In your view, how should, if at all, a unit's regional alignment determine the assignment of personnel, selection of unit commanders, priority for cultural and language training compared to core combat training, and identification and acquisition of special equipment?

Answer. Regionally aligned forces units will be trained to conduct the full range of military operations, but will also receive training in culture, geography, language, and gain an understanding of the militaries they will engage during their mission alignment. The current Army Brigade Combat Team structure will contain most of the skill sets required for training and equipping missions on the African continent. Regionally aligned forces units will be able to "reach-back" into Division and Corps assets in the United States for more specialized skills.

Question. If confirmed, how would you propose to implement the use of regionally aligned forces in support of your theater assistance and engagement strategies?

Answer. The Department of the Army has significant authorities in which they can employ regionally aligned forces in support of geographic combatant commanders. Regionally aligned forces can be employed for Theater Security Cooperation activities, operational planning, inspections, coordination visits, and the conduct of exercises. If confirmed, I would find opportunities across the continent and within planning efforts to incorporate the expanded capabilities and capacity of the regionally aligned forces within these authorities.

Question. In your view, how should funding responsibility be consolidated or distributed between the Military Departments and the combatant commands for training and employment of regionally aligned forces?

Answer. Exercise and security cooperation activities funding is separate from service funds. Services exist to provide trained and ready forces. The regionally aligned forces should be no different. For the combatant commands, it will be necessary to include costs of using the regionally aligned force units in security cooperation proposals utilizing authorities like 1206 (Counterterrorism) and 1207 (Security and Stabilization).

Question. In your view, is it feasible and suitable to satisfy theater engagement and assistance strategies completely with rotational forces? If not, why not?

Answer. AFRICOM has successfully conducted operations, exercises and activities since its inception without permanently assigned forces. Like other commands, it plans and requests forces through the Global Force Management process.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the performance criteria and metrics that are or will be used to evaluate the effectiveness and efficiency of combatant command theater engagement strategies and, if confirmed, how will you integrate the use of regionally aligned Army brigades or other units into the evaluation system?

Answer. Over the last 4 years, AFRICOM has developed a comprehensive integrated assessment process linking all theater, regional and contingency plans—including all operations, exercises and security cooperation activities. The Command measures progress in achieving objectives and effects using a combination of indicators from multiple sources: the Department of Defense, other U.S. Government agencies, and numerous open-source international agencies—such as the United Nations, the World Bank, and the African Union. The Command also relies on the Department of State to provide polling data from African citizens to add depth and breadth to the results. The Command uses correlation analysis of U.S. activities and resources with progress in the overall environment to shape and influence the planning and scheduling of future engagement activities. I look forward to continuing the best assessment practices at AFRICOM, and ensuring that future Command-wide assessments support decisionmaking both at the Command and throughout the Department of Defense.

GLOBAL PEACE OPERATION INITIATIVE

Question. In 2005, the United States along with our partners in the G–8 launched the Global Peace Operations Initiative (GPOI) to train peacekeepers. This program is run by the Department of State's Bureau of African Affairs. DOD has provided varying degrees of personnel support since the program's inception. A number of national militaries in the AFRICOM AOR have benefitted from this program and have provided peacekeeping troops to multilateral peacekeeping operations around the globe.

What is your understanding of the GPOI program?

Answer. Global Peace Operations Initiative is intended to address capacity gaps in forces supporting peacekeeping operations. Since its inception in 2004, the program's goal is primarily to train and deploy peacekeepers. The program has shifted focus to help peacekeeping contributing countries train and deploy themselves. The program focuses its effort in Africa, as it is the stage for several of the largest peacekeeping operations.

Question. Would you support or oppose AFRICOM's continued involvement in the program?

Answer. Based on my current understanding, I would support increased involvement in the Global Peace Operations Initiative. AFRICOM provides resources to Global Peace Operations Initiative to develop human capital and critical enablers to support United Nations/African Union peacekeeping. In the future, with additional funding, AFRICOM could increase support to build, planning capability, intelligence support, logistics capacity, skills training, peacekeeping staffs, and other efforts critical to the success of peacekeeping operations.

Question. If confirmed, will you advocate for AFRICOM to play a more direct role in providing U.S. military personnel (vice private contractors) for the training missions conducted under GPOI?

Answer. Yes. To the extent military personnel are available. Integrating uniformed trainers provides a significant cost savings and improvement to the Global Peace Operations Initiative program while supporting Department of Defense and Department of State objectives to build the capacity of our partners. Initially I would support a hybrid contractor-military peacekeeping training model led by the State Department, coordinated with our country teams, and supported with military trainers, and transition to full uniformed support of Global Peace Operations Initiative in the future.

MASS ATROCITIES PREVENTION

Question. President Obama identified the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide as a core U.S. national security interest, as well as a core moral interest, in August 2011 under Presidential Study Directive 10.

Among interagency partners, what is AFRICOM's role in addressing atrocity threats, and what tools does AFRICOM have for preventing or responding to atrocities in its AOR?

Answer. AFRICOM is committed to preventing mass atrocities. General Ham highlighted the importance of this to the command by including building the capacity of African partners to prevent and protect their populations from mass atrocities in his Commander's Intent. AFRICOM participates in and is a leader within the Mass Atrocities Prevention Response Options development construct within Department of Defense. The staff includes Mass Atrocity Prevention and Response planning into planning activities and includes such items as respect for the rule of law, submission to civil authority, and adherence to human rights norms into military-to-military engagements. This ultimately addresses the root causes of mass atrocities.

Question. Has AFRICOM developed planning processes toward this effort so that it will be able to respond quickly in emergency situations? In your assessment, what country or countries are the most at risk for mass atrocities in Africa?

Answer. AFRICOM plans for a range of contingencies in support of U.S. national security policy and to prepare for possible crisis response scenarios. AFRICOM also pursues ongoing efforts in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Uganda, South Sudan, and Central African Republic to prevent Mass Atrocities. In Liberia, the command is committed to building the Liberia Security Sector to prevent a repeat of their disastrous recent history.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS AUTHORITIES

Question. It has been reported that Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command, is seeking changes to the Unified Command Plan (UCP) that he believes would allow SOCOM to better support the requirements of the Theater Special Operations Commands (TSOC). Reportedly, such changes would give the Commander of SOCOM combatant command authority over the TSOCs—including responsibilities for resourcing—and provide for more rapid deployment of Special Operations Forces to and between geographic combatant commands without the requirement for approval by the Secretary of Defense in every case. Operational control of deployed Special Operations Forces would reportedly remain with the respective geographic combatant commander.

Some have expressed concern that such changes could raise problems related to civilian control of the military, infringe upon the traditional authorities of the geographic combatant commanders, and make it more difficult for ambassadors and geographic combatant commanders to know what military personnel are coming into their areas of responsibility and what they are doing while they are there.

Please provide your assessment of whether such UCP changes would be appropriate and can be made without conflicting with civilian control of the military, infringing upon authorities provided to the geographic combatant commanders, or raising concerns with the Department of State.

Answer. This is a topic which will require further study. If confirmed, I will review Admiral McRaven's recommended changes to the Unified Command Plan and provide an assessment back to this committee in a timely manner.

However, from my experiences in Afghanistan and Iraq, it is critical that Special Operations Forces are fully integrated with conventional forces. This integration provides the commanders and forces a common operational picture, allows for a more proactive and responsive decisionmaking process, and access to shared resources.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS FORCES

Question. As forces have been reduced in Iraq and Afghanistan, there is an expectation that additional Special Operations Forces may be available for missions in other combatant commands, including AFRICOM, which have had only a small presence of such forces in recent years.

What special operations capabilities are in highest demand by AFRICOM?

Answer. Given the complex strategic environment in Africa and the need for persistent, distributed, low visibility and small footprint operations, additional Special Operation Forces specifically organized, trained, and equipped to operate in sensitive environments are required. Special Operations Forces capabilities in highest demand include the following: (1) experienced special operations forces ground operators to build and maintain partner force counterterrorism capacity and enable their operations; (2) Special Operations Forces focused on enhancing partner nation nonlethal capabilities (e.g., Civil Affairs, Military Information Support Operation) to shape the information environment and create good will; (3) Special Operations Forces intelligence personnel and equipment (e.g., analysts, collectors, associated enablers) to better illuminate the threat; and (4) Special Operations Forces nonstandard, medium and vertical airlift (i.e., low signature, non-standard aviation, MC–130H, and MC–130P) to provide low signature movement across the continent, transport and resupply a crisis response force and extend the range of vertical lift platforms. Non Special Operations Forces assets required includes Intelligence, Surveillance, and Reconnaissance and Personnel Recovery/Casualty Evacuation rotary wing with associated enablers.

Question. Which countries in the AFRICOM AOR do you believe have the greatest need for increased engagement with U.S. Special Operations Forces?

Answer. To achieve a Global Special Operations Forces Network, Special Operations Command AFRICA requires greater access and engagements throughout Africa. In order to optimize effectiveness and strengthen our African partners' counterterrorism/counter Violent Extremist Organization capabilities necessitates greater engagements with the following key countries: Libya, Niger, Tunisia, Algeria, Mauritania, Nigeria, Mali, Cameroon, South Sudan, and Kenya. Greater collaboration and engagements within the aforementioned countries greatly furthers the U.S. Government counterterrorism/counterviolent extremist organizations efforts against the growing and interconnected al Qaeda threat throughout Northwest Africa and collaborative actions against al Shabaab within East Africa.

In support of ongoing regional Counter-Lord's Resistance Army operations, U.S. Special Operations Forces are advising and assisting partner nation forces from Uganda, Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the Republic of South Sudan, in addition to a number of United Nations missions in the region, to find and remove Joseph Kony and the Lord's Resistance Army as a destabilizing force in the region.

While U.S. Special Operations Forces continues to build capacity in Counter-Lord's Resistance Army partner nation forces and has begun to assist the nascent African Union Regional Task Force, longer-term development of these forces may require an integrated Special Operations and Conventional Forces approach to mature the Africa Union Regional Task Forces as an institution and increase capacity of individual partner nation forces.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS PERSONNEL IN EMBASSIES

Question. U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) deploys personnel to work with country teams in a number of high priority countries where the United States is not engaged in direct action operations, but rather trying to train host nation security forces. Their mission is to support the priorities of the Ambassador and the combatant commander's theater campaign plan. At times, Ambassadors have complained that they have not been adequately informed of activities by special operations forces in their country.

If confirmed, what do you intend to do to make sure the goals of special operations personnel deployed to these countries are aligned closely to those of the Ambassadors with whom they are working?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure the activities of special operations personnel, as well as all personnel, are coordinated with the embassy Chief of Mission. AFRICOM currently conducts this coordination by requiring Chief of Mission concurrence on operations, exercises and engagement activities.

MARINE SECURITY GUARDS IN EMBASSIES

Question. Due to the attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, which resulted in the death of a U.S. ambassador and three other Americans, many are conveying concern about the safety of U.S. diplomatic personnel around the world.

Do you share this concern?

Answer. Yes. The Marine Corps has a longstanding relationship with the Department of State to provide internal security at diplomatic posts. The Marine Security Guard Detachment Commander, acting under operational supervision of the Regional Security Officer, is tasked with providing internal security functions to prevent the compromise of classified information and equipment vital to the national security of the United States. A secondary mission of Marine Security Guard is to provide protection for U.S. citizens and U.S. Government property located within diplomatic premises. Under certain emergency situations they will provide special protective services to the Chief of Mission or Principal Officer. These protocols have proven successful for the past several decades, and provide flexibility to Regional Security Officers for the employment of Marine Security Guards upon diplomatic posts.

Question. The Marine Security Guard Program was established in 1946, and its mission, to provide internal security at designated embassies of classified information and equipment, remains unchanged to this day.

In light of increasing threats to U.S. diplomatic personnel by terrorists throughout the world, do you believe it is time to re-examine the Program's mission and protocols?

Answer. I believe the Marine Security Guard Program, as defined under existing protocols between the Marine Corps and Department of State, functions well and meets the needs of our diplomatic missions around the world. However, based on changing security dynamics we are in the process of taking a look at what changes to the program might be necessary. I fully appreciate the importance of this mission and understand it is important to work closely with the Department of State to ensure our Marine Security Guard organization, mission and security protocols are responsive to their needs.

Question. If so, should it be broadened to provide additional protection to U.S. diplomatic personnel?

Answer. At this time, I don't believe the program should be broadened to provide additional protection to U.S. diplomatic personnel. However, the Marine Corps has a long history of working with the State Department, and should adjustments be required, will work eagerly to ensure the internal security functions aboard diplomatic premises meet the standards required.

Question. In your opinion, what additional steps, if any, should be taken to reduce the risk of attacks on U.S. embassies and consulates and diplomatic personnel by terrorist organizations within Afghanistan and throughout the region?

Answer. We must continue to monitor threats to our diplomatic posts in Afghanistan and around the region, and adjust our security posture based on the threats and changing conditions on the ground. External security at our embassies and consulates is, first, the responsibility of the host nation and must remain so. In Afghanistan, we maintain a heightened security posture, and will continue to do so, in order to reduce risks commensurate with local threats and to advance the important work of our diplomatic personnel.

INTELLIGENCE, SURVEILLANCE, AND RECONNAISSANCE CAPABILITIES

Question. Demand for intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) capabilities of every kind has grown exponentially in recent years largely due to the enhanced situational awareness and targeting capabilities they bring to our commanders. Almost all of the geographic combatant commands have validated ISR requirements that are not being met.

What is your understanding of the support AFRICOM is currently receiving to respond to its ISR requirements?

Answer. ISR assets are a scarce resource and should be allocated based on threat. My understanding is AFRICOM does not receive intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance assets to meet its requirement. However, Department of Defense has provided additional assets to meet specific needs for operations such as in response to recent attacks in North Africa. This year, AFRICOM will receive additional intelligence capabilities to include multi-intelligence Global Hawks, foliage penetration, and counter-improvised explosive device technologies.

AFRICOM receives only about 7 percent of its total intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance requirements. However, in response to the recent attack in North Africa, AFRICOM is currently getting about 50 percent of its stated need for intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance in North Africa. AFRICOM's intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance requirements are supported by the Air Force, the Navy, and the National Intelligence Community. The Services provide AFRICOM with a wide variety of intelligence capability. Predator, Pilatus fixed wing aircraft, and Scan Eagle provide full motion video. EP–3 Orion and other maritime assets provide signals intelligence. Seaborne assets provide tactical intelligence capability as well as a forward staging area for MQ–8 unmanned helicopter, and Scan Eagle. Joint Surveillance and Target Attack aircraft provide ground moving target indicator capability. Global Hawk provides long-dwell, long-range imagery.

While AFRICOM is allocated a wide variety of intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance, current allocation does not provide sufficient quantity or sensor mix to achieve the objectives which the Joint Staff directed to AFRICOM.

Question. Do you believe the threat emanating from AFRICOM's AOR should garner additional resources from within DOD? If so, how do you intend to advocate for additional ISR assets?

Answer. Yes, I believe additional intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance capabilities are necessary to protect American interest and assist our close allies and partners. The recent crises in North Africa demonstrate the volatility of the African security environment. As the United States makes significant progress against al Qaeda on many fronts, huge pockets of ungoverned spaces and unstable security situations have provided a safe haven for al Qaeda, its allies and affiliates. Al Qaeda has taken advantage of the poor security situation in Libya, easy access to weapons, and the rebellion in Mali to establish deep roots throughout North and West Africa. While significant progress has been made in Somalia, an increasingly desperate al Shabaab has turned to improvised explosive device attacks against our African partners. Additionally, Boco Haram carried out hundreds of improvised explosive device attacks in Nigeria. Finally, kidnapping for ransom continues to be a significant concern in Somalia and Mali.

If confirmed, I will request additional assets through the global force management process to take advantage of ISR resources as we draw down in Afghanistan. Until Global Force Management allocation meets requirements, I will continue to leverage contract and experimental intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance and look to the broader Research and Development community for innovative solutions to unique AFRICOM requirements.

COMBINED JOINT TASK FORCE-HORN OF AFRICA

Question. What is your understanding of the mission of Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa (CJTF–HOA) and its command relationship to AFRICOM?

Answer. CJTF–HOA is a subordinate command of AFRICOM. Its mission is to protect, defend, and promote the national security interests of the United States by conducting military operations to prevail in our current and future operations against violent extremist organizations and other transnational threats, and strengthens the capabilities of our East African Partner Nation militaries and regional security organizations in order to assist East African Nations to create security environments that promote security and stability within their country borders and throughout the region.

Question. How do its roles and responsibilities compare with AFRICOM's service component commands?

Answer. Unlike the service specific and functional commands, CJTF–HOA is focused on a specific geographic area of operation—the East Africa Combined-Joint Operations Area CJTF–HOA is directed by AFRICOM to plan, coordinate, synchronize, direct and assess operations, exercises, security cooperation activities and engagements with AFRICOM components and Special Operations Command Africa along six lines of effort: Counter Violent Extremist Organizations; Strengthen Defense Capabilities; Prepare and Respond to Crisis; Counter-Piracy; Counter Illicit Trafficking; and Maintain Strategic Posture.

Question. How does AFRICOM ensure that CJTF–HOA activities complement rather than conflict with activities being conducted by AFRICOM's service components?

Answer. AFRICOM has published an East Africa campaign plan with CJTF–HOA designated as the supported command.

Question. What are the most effective metrics to measure the impact of CJTF–HOA's efforts to date?

Answer. CJTF–HOA is currently developing a formal set of assessment criteria to measure the impact of their efforts.

Currently, the metrics used to measure the impact of CJTF–HOA effort includes the diminished effectiveness and ability of extremist organizations to operate in East Africa, the increased capability, willingness, and partnership of East African nations to eliminate extremist organizations, and the ability and capability of East African nations to respond to crisis, protecting U.S. interests in the region.

MARITIME SECURITY

Question. Maritime security has proven to be a significant issue on the coasts of West and East Africa.

What is your assessment of AFRICOM's ongoing maritime security initiatives?

Answer. My understanding is AFRICOM has seen some success in maritime security initiatives. There have been several recent, positive developments in this area as a result of AFRICOM's initiatives, especially in the Gulf of Guinea. These initiatives are also U.S. interagency efforts, especially in conjunction with the Department of State. In particular, the command's effort to assist the Economic Community of Central African States and the Economic Community of West African States in developing a legal and operational framework for regional cooperation was a positive development. This assistance, requested by Economic Community of Central African States and Economic Community of West African States, will improve the ability of these states to meet the significant challenges of illicit maritime activity, including piracy, drug, arms, and human trafficking, and threats to energy and port security which potentially have a negative impact on economic development. These transnational threats directly impact the quality of life of the population and affect U.S. national interests. These regional problems are best addressed with regional solutions. If confirmed, I will continue to assess these programs and seek opportunities to build upon these positive steps with our African partners.

Question. Very few African countries have the capacity to project naval forces beyond their coastal waters; as a result, the economic exclusion zones of many coastal African countries are exploited by a variety of international actors.

What opportunities, if any, do you see for expanded U.S. engagement on maritime security in the AFRICOM AOR?

Answer. There are many opportunities to expand AFRICOM's maritime engagement. AFRICOM is seeking to include more partners in these maritime security efforts to include the European Union and North Atlantic Treaty Organization nations; International Organizations such as the United Nations and African Union; and Regional Organizations such as Economic Community of Central African States and Economic Community of West African States. There is also an opportunity to expand beyond the shores of Africa to include developing closer coordination and cooperation on activities and events that have transatlantic impact from South America and the Caribbean, through Africa and into Europe. Illicit maritime trafficking has global reach and impact which can be addressed by closer cooperation between hemispheres (north, south, east, and west).

This multinational approach is already happening in the Navy's Africa Partnership Station, AFRICOM teams with our African and other enduring partners to conduct training, exercises and operations like African Maritime Law Enforcement Partnership. For example, Naval Forces Africa has completed five deployments by U.S. ships along with deployments of ships from several European nations. My current understanding is that on the whole, our African partners are very satisfied and have requested more support.

For the past 2 years AFRICOM, in conjunction with the Department of State and the African Center for Strategic Studies, has been working to enable countries to develop national maritime strategies that foster rule of law, emphasize good governance and support economic development. In addition several countries, such as Ghana and Mozambique have requested AFRICOM support to develop plans to respond to threats to security of offshore oil production facilities and transport vessels.

These challenges present opportunities to enable African countries to guard their own waters and manage their valuable offshore resources. The freedom of commerce along the strategically important maritime transportation corridors is an African, United States, and global shared interest. If confirmed, I plan to continue the process of cooperation with U.S. Government agencies and international partners, and seek to enhance and continue the programs and activities that build partner maritime security capacity.

CHINA

Question. In your view, do China and the United States share common security objectives in the AFRICOM AOR?

Answer. In my opinion, China and the United States should cooperate on issues of mutual interest, such as counterterrorism, and on other projects that satisfy both countries' objectives.

Question. In your opinion, what effect has China's engagement with African militaries had on those militaries and on U.S. security interests?

Answer. My understanding is China offers military equipment to African countries at prices that each country can afford, and training at Chinese military schools is often completely subsidized. While in many cases the equipment available from China may be older and less technologically advanced than what other countries can offer, this equipment provides African militaries with more "bang for the buck" than they might be able to afford from any other source, while having the added perceived benefit of coming without ties, such as Western concern about human rights and democracy. Chinese equipment and training has been known to complement U.S. activities, however, for example by providing a baseline for militaries that move on to Africa Contingency Operations Training & Assistance peacekeeping training and participate in U.N. peacekeeping operations.

Question. To what extent do you view China's activities on the continent as a threat/challenge to U.S. national security interests?

Answer. In my opinion, we should seek to cooperate with China where we have mutual interests. China acts on the basis of "non-interference in internal affairs," which means the country does not restrict its arms sales as a result of concerns about how the purchasing country behaves internationally or with respect to its own citizens. As a result, China does not discriminate against countries on the edge of instability or those with poor human rights records against their own people. However, China is not actively targeting U.S. interests, activities, or personnel so it is not a direct threat.

Question. Are U.S. policies in Africa sufficient to counter China's influence when that is appropriate, or are there additional measures we should be considering? What role should AFRICOM play in this regard?

Answer. In my opinion, current U.S. policies are sufficient to address the influence of China in Africa. It is important to look for and capitalize on areas of mutual national interest between our two countries. For example, solid opportunities exist for cooperation with counter-piracy operations in the Indian Ocean and Gulf of Guinea. Additionally, the Chinese conduct training and have programs that are similar in nature to ours, but there is very limited coordination or cooperation on these efforts. If and when our national interests align, AFRICOM should work to coordinate these efforts if possible in order to better develop our African partners and increase the security on the continent.

Question. Do you foresee China's growing energy and resource demands affecting security developments in Africa?

Answer. China gets significant energy and natural resources from Africa and would be reluctant to allow those levels to decline. As a result of China's interest in gaining international respect and support, it is more inclined to use diplomacy and negotiation to maintain this desired level of resources. In one recent example with Sudan and South Sudan, China attempted to mediate between the two countries when oil production was shut down over a dispute regarding past and future dispensation of oil revenues.

SECTION 1208 FUNDING

Question. Section 1208 of the Ronald Reagan National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2005 (Public Law 108–375), as amended, gave U.S. Special Operations Command the authority to provide support (including training, funding, and equipment) to regular forces, irregular forces, and individuals supporting or facilitating military operations by U.S. Special Operations Forces to combat terrorism. What is your assessment of this authority?

Answer. Section 1208, within the context of its authority, has proved to be one of the most responsive and flexible tools to meet AFRICOM security challenges. This authority allows AFRICOM to enable partner nations who share the common goal of countering the violent extremist organizations threat in the region. AFRICOM is responsible to identify and engage the "right" partner unit which is capable and willing to conduct counterterrorism operations against violent extremist organizations threats. To do this requires close coordination with both the regional country teams as well as the legitimate government officials, both civilian and military. It is essential that all parties understand and agree to the common threat picture and have a displayed willingness to act against those threats.

Section 1208 is not a capacity building authority. The purpose of the funding is to better enable those units that are legitimate representatives of our partner nation. In some cases, such as Libya, those units may be "deputized" militias.

Question. Do you believe this authority has been appropriately utilized in Africa?

Answer. Yes. It has been used appropriately in Africa. The successes in east Africa, specifically the visible improvements made against al Shabaab in Somalia, is a reflection of using this line of funding. All activities were conducted with complete transparency and in full coordination with our Interagency Partners in the region. Additional details require a higher classification.

However, there is room to expand this authority to achieve focused effects against the threat. As Special Operations Command continues to resource and enable the Theater Special Operations Command and those enhanced capabilities come available, expansion of the 1208 authority against al Qaeda will provide opportunistic, disciplined, small footprint, high-impact special operations forces the ability to maximize the use of this authority.

Question. If confirmed, how would you seek to have this authority used in Africa?

Answer. I will continue to identify those partner nations who are actively pursuing operations to counter the violent extremist organizations threat stream in Northwest Africa. The countries of Libya, Niger, and Mauritania are actively countering the threat stream emanating out of northern Mali. Ideally, AFRICOM would partner with those units who are actively conducting counterterrorism/counter-violent extremist organizations operations to better enable their efforts.

Within the capabilities of the Theater Special Operations Command, I would seek to expand the use of the 1208 authority by continuing to develop and socialize concepts of operation focused on isolating and degrading the threat network across the continent to achieve U.S. counterterrorism objectives.

AFRICA HEALTH RELATED ISSUES

Question. Health issues are a significant concern in many African nations and in their militaries and the U.S. Government's engagement strategy in Africa includes an emphasis on health-related issues.

To what extent should AFRICOM be involved in broader U.S. Government "health diplomacy" efforts in Africa?

Answer. First, AFRICOM should continue to synchronize Department of Defense health engagement on the continent to achieve optimum results. Simultaneously, AFRICOM should coordinate its health engagement with other parts of the U.S. Government to ensure maximum impact.

AFRICOM is already doing that in a number of areas. Programs like the Partner Military Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome Prevention Program and our Pandemic Response Program are good examples. Partner Military Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome Prevention Program, implemented by the Department of Defense Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome Prevention Program's office is primarily funded by the President's Emergency Plan for Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome Relief and executed in collaboration with agencies like Department of State, U.S. Agency for International Development, Department of Health and Human Services, Department of Commerce, Department of Labor, and Peace Corps in 41 African countries.

AFRICOM's Pandemic Response Program, currently being implemented in 17 African countries, was funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development from 2008 to 2012. The program is now funded by Department of Defense but is still implemented in collaboration with Department of State, U.S. Agency for International Development and Center for Disease Control. Similarly, the AFRICOM's malaria initiative with partner militaries in East Africa (and soon in West Africa) is coordinated with the President's Malaria Initiative in target countries (same partners as above). Additionally, the Defense Threat Reduction Agency's bio surveillance program, working with AFRICOM, is coordinating with U.S. Department of Agriculture, Department of State, and U.S. Agency for International Development.

Question. In your view, should AFRICOM's engagement strategy, perhaps more than other combatant command engagement strategies, include an emphasis on military health engagement?

Answer. Comparisons across combatant command geographical areas of operation are difficult due to the number of cultures and economies being engaged. But, the conditions of many partner nation militaries in Africa are such that without improved health intervention (improved nutrition, better disease prevention, care and treatment) these militaries will be less able to deploy in their own countries, much less in peacekeeping operations. As a result, AFRICOM has included health and medical engagement in our strategies with many partners in Africa.

Question. How much success has DOD had in efforts to support prevention and treatment of HIV/AIDS in African militaries?

Answer. Africa Command's military Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome program is aimed at mitigating the impacts of the disease on African military readiness. The program includes activities that help prevent the escalation of Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome infection rates within African security forces, and provide care and treatment for the servicemembers and families infected or affected by the disease. DOD activities that support African militaries' fight against Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome now reach 41 African countries.

During fiscal year 2011, the command's programs reached 508,000 African troops and family members with prevention messages, and provided counseling and testing services for 412,000 servicemembers and their families. Almost 4,000 health care workers have received Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome training. Approximately 43,000 individuals are on antiretroviral treatment as a result of these collaborative efforts. The fight against Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection/Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome in Africa is having an impact. A leader of a southern African country remarked that, 3 years ago, he was conducting burials every day for a Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection related death; however, today he conducts one burial every 8 to 10 days.

Other indicators of success include; 17,923 males were circumcised as part of Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection prevention efforts; 96,558 eligible adults and children were provided with a minimum of one care service; 68,237 Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection positive adults and children received a minimum of one clinical service; 29,856 HIV-positive persons received cotrimoxazole prophylaxis.

Question. If confirmed, how, if at all, would you like to see such efforts increased or programmatically altered?

Answer. If confirmed, I would assess the programs before recommending changes. Current programs are effective and favor greater efforts in Human Immunodeficiency Virus Infection prevention and treatment.

Question. In your view, what should DOD's role be in the program relative to other elements of the U.S. Government?

Answer. Health and Humanitarian Assistance efforts require a "whole-of-government" approach. Department of Defense and its organizations bring a wide range of capabilities to the table and when properly coordinated the U.S. Government efforts are greatly enhanced without expense to national security. It is important that the balance be maintained. In AFRICOM's case these efforts provide it with additional access to partner nations and enhance positive perceptions of our military.

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE IN AFRICOM

Question. The Department of Defense has developed comprehensive policies and procedures to improve the prevention and response to incidents of sexual assault. However, new allegations of sexual assault continue to be reported, and many question the adequacy of the chain of command's response to these allegations.

Answer. A frequent complaint of victims of sexual assault and their advocates is that military commanders frequently fail to hold assailants accountable for their criminal acts. Some in Congress have proposed that commanders' authority to address sexual assaults be removed and given to an independent entity.

Question. What is your view of the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Program in AFRICOM?

Answer. It is my understanding that the program is effective in AFRICOM. The program addresses the needs of the combatant command staff by providing trained, in-house Victim Advocates that work hand-in-hand with the garrison Sexual Harassment/Assault Response & Prevention coordinator. The Stuttgart garrison support agencies provide training, guidance and support the Victim Advocates efforts and directly address the needs of victims. Supporting agencies also include Family Advocacy, the Provost Marshalls Office, Army Criminal Investigation Division, medical personnel, and others as required to ensure program compliance and the needs of the victim are met.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources in AFRICOM to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault?

Answer. Although the command's primary support is garrison based, all indications are the training and resources are adequate to respond appropriately to allegations of sexual assault.

Question. What is your view of the proposal to give the authority to an independent agency, not part of the chain of command, to address allegations of sexual assault, including the authority to hold assailants accountable for criminal acts?

Answer. The Services recently changed the level of commander with Uniform Code of Military Justice authority over these types of cases and this change should be assessed before making further changes.

Giving authority to an independent agency could undermine command authority by sending the message the commander cannot be trusted to make a fair and impartial assessment.

Question. What is your understanding of the adequacy of the resources and programs in place in AFRICOM to offer victims of sexual assault the medical, psychological, and legal help that they need?

Answer. U.S. Army Garrison Stuttgart is the lead agent to provide these services to the staff and they have the core functions in place to support AFRICOM members. They have shown a sincere spirit of teaming with the command to take care of our personnel.

Question. Do you consider the current sexual assault policies and procedures, particularly those on confidential reporting, to be effective?

Answer. Yes. The policies and procedures seem effective. Confidential reporting provides an option for those who wish to seek assistance while maintaining confidentiality.

Question. What is your view of steps taken to prevent sexual assaults in AFRICOM?

Answer. AFRICOM works in synchronization with the victim advocates. Training is highlighted and conducted by senior leaders in small groups to discuss troops' responsibility to stop activities that lead to heightened possibility of sexual assaults. Additionally, the garrison is examining the infrastructure and facilities to identify mitigation measures in the barracks and other areas.

QUALITY-OF-LIFE CHALLENGES IN AFRICOM

Question. What quality-of-life challenges are unique for personnel and their families assigned to the AFRICOM area of responsibility?

Answer. The lack of reliable infrastructure on the African continent presents unique quality-of-life challenges for our personnel and their families. Among these challenges are unreliable broadband internet, sporadic postal service access, shortages of essential goods, varying degrees of host nation medical care and schooling capabilities. There is a relatively small AFRICOM personnel footprint in our African embassies—of the 36 staffed, there are fewer than 200 personnel in both accompanied and unaccompanied tours.

Additionally, there are approximately 5,000 unaccompanied personnel on the continent at any given time, and the command conducts a variety of outreach and educational activities such as travel clinics to impart proper respect for, and adherence to, the unique medical and safety requirements of our area of responsibility.

Question. If confirmed, how would you address these theater-wide challenges to help improve the quality of life for these personnel and their families?

Answer. The Command invests in productive partnerships with Service components and supporting nongovernmental agencies. Army morale, welfare, and recreation activities are proactive—providing large mobile support kits containing exercise and recreation equipment, games, lounge items, and electronic equipment to support our servicemembers. As always, AFRICOM also receives superb support from the Red Cross, the United Services Organization, and other organizations with the mission of supporting America's uniform personnel. I will continue to invest in, and encourage these relationships. For school issues, we work closely with the Department of Defense Education Activity to ensure military dependents get quality education on the continent. U.S. Transportation Command facilitates medical evacuation service capability for military personnel and their families on the continent.

MENTAL HEALTH OF SERVICEMEMBERS AND STRESS ON THE FORCE

Question. The committee is concerned about the stress on military personnel resulting from lengthy and repeated deployments and their access to mental health care to deal with this increased stress. The suicide rates in each of the Services are clear reminders that servicemembers, particularly those who have been deployed multiple times, are under tremendous stress and need access to mental health care.

In your view, are there sufficient mental health assets in AFRICOM to address the mental health needs of the military personnel and their families?

Answer. Yes. I believe there are adequate Mental Health resources in the Stuttgart Army Garrison Community to appropriately address the needs of the headquarters staff and their family members. For example, AFRICOM is particularly pleased with the response to Department of Defense Military and Family Life Consultant Program. Through the Military and Family Life Consultant Program, licensed clinical providers assist servicemembers, civilians, and their families by providing brief, solution-focused problem solving support. They work in support of and in conjunction with existing military entities/services. There are no records kept and contact with Military and Family Life Consultant Program is anonymous with the exceptions of allegations made of harm to self, others, allegations of domestic abuse, sexual assault and child abuse. The role of the consultant is unique—they are not traditional therapists. The primary Military and Family Life Consultant Program role is to assess needs, provide support, or refer as necessary. Among the service they provide is assistance to servicemembers, civilians, and families with development of an action plans. For example, in Djibouti, usage statistics indicate eight contacts are made on an average day, and the program there will gain a second consultant to serve that population. The command is also pleased with the services provided by our local Army health care providers and the medical services in the local community, as well as Military OneSource.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to address the mental health needs of military personnel and their families in AFRICOM?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to place an emphasis in ensuring that behavioral health services are available to our servicemembers and their families. I recognize that we must foster a culture that facilitates an awareness of the impact of behavioral health issues on individual servicemembers, families, units, and our military communities.

This awareness starts from the top leadership and extends down to each individual assigned to the command. I will continue to engage to ensure we maintain an interdisciplinary approach to addressing the behavioral health needs of the force. This includes increasing the effectiveness of health surveillance, detection, and response efforts to identify, refer, and treat servicemembers and families at risk; reducing cultural stigma associated with seeking behavioral healthcare and developing resiliency and coping skills that foster help-seeking behavior among our servicemembers and their families.

I will leverage policies and programs that assist servicemembers suffering from physical and behavioral health conditions. The starting point at every level is education and training. I will also empower all soldiers, sailors, marines, airmen, and civilian personnel to act as sensors for leadership by noticing small changes in behavior and taking action early. These efforts encourage unit strength, resilience, and readiness. I will encourage that service and family members seek mental health assistance when needed.

Question. Do you have any views on how to reduce the stigma, real or perceived, for seeking mental health care?

Answer. We have taken conscious steps to adjust policy to reduce stigma by facilitating culture change within our force through continued education and by continuing to enhance the support network for servicemembers who may be at risk. I will continue to emphasize the importance of assessing the need for behavioral health services at key transition points to include redeployment, reintegration, and servicemembers to civilian transition. I will also continue to emphasize the need for behavioral health screening during routine periodic health and wellness exams. I will encourage social support and awareness of behavioral health programs which, through buddy or peer-to-peer involvement, has been successful in increasing behavioral health treatment-seeking among veterans. Additionally, increased social support may also lead to stigma reduction.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Commander, AFRICOM?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

SEXUAL ASSAULT

1. Senator MCCASKILL. General Rodriguez, it is my understanding that the movie "The Invisible War" is being used to help educate senior leaders in the U.S. Armed Forces about the issue of sexual assault in the military. Have you seen the movie?

General RODRIGUEZ. Yes, I have seen "The Invisible War".

2. Senator MCCASKILL. General Rodriguez, as a leader in the U.S. Army, what have you learned about the issue of sexual assault facing servicemembers under your command?

General RODRIGUEZ. Sexual assault is contrary to Army values, degrades mission readiness, and will be prosecuted. With continued leadership and chain of command involvement, the Army can reduce the incidents of sexual assault and provide the training and guidance to prevent these incidents from occurring, prosecute those responsible for sexual assault, and provide the best support to the victims.

The Army Sexual Harassment and Assault Reporting Program is effective in addressing the needs of the Army by providing trained, in-house Victim Advocates that work hand-in-hand with the garrison Sexual Harassment/Assault Response and Prevention coordinator. The garrison command support agencies on Army installations provide training, guidance and support the Victim Advocates efforts and directly address the needs of victims. Supporting agencies also include Family Advocacy, the Provost Marshalls Office, Army Criminal Investigation Division, medical personnel, and others as required to ensure program compliance and the needs of the victim are met.

BUILDING SECURITY CAPACITY

3. Senator MCCASKILL. General Rodriguez, one of U.S. Africa Command's (AFRICOM) central missions is to strengthen the defense capabilities of African states. In January 2013, an International Security Advisory Board report on "Security Capacity Building" found that the United States annually spends more than $25 billion on what is broadly classified as security capacity of the recipient states. The report found that we have a multiplicity of programs spread across different departments and agencies where there may or may not be coordination in resourcing and execution. A lack of coordination could easily lead to duplication of effort and waste of resources that would be better spent elsewhere. As the combatant commander, what would you do to coordinate efforts with our diplomatic missions and other Federal agencies to ensure duplication is not occurring?

General RODRIGUEZ. Cross agency communication is key and may identify duplication of programs. Communication between agencies can be difficult at times, but it is a challenge that is solvable by understanding the cultures of the different U.S. agencies and by demonstrating our willingness to share relevant information between the African Union and other entities with equities on the continent. Being a good steward of resources, particularly in our fiscally uncertain environment, is essential. To accomplish this goal requires close coordination and that will be one of my priorities as Commander, AFRICOM.

4. Senator MCCASKILL. General Rodriguez, in your response to the advance policy questions, you said: "AFRICOM's responsibilities reflect a new and evolving focus on building partner operational and institutional capacity at the country and regional levels and supporting the efforts of other U.S. Government agencies in the area of responsibility (AOR)." While many at the Department of State (DOS) and U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) welcome the ability of DOD to leverage resources and to organize complex operations, there also is concern that the military may overestimate its capabilities as well as its diplomatic role, or pursue activities that are not a core part of its mandate. The highly unequal allocation of resources between DOD, DOS, and USAID could hinder their ability to act as equal partners and could lead to the militarization of development and diplomacy. Do you believe there is a danger in over-emphasizing the U.S. military presence in Africa?

General RODRIGUEZ. Since inception of AFRICOM in October 2008, all agencies of the U.S. Government have remained sensitive to this concern and have operated with a light footprint on the continent. Regarding Department of Defense (DOD) operations with other U.S. Government agencies, I believe DOD and the AFRICOM component commands must thoroughly understand the culture of those agencies—particularly DOS and USAID—and employ that understanding during planning sessions and during execution of programs and theater security cooperation events. It is very important not to militarize development activity or diplomacy.

5. Senator MCCASKILL. General Rodriguez, how will you balance our military presence in Africa with the diplomatic and development responsibilities of DOS and USAID?

General RODRIGUEZ. The U.S. Ambassadors are the lead for U.S. diplomatic, informational, military, and economic development in each African nation. AFRICOM fully supports the Ambassadors and DOS to ensure a balanced and synchronized effort between diplomatic, development, and military presence in African nations. It is imperative that we work together as a whole-of-government team as we engage African nations. Messaging to the governments and people of the continent will continue to emphasize our support to African nations. Traditional U.S. military engagement strategy has been grounded in threat-based analysis. To meet its growing responsibilities in the even more complex African context, the Command will compliment this traditional analytic framework with a partnership-based approach. To do this, we should use our military capabilities in a supporting role with the interagency team to find ways to help our partners build resilient, democratic security institutions.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOE MANCHIN III

MALI

6. Senator MANCHIN. General Rodriguez, the AFRICOM AOR has become a front line in the fight against al Qaeda and other terrorist groups. I am particularly concerned the emergence of al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) in Mali. French and Malian forces have made great strides over the past month in driving AQIM out of areas they held in northern Mali, but the French have announced they are leaving soon. How can the United States best support preserving these gains without investing troops or considerable resources?

General RODRIGUEZ. The most effective way to preserve the gains in Mali is through a strong, functional Mali Government. We should continue to support African nations, the Africa Union, African regional organizations, the European Union, and the United Nations where we have common objectives. Building the capacity and supporting these organizations provide African and international solutions to Africa's problems.

SOUTH SUDAN

7. Senator MANCHIN. General Rodriguez, South Sudan is the world's newest country and faces a number of internal and external security challenges. Can you describe the status of our military-to-military relationship with South Sudan?

General RODRIGUEZ. The U.S. Ambassador to South Sudan has called for a limited introduction of our Security Force Assistance (SFA) program pending improvement in certain issue areas, including: (1) concern over the government of South Sudan's progress on advancing democratic principles; (2) concern about the Government of South Sudan's ability to absorb our assistance while key border security issues remain unresolved with the north; and, (3) Embassy Juba's limited capacity to support U.S. servicemembers in the austere Juba environment.

Our military-to-military relationship with the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA) is in the initial stage. Through effective use of the International Military Education and Training (IMET) Program, dozens of SPLA students have attended DOD schools in the United States ranging from infantry officer basic training to engineer, medical, and judge advocate general courses. An SPLA brigadier general is scheduled to attend the U.S. Army War College this year. These alumni will form the basis of our engagement activities within the framework of our comprehensive Security Force Assistance (SFA) Program. This SFA Program emphasizes development of the defense sector at the institutional level for enduring effects. Additionally, AFRICOM is planning to conduct limited medical and engineering civic action projects in the next few months with the SPLA.

8. Senator MANCHIN. General Rodriguez, as this relationship evolves, how you will ensure that human rights are an important part of any military-to-military engagement with South Sudan?

General RODRIGUEZ. Human rights related content—including the rule of law, civilian control of the military, and code of conduct—are key ingredients infused into every engagement with the Sudan People's Liberation Army. Our Security Force Assistance (SFA) Program includes a priority package of education and mentorship aimed at assisting in the development of defense sector institutions that will establish, foster, and enforce laws, codes, and principles related to discipline of the force, hierarchy of command, and rules of engagement. Our SFA package also includes ways and means to professionalize and establish capability and capacity of key functions within the military such as a judge advocate general corps, military police and inspector general.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JEANNE SHAHEEN

U.S. AFRICA COMMAND GOALS

9. Senator SHAHEEN. General Rodriguez, Dr. Cynthia Watson, a professor at the National War College, stated, "Africa Command hopes to avoid that traditional combatant command goals of warfighting in favor of war prevention, making its orientation quite different from other parallel organizations." Do you agree with this assessment?

General RODRIGUEZ. I believe prevention of war is the foremost goal of all combatant commands. The strategic environment will dictate the amount of emphasis placed on war prevention versus warfighting. AFRICOM protects and defends the national security interests of the United States by strengthening the defense capabilities of African states and regional organizations and, when directed, conducts military operations, in order to deter and defeat transnational threats and to provide a security environment conducive to good governance and development. We need to be ready to do both.

10. Senator SHAHEEN. General Rodriguez, do you think that this mission focus prohibited AFRICOM from being able to respond to the Benghazi incident?

General RODRIGUEZ. There are a number of lessons learned from Benghazi that must be considered. We should continue to conduct close coordination with DOS and our other interagency partners on the African continent to ensure a common understanding of the risk associated with the complex threat environment such as that in Libya. We should continue to work as a team to refine intelligence, reduce the intelligence gap through better collaboration, prioritizing threats, and allocating resources to collect on those threats.

Also, we should review the interagency process between the DOD and DOS to identify security risks and understand DOD response options to inform DOS security planning and decisionmaking. Regional response forces like the Commanders In-extremis Force, Army Regionally Aligned Forces, and the Special Marines Air-Ground Task Force are also part of the solution in some areas.

I understand AFRICOM is reviewing security assistance and military-to-military programs to ensure they are best tailored to build host nation capacity where required. Collaborative efforts to improve Embassy security are ongoing.

11. Senator SHAHEEN. General Rodriguez, do you think that AFRICOM's emphasis on building partnerships will shift as the emerging terrorist threat increases?

General RODRIGUEZ. Traditional U.S. military engagement strategy has been grounded in threat-based analysis. To meet its growing responsibilities in the increasingly complex African context, AFRICOM will compliment this traditional analytic framework with a partnership-based approach. To do this, we will use our military capabilities in a supporting role with our interagency team to find ways to help our partners build resilient security institutions that are committed to democratic ideals.

INTELLIGENCE, SURVEILLANCE, AND RECONNAISSANCE CAPABILITY

12. Senator SHAHEEN. General Rodriguez, the current AFRICOM Commander has previously testified that intelligence and surveillance continue to be a challenge and that more assets are needed. If confirmed, what do you intend to do to ensure that AFRICOM has the appropriate intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) capability?

General RODRIGUEZ. I will advocate for prioritization of AFRICOM ISR requirements to support current operations and likely future mission areas. With potential for receiving additional ISR assets, I will engage African partner nations for overflight, refueling and temporary operating location options. It is also important to invest in enhancing African nations ISR capabilities as well as information and intelligence sharing to improve overall understanding of the environment.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

MARINE CORPS IN U.S. AFRICA COMMAND

13. Senator BLUMENTHAL. General Rodriguez, last week we heard from General Dempsey of the challenges posed by improving our response capabilities in Africa, where there are limited base rights and access. It is my understanding that the United States no longer maintains an amphibious ready group in the Mediterranean Sea, and this is before sequestration. If confirmed, will you look at making better use of the Marine Corps' ability to respond to crises in North Africa, conduct noncombatant evacuations, and maintain a rapid response capability with forward deployed forces?

General RODRIGUEZ. I will continue to refine the posture of our U.S. Marine Corps Special Purpose Marine Air and Ground Task Force and other Marine assets as required to respond to crises in North Africa, conduct non-combatant evacuations, and maintain a rapid response capability with forward deployed forces. I would add that it is important for any combatant commander to consider the full range of Department of Defense and other agency capabilities available for operational support missions.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

SURVEILLANCE IN AFRICA COMMAND

14. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Rodriguez, AFRICOM receives only about 7 percent of its total ISR requirements. However, in response to the recent attack in North Africa, AFRICOM is currently getting about 50 percent of its stated need for ISR in North Africa. With the downsizing of military forces and assets, AFRICOM is sure to not get this percentage of ISR in the future. How will you, as a commander, ensure that AFRICOM will accomplish its mission without a robust ISR capability in the near future?

General RODRIGUEZ. I will evaluate current operational requirements, along with possible risk, and prioritize remaining ISR capabilities to optimize support to mission execution. In addition, with the downsizing of military forces and assets we can expect a reprioritization of ISR assets by the U.S. Government and I will work to ensure that AFRICOM's requirements are addressed by Department of Defense and the U.S. Intelligence Community. It is also important to invest in enhancing African nations ISR capabilities as well as information and intelligence sharing to improve overall understanding of the environment.

15. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Rodriguez, with so much territory uncovered with ISR, what other actions will you take to ensure a presence throughout the region?

General RODRIGUEZ. I will pursue additional presence and optimization of current presence across the continent by engaging African partner nations for key temporary stationing locations that provide increased flexibility for ISR asset tasking, maximizing potential support to missions. It is also important to invest in enhancing African nations ISR capabilities as well as information and intelligence sharing to improve overall understanding of the environment.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

SURVEILLANCE IN AFRICA COMMAND

16. Senator AYOTTE. General Rodriguez, in your advance policy questions, you mentioned that AFRICOM only received about 7 percent of its total ISR requirements. That number has increased to 50 percent now. Based on all of the previous attacks on U.S. and other western targets in Benghazi in the months preceding the September 11, 2012, attack that left four Americans dead, do you believe more than 7 percent of AFRICOM's ISR requirements should have been met?

General RODRIGUEZ. I believe the ISR requirements for Africa are high and increasing at a very fast rate. I will ensure AFRICOM's requirements compete for ISR assets with the other combatant commands. ISR assets are low density, high demand capabilities, and are allocated based on national priorities.

17. Senator AYOTTE. General Rodriguez, while the increase for 50 percent is a positive step, do you have concerns that half of our ISR requirements are not being met?

General RODRIGUEZ. The demand for ISR capabilities has increased significantly over the past decade. It is rare that ISR supply meets the demand. Thus, I will continue to address AFRICOM's requirements for ISR capabilities through the Joint Staff's request for forces and capabilities system and prioritize the employment of ISR assets AFRICOM receives. It is also important to invest in enhancing African nations ISR capabilities as well as information and intelligence sharing to improve overall understanding of the environment.

18. Senator AYOTTE. General Rodriguez, do you believe that DOD is providing AFRICOM sufficient ISR assets to meet the objectives that the Joint Staff has given AFRICOM?

General RODRIGUEZ. AFRICOM must compete with other combatant commands for America's relatively scarce ISR assets. While not unique to AFRICOM, infrastructure for supporting ISR operations and over-flight rights of African nations are also considerations. Upon assuming command of AFRICOM, I will closely review AFRICOM's ISR requirements and shortfalls in order to prioritize employment and mitigate risk as best we can.

BOCO HARAM

19. Senator AYOTTE. General Rodriguez, do you believe Boco Haram is a terrorist organization?

General RODRIGUEZ. Boco Haram has committed some acts that can be associated with terrorism. Designating Boco Haram as a terrorist organization is a policy decision. I will study this issue and make my recommendation on whether Boco Haram should be classified as a terrorist organization.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody.

This morning the committee considers the nomination of Alan Estevez to be Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics; Frederick Vollrath to be Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management; and Eric Fanning to be Under Secretary of the Air Force.

Mr. Estevez, Mr. Vollrath, Mr. Fanning, we welcome you all. All three of our nominees have demonstrated their commitment to public service throughout their careers. We appreciate your continuing willingness to serve, and we appreciate the support that your families provide which is so essential to your success, as you well know. As is our custom, during your introductory remarks, your statements, please feel free to introduce any family members or friends that you have with you here today.

Our witnesses today are nominated for policy positions that deal with some of the most complex challenges confronting the Department of Defense (DOD).

The Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics will be a key participant in major decisions affecting the hundreds of billions of dollars that DOD spends every year to acquire property and services. If confirmed, Mr. Estevez will share responsibility for a broad array of functions, including developmental testing, contract administration, logistics and materiel readiness, installations and environment, operational energy, the acquisition workforce, the defense industrial base, and efforts to increase the Department's buying power and improve the performance of the defense acquisition enterprise.

Mr. Vollrath has been nominated to be Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management, responsible for developing policies, providing advice, and making recommendations to the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness in the areas of civilian and military personnel policy, readiness of the force, and military community and family policy. Additionally, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management is responsible for allocating assigned resources and providing oversight of subordinate activities, including the overall day-to-day supervision of the Department of Defense Education Activity and the Defense Commissary Agency.

Mr. Fanning has been nominated to be Under Secretary of the Air Force, the second highest civilian position in the Air Force. The Under Secretary of the Air Force assists the Secretary of the Air Force in organizing, training, equipping, and providing for the welfare of its more than 333,000 Active Duty men and women, 178,000 Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve members, 182,000 civilians, and their families. He also oversees the Air Force's annual budget of more than $110 billion and serves as Acting Secretary of the Air Force in the Secretary's absence. As Under Secretary, Mr. Fanning would also serve as the Chief Management Officer of the Air Force.

These three nominations come before this committee at a time of unprecedented turbulence. Just last week, we held a hearing on the impacts of sequestration and a full-year Continuing Resolution (CR). We found that if these events come to pass, which looks more and more likely, the negative impact on the Department of Defense will be huge.

The Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, the Comptroller, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff all testified to the severe and significant issues that sequestration and a full-year Continuing Resolution will bring to each Service. While we hope an 11th hour solution can be found, we are pleased to see that individuals of the caliber of the witnesses and nominees before us today are willing to step into this maelstrom and serve in these important capacities. The challenges will be great and the tasks even more difficult than they are currently.

Over the next few weeks, the committee will hold a series of important hearings. Next Tuesday, we will hear from the commanders of U.S. Central Command and U.S. Special Operations Command. Next Thursday, a week from today, we will hear from U.S. Africa Command and U.S. Transportation Command. The following Tuesday, March 12, 2013, we will hear from U.S. Strategic Command and U.S. Cyber Command.

At the same time that we are doing this at a full committee level, our subcommittees are beginning to plan their hearing schedules for the year. In particular, the Personnel Subcommittee will hold a hearing on sexual assault in the military on March 13, 2013. I am very pleased that Senators Gillibrand and Graham are addressing this extraordinarily important issue. Our servicemembers, men and women, deserve an environment where they are not subjected to sexual harassment and sexual assaults. All members of our committee—and I just talked to Senator Gillibrand about this—whether they are members of that subcommittee or not are welcome to attend and participate, and I thank Senator Gillibrand for that.

All our witnesses this morning bring strong qualifications to the positions for which they have been nominated. I look forward to their testimony, to the answers that they provide to our members during questioning. I hope the committee can act promptly to confirm these nominees.

Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I join you in welcoming the nominees here this morning.

Overshadowing everything that is going on right now, as the chairman said is the sequestration thing, which we have had the Chiefs in here and we have had everyone coming in and talking about the disastrous things that we are facing. Today is the day, however, that we will actually be voting on a couple of bills that will have to do with it.

I would be remiss if I did not mention that one of the alternatives we have had began 5 weeks ago, Mr. Chairman. I contacted all the Chiefs, all five Chiefs of the Services, and said, if this becomes reality and we are going to be faced with this, how much could be mitigated? If you take the same top line and if you had the ability to make adjustments within each Service, what could you do? They said, it would put us light years in better shape than if we just had to take cuts across the board. I did not think we would get to that point, but we are there today. That is one of the alternatives that we will be discussing.

Mr. Estevez, for too long, the way the Department has developed and procured weapons systems has been riddled with waste and inefficiency. We have talked about that for as many years as I have been up here. Recent legislative efforts such as the Weapons Systems Reform Act have put in place much needed reforms. Yet, given reductions in the defense budget and the threat of sequestration, it is more important now than ever that dollars used to equip our military are spent wisely. This will require the Department to define program risks. Risks are things that people do not like to talk about because risks translates into readiness and translates into deaths. We need to be addressing these things now, and most importantly, the Department is going to have to develop a culture of accountability for all programs.

Mr. Vollrath, through our military forces, although they remain resilient, 11 years of sustained combat operations have left them battered. We talk about the suicide problems. I spent the better part of a day last week out at Bethesda, at Walter Reed. I was just overwhelmed with the really good job that people are doing out there, and it may be the only place that is not impacted by the constraints that the rest of the military is under. I know that you will be interested in that and keeping the fine work going, as it has been.

Mr. Fanning, over the last 10 years, the Air Force has retired nearly 1,900 aircraft and reduced its Active Duty end strength to approximately 329,000 airmen, making it older and smaller than at any time since its inception in 1947. While service life extension programs and modifications have kept our Air Force flying, the cost to operate and sustain these aircraft continues to rise. It is something that we have been dealing with for as long as I have been on both the House Armed Services Committee and this committee.

It is a challenge and I am sure that you are, all three, up to these challenges, and I look forward to working with you and to hearing your testimony.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

Now, we will first call on Mr. Estevez.

STATEMENT OF HON. ALAN F. ESTEVEZ, TO BE PRINCIPAL DEPUTY UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE FOR ACQUISITION, TECHNOLOGY, AND LOGISTICS

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Thank you and good morning, Chairman Levin, Ranking Member Inhofe, members of the committee.

I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before you today. I appreciate the great support that this committee provides to our military.

I am honored that the President has nominated me for the position of Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics. I would like to thank President Obama for his trust and belief in my abilities to serve the Department.

I would also like to thank Secretary Panetta, Deputy Secretary Carter, and Under Secretary Kendall for their support of my nomination.

I am joined here today by my wife, Susan Pearson, and my sisters, Sue Ann and Pamela. I want to thank Susan for her continued support and sacrifice and her willingness to let me serve. As I noted in my confirmation hearing for my current position, without Susan's sage advice and counsel I would not be sitting here today. I am thrilled that my sisters were able to come down from New York and New Jersey to join me here today.

Chairman LEVIN. We welcome them all. I am sure they are thrilled to be here.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I hope so.

Chairman LEVIN. We will get a report from them in a couple hours. [Laughter.]

Mr. ESTEVEZ. As the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Materiel Readiness, it has been my privilege to support the Nation's men and women in uniform by providing world-class logistics capabilities. In the last 2 years, our defense logistics system has surged and sustained forces in two wars, successfully completed the drawdown of our forces and equipment in Iraq, and is in the process of supporting the drawdown and transition phase in Afghanistan.

I have had the opportunity to take numerous trips to Afghanistan over the last 4 years, and I have witnessed firsthand the magnificent efforts of our deployed forces. They continue to inspire me and I will be honored to continue to support them if I am confirmed for this position.

While most citizens do not realize it, the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics makes an impact on the everyday lives of the citizens of the United States primarily by acquiring the best technology and capabilities to enable our warfighters to protect this Nation but also, as was recently shown, by aiding the American people in the aftermath of natural disasters such as Superstorm Sandy. If confirmed, I will execute my duties to make sure that the American people are continually supported by the Department of Defense.

I would again like to thank this committee for asking me here today, and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, Mr. Estevez.

Mr. Vollrath.

STATEMENT OF MR. FREDERICK E. VOLLRATH TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE FOR READINESS AND FORCE MANAGEMENT

Mr. VOLLRATH. Good morning, Chairman Levin, Ranking Member Inhofe, and members of the committee.

I am honored to appear before you today.

I appreciate the confidence that President Obama has expressed in nominating me to be the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management, and I am grateful to Secretary Panetta for supporting that nomination.

It has been a great honor and privilege for me to have served our Nation in the U.S. Army wearing that uniform for 35 years and currently as the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management.

The position of Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management for which I have been nominated is a new position created by the Department pursuant to the authority provided in the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2010. It has also been my privilege to be the first individual nominated by the President to fill this very important role. During the past 11 months, I have also had the added responsibility of standing up the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense while serving as the Principal Deputy.

I have over 40 years of human resource management and executive leadership experience and bring with me the unique perspective of having both government and nongovernment human resource experience. During my career, I have seen many changes in our military and fully understand the importance of maintaining a ready force, especially during these critical fiscal uncertain times. If confirmed, I will use this experience to aggressively take on the challenges of this office.

I am grateful to the members of this committee and to all Members of Congress for the support they have given to our men and women in uniform and their families. If confirmed, I pledge to you that I will work diligently on behalf of our Nation's servicemembers, their families, and our civilian workforce that supports them. I am deeply honored to have the opportunity to continue my service to this great Nation.

I look forward to your questions. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, Mr. Vollrath.

Mr. Fanning.

STATEMENT OF MR. ERIC K. FANNING TO BE UNDER SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE

Mr. FANNING. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Inhofe, members of the committee. It is an honor to appear before you today.

I would like to thank President Obama for nominating me and the Secretary of Defense for supporting this opportunity to serve. If confirmed, I greatly look forward to working with them and with this committee as well.

Nobody gets the opportunity to serve in positions like this without the help of many people over a very long period of time. I am fortunate to have many of them here with me today, dating all the way back to college and including Larry Smith, who hired me out of college into my first job on the House Armed Services Committee, through my later work at the Pentagon and at Business Executives for National Security. He has been an important friend and mentor to me ever since. Thank you to them and all the others here today to support me.

My mother had planned on attending, but as of late is unable to travel. I know she is watching from Florida.

I come from a family with a long history of service in uniform. Two uncles graduated from West Point and made careers in the Army. Another uncle served a career in the Air Force. My cousin flew helicopters in the Marine Corps. I learned from an early age the importance of service and developed early on a deep respect and admiration for those who serve in uniform.

The Air Force faces many challenges well known by this committee but is a proud organization with a rich history. Its greatest strength, of course, is its people, almost 700,000 Active Duty, National Guard, Reserve, and civilians who make up the Air Force, along with their families. I have been immensely proud to serve these last 4 years with the men and women of the Navy and Marine Corps, and if confirmed, I very much look forward to becoming a part of the Air Force family. It would be my honor to play a role in making sure that the best men and women our country has to offer get all the support they need in undertaking the mission of defending our country, a mission for which they freely volunteered.

Thank you again for considering my nomination. Thank you for your service, and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much.

Let me now ask you the standard questions that we ask of all nominees. You can answer together. This is a matter of exercising our legislative and our oversight responsibilities, and that is the reason for these questions.

Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes.

Mr. FANNING. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. No.

Mr. VOLLRATH. No.

Mr. FANNING. No.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you ensure that your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes.

Mr. FANNING. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes.

Mr. FANNING. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or their briefings?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes.

Mr. FANNING. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes.

Mr. FANNING. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes.

Mr. FANNING. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. We will have an 8-minute first round of questions here, and let me start with you, Mr. Estevez.

We have millions of pieces of equipment in Afghanistan, and we have a logistical challenge of great size as our forces draw down. Key to the ability to remove this equipment is whether we are going to have access to ground lines in Pakistan and along the Northern Distribution Network through Central Asia. Can you give us your assessment on the level of cooperation that we are getting now from Pakistan on the retrograde of military equipment through Pakistan?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, Senator. Right now we are getting excellent cooperation with Pakistan. We have a number of proof of principles, as we call them, to move equipment through Pakistan. They are ongoing right now. Two of them have been successfully completed. The purpose of these is to hone out the processes with the Pakistanis, with their customs enforcement, with their port agencies, and with their trucking companies in order to facilitate an increased volume of those movements. But slow, steady progress.

Chairman LEVIN. All right. So it is not just a contract agreement or a written agreement to open up these lines? It is actually now happening. Is that correct?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. Mr. Estevez, in response to the committee's advance policy questions, you stated that you do not believe that fixed-price development contracts are appropriate because "most major weapons systems deal with maturing designs and significant integration problems, and a fixed-price development contract imposes too much risk on industry".

Now, we just adopted a defense authorization act which in section 818 says the following that, "The conferees believe that program risks should be reduced to the degree that the use of a fixed-price development contract for a major acquisition system may be appropriate." Our Senate committee report on this provision explains that both the cost to the Government in using cost reimbursement contracts too far into the development and the importance of reducing program risk prior to a Milestone B decision by avoiding the incorporation of immature technologies is very important. We have to do that.

I am not going to ask you a question now, but I would ask you to reevaluate, when you are confirmed, the position that you took in response to our advance policy questions in light of our law which we have now passed, section 818 and the committee report on the provision, and then get back to us. Will you do that?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I certainly will, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you also get back to us on the question of contract services? Because we are going to need to do a lot more to understand and control spending on contract services. Contract services cost us about $200 billion a year, which is about as much as we spend on all products combined, including major weapons systems.

I would also ask you, within the first, say, 60 days that you are in office, will you give us a report on the steps which you are going to take to address the question of controlling spending on contract services?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Absolutely, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. Mr. Vollrath, I would like to ask you about the threat of sequestration on personnel. Can you describe for us the impact of sequestration on, just to give one example, the Services' transition assistance programs?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Certainly, Senator. The sequestration will result most likely in furloughs of the civilian workforce for a period of up to 22 days for the remainder of the year. The approximately 20 percent reduction in time from that civilian workforce will have an effect on the transition services that are required by the law, and we will have to do a significant job of scheduling to make sure that all servicemembers get the required transition training and experience. Right now, it appears that that may be possible.

Chairman LEVIN. We hope it is possible, but obviously there is going to be huge pressure. We cannot make cuts of that nature without an effect. Would you agree with that?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes, Senator, absolutely.

Chairman LEVIN. By the way, I want to invite you to visit a college in Lansing, MI, the Lansing Community College, which has I think the most extraordinary program that I have seen to transition people into actual jobs which are available using the experience that they have and smoothing the way towards a civilian job by dealing with the regulatory agencies that exist on the civilian side. For instance, this program takes medics that come out of the military and has it all planned so that the State regulatory agencies with their certification requirements give credit for the service performed while in the Service so that they can much more quickly become medical technicians, for instance, and then registered nurses. I would like you to come and visit that program which I think may be unique in the country.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, given the opportunity, I most certainly will do that because we have had a full court press on trying to get the civilian sector particularly in all States to accept the credentials that service men and women acquire while on Active Duty.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Now, Mr. Vollrath, Senator Gillibrand, as I mentioned before, is going to have a hearing in her subcommittee on sexual assaults. I just want to let you know that when she does that at the subcommittee level, she and Senator Graham are going to be speaking for the full committee when that happens. This is something which is simply such an outrage for this to continue to occur that it must be at the top of the agenda when you take over responsibility.

For instance, the Air Force is currently addressing a number of sexual misconduct cases arising out of basic training at Lackland Air Force Base, and at last count, sexual misconduct allegations have been made against 32 military training instructors involving 62 victims. Mr. Fanning, can you give us your thoughts as to what must be done in this area?

Mr. FANNING. Thank you, Senator.

Any instance of sexual assault is too many, and I think that leadership across the Department of Defense has to remain committed to preventing this from happening in the first place. I believe that we are seeing a marked increase in what the Department is trying to do to combat sexual assault. If confirmed into the Air Force, it would be an absolute priority of mine to continue those efforts and work with Secretary Donley and General Welsh in that regard.

I think we need, first and foremost, as I said, to focus on preventing these from ever happening, but if they do, we need to ensure that victims of sexual assault have a safe place to report those assaults and have all the assistance that they need, medical, mental health, and legal. Finally, we need to make sure that perpetrators are held to account for their crimes.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Vollrath, you heard the comments that I made about my experience last week at Walter Reed. Have you had an opportunity to—I am sure you have over a period of time—to see the development, the progress, the magnificent results that we are getting over there? If you have seen that, what are your ideas on continuing that, and do you see that that is going to be threatened in any way by sequestration?

Mr. VOLLRATH. In the near term, Senator, I believe sequestration will have some impact on it. In my particular portfolio and position, we work closely with the health affairs side to leverage all of the capabilities that they have developed and reach out to the civilian community because the effort is not just and the solution is not just within the Department of Defense. We need to leverage all resources.

Senator INHOFE. Yes. When you say that it could affect it adversely now, do you have anything specific in mind? I am just wondering what areas it could be adversely affected.

Mr. VOLLRATH. To the degree that the civilian workforce is there for their support, given that the majority of the medical care is provided by the uniformed services, the support element will degrade some of that service.

Senator INHOFE. Okay.

The chairman asked you the question about the civilian employees, the furloughing. In my State alone, we are estimating about 24,000 people. It is a huge number and we are concerned about it and you did respond. But if sequestration occurs, what would DOD and the Air Force do to minimize the impact on civilian employees? Is there anything, any ideas, you have now to try to minimize the negative impact that we are having right now with people? In my State, just knowing it is going to happen is something that has been pretty critical.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, we do not have any silver bullet to spend to minimize the impact on the civilian workforce. I wish we did. Potentially if we could move money around, that might assist. But what we have done is to make sure that we do not take out most of the sequestration or the reductions on the back of the civilian workforce.

Senator INHOFE. They were pretty optimistic out there in that they felt the good job they are doing—and I like to stand behind them in minimizing any of the negative impact. If you are confirmed, I would like to be kept up to date as to anything that might affect that.

Mr. Fanning, the Government Accountability Office (GAO)—first of all, I was wondering how you are juggling this thing, coming from the Navy and going into the Air Force. In your opening statement, I was very impressed. You have that close, intimate connection with both the Army, the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Air Force. I guess you would fit in about any place.

There was something that I was interested in when GAO recently released a report entitled "The Depot Maintenance Additional Information Needed to Meet DOD's Core Capability Reporting Requirements." The report cited the Air Force for not having an explanation for a sufficient plan organic—that is, internal—depot workload to meet these core requirements. The report specifically cited certain Air Force shortfalls and plans to mitigate them by assigning work to Air Force depots to support existing and new weapons systems such as unmanned aerial systems, munitions, and the F–35. Have you had a chance to look at that report and that particular area that I have just quoted?

Mr. FANNING. No, Senator. I have not yet seen that GAO report although I do appreciate the proper balance in depots between organic and contractor.

Senator INHOFE. Yes. This actually goes a little bit further than that because it talks about the mix has not been quite as accurate as it should have been or equitable as it should have been in the past, and it makes specific recommendations.

What I would like to have you do is provide to me where the Air Force has identified depot work shortfalls and the specifics. I would like to ask you to read that in the next short period of time so that we could actually have a discussion as to what your feelings are going to be on that. Would you do that for us?

Mr. FANNING. Absolutely, Senator.

[The information referred to follows:]

The Air Force reported shortfalls in Core sustaining workloads in the two areas: (1) Communications/Electronics Equipment; and (2) Ordnance, Weapons and Missiles. As new weapon systems are fielded such as MQ–1, MQ–9, KC–46, and F–35, these workloads will be established organically to specifically address core shortfalls in these and in any areas identified in future Core analyses. The report stated that the Air Force would mitigate the shortfall through incrementally assigning maintenance work to organic (military) depots for the MQ–1 and MQ–9 between the third quarters of fiscal year 2012 through fiscal year 2016. The workloads for these systems have been assigned to the Air Logistic Complexes and standup of the workloads is being accomplished with depot activation teams composed of members from the appropriate program office, depot and industry original equipment manufacturer. The depot activation teams ensure the necessary facilities, equipment and personnel are acquired and installed at the organic depots to execute the planned workload. The Air Force has budgeted for and received funds to activate MQ–1, MQ–9, and F–35 workloads. The program offices for these systems are working on plans to activate core workloads no later than initial operating capability (IOC) plus 4 years and in many instances earlier than required. For example, the F–35 is activating the airframe at Ogden Air Logistics Center (ALC), the engine at Tinker ALC and electronics/communication at Robins ALC while the program is still in low rate production, well before IOC. The MQ–1 and MQ–9 program office is actively standing up workloads at all three Air Force Logistics Complexes and at Navy and Army depots to satisfy Department Core requirements. These programs and others have programmed for depot activation and are working diligently to ensure the Air Force has the organic capability required to sustain the warfighter.

Senator INHOFE. Okay, good.

Mr. Estevez, I have expressed concern that wide-ranging authorities contained in the Defense Production Act are being used by the Department of Defense to spend $170 million for the design and construction of a commercial biofuels refinery. On February 6, 2013, the same day the Secretary of Defense announced that the Truman carrier group would not be deploying to the Middle East due to budget cuts, we received a letter from Frank Kendall, the Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics, announcing the Department's intent to spend $30 million on the advance drop-in biofuels production used by the Defense Production Act.

I am sure that you have heard a lot of this, including the Senator that was sitting to my left and myself talking about the concern that we have with the budget shortfalls, with the disasters that are taking place right now, how we could be experimenting in biofuels and even talk about the construction of refineries in terms of prioritizing. I would like to have your thoughts about that. Is that the best use of defense funds?

As I remember when they started the Department of Energy, that is one of the things that they were supposed to be doing. Do you have any thoughts on that?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I do, Senator. Thank you.

When you look across our energy investments, the vast majority, 96 percent of our energy investments, go to things like better engine technology, increasing range, increasing fuel capability on things like jets, tanks, and the like so that we are decreasing our demand, decreasing the need to put fuel out onto the battlefield. A small amount of that resource does go towards what we would call increasing the flexibility, increasing the resources that we can draw on, increasing the supply. The $30 million would go to that. We are assessing the responses we have on our request for information from industry on that. Under the sequestration and budget environment that we are operating under, obviously every investment will have to be looked at, but we think that the small amount that we are putting into that is a prudent investment for the future.

Senator INHOFE. We are talking about a lot more money than $30 million. We are talking about the acquisition in the case of the Navy. Mr. Fanning, maybe you have some background on this too. The 450,000 gallons that were procured for, I think it was—I am going by memory right now—I think $29 a gallon as opposed to $3 a gallon. You start doing the math on that and what the Air Force is doing now, it comes up to considerably more.

Here is what I would like. I do not want to put you on the spot now. But I would like to have you, for the record, to give me an evaluation, a justification as to those expenditures and relative to the other expenditures that directly affect our national defense, particularly in this time of sequestration. Would you do that?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I would be happy to do that, Senator.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you.

[The information referred to follows:]

I believe that the Department of Defense should continue its modest investment in alternative fuels. As one of the world's largest consumers of petroleum, the Department has an interest in diversification of fuel supplies as a hedge against potential supply disruptions, especially for our legacy fleet of ships and planes, which will be with us for decades to come. Over the next 5 years, 96 percent of the Department's funding to improve operational energy use is devoted to reducing the amount of fuel required for military operations. The remaining 4 percent is a relatively small but important investment in alternative fuels, which is a longer-term strategy for our energy security. Most of this investment ensures that our equipment can operate on a wide range of fuels, so we are prepared if and when alternative fuels become commercially available. As petroleum is a finite resource, we believe this to be a prudent investment, and we have been performing these types of activities since 2003.

The Department's primary alternative fuels goal is to ensure operational military readiness and further the flexibility of military operations through the ability to use multiple, reliable fuel sources. To help achieve this goal, we released the Department of Defense Alternative Fuels Policy for Operational Platforms in July 2012. The policy confirms that all investments are subject to rigorous, merit-based evaluation and that the Department will not make bulk purchases unless they are cost competitive with petroleum products. To date, the Department has only purchased relatively small test quantities of alternative fuels, which are used in testing, evaluation, or demonstration activities. These purchases are mostly prototypes and should not be equated with commercial fuels purchases. I will ensure that the Department complies with the existing internal policy.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Gillibrand.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thanks to each of our witnesses for their leadership and their service to our country. I am very grateful.

I am very concerned about the status and the well-being of the men and women who serve in our forces. I am very worried about the sexual assault rate estimated by the military at 19,000 a year. I am concerned about the suicide rate, almost one a day. I am concerned about hazing incidents. I am concerned about how we implement the repeal of Don't Ask/Don't Tell.

With regard to these issues, I would like to first ask Mr. Vollrath what he thinks in terms of how will you provide leadership on these issues to protect the force from hazing, from sexual assault, to prevent suicide. How do you look forward to addressing these policies?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Thank you, Senator.

First, to begin to resolve these issues in the long term, we need to ensure that we have reasonable policies in place, good communications over time that are effective so that all members of the Service understand the rules and the capabilities that they have to resolve their problems.

Let me talk about a case in point in suicide. Clearly we have not broken the code on suicide and suicide prevention. Period. We have not. What should we do and what are we doing?

One, establishing an office to focus and coordinate all of the efforts that have been taking place across all of the Services.

Two, ensure that we have a coordinated communication plan. That is different than just sending out notices or public service announcements periodically. It is similar to advertising, frequency and reach. You need a consistent message and a constant message for people to understand so that they are willing to change their behavior and the stigma associated with seeking help is overcome. I will ensure, upon confirmation, that that takes place.

Third, in all areas, we need to make sure that we do a better job of educating our leaders all the way to the lowest level as to the responsibilities that they have to take care of their members of their organizations all the time. It is not just at the captain level, the lieutenant level, or the mid-grade sergeant level. It is at the corporal level.

I believe that we can and will do a better job with the leadership, the communication, and changing and reinforcing that culture of care. That same statement and that same thrust and strategic direction will be employed across all of those areas that you mentioned, Senator.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you.

Another area that needs attention is the transition from Active Duty to veteran status because if you look at the indicators, suicide rates are even higher once they leave the military. If you look at the front page of the New York Times today when a woman has been sexually assaulted or has trauma experience while serving, the likelihood of her being homeless increases greatly once veteran status kicks in. I hope that you will also focus your attention on that transition, that very important time between transitioning from Active Duty to veteran status, to make sure our men and women do not suffer even after they leave the military.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, absolutely we will continue to do that.

Senator GILLIBRAND. One other personnel issue. We work very hard in this committee to ensure that children of our military men and women who have special needs, autism, among other special needs children, have the access to the resources they need for just the medical attention they need. We are seeing that the implementation of even that pilot program is not going smoothly. I would like your commitment that you will focus on this issue and make sure that those children receive the health care that they need.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, you have my commitment.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you.

An issue that has been challenging for all of us here in Congress has been the issue of cybersecurity. I am concerned that we do not have the capability to recruit all of the best and brightest within the cyber world to do the work that we need for cyber defense and other missions related to that.

For Mr. Fanning, I was very pleased to read in your pre-prepared questions and answers that you plan to provide direction for Air Force science and technology that will focus on operation in space and cyberspace domains, but I am very disappointed that there are significant budget cuts. How will you deal with these budget cuts? In particular, we have assets in New York at Rome Labs that will also see budget cuts. I do not see how you will meet your mission requirements with these kinds of cuts.

Mr. FANNING. Thank you, Senator.

Not having been confirmed, I am not fully briefed on what the Air Force's plans are in dealing with potential budget cuts. Difficult cuts will have to be made. Everything will have to be on the table. But cybersecurity, if confirmed, would be a priority of mine, both in making sure that we adequately resource cybersecurity needs but that we think creatively and with focus on how we build a cyber workforce. I agree with you. I think that is going to be a very difficult workforce to retain once we have recruited and trained it and it would be a priority of mine, if confirmed.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Estevez, as conventional warfare becomes more technology-based, how do you believe that we should retain the talent especially in the fields of information technology and cyber warfare that we are going to need, particularly when the private sector pays far more than the military can?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Of course, personnel is not my area of focus other than for the acquisition workforce. But in general, what we find is that people serve the Department of Defense and our Government out of a feel for a greater good, as I would say the folks sitting up here, as yourselves. We have to draw on that and then we have to ensure that we treat our workforce properly.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Mr. Vollrath, one suggestion and one thing to consider is, obviously, we have great flexibility with our National Guard and Reserve to recruit talent who are expert in other fields and work in other fields as their day jobs. Will you consider how you could possibly recruit National Guard and Reserve cyber experts or a cyber corps which could leverage some of the training and hiring from the private sector?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, absolutely. As we have looked at trying to develop and grow the cyber community necessary to man the various different units, use of the Reserve components has been critical to the long-term strategy to make this effective. We cannot do it without the Reserve Forces.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Moving to science and technical workforce issues, back to Mr. Estevez. What challenges do you see facing DOD and the research and development communities as they seek to attract entry, mid, and senior technical experts into their organizations?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Again, with our budget issues, it is going to become more difficult. It is an area of focus for us. There are some tools that we can use, including the use of temporary assignment of personnel through the Intergovernment Personnel Act (IPA) and individual augmentees. We use that extensively at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency to attract people who want to come and serve the Government and serve the Department for periods of time before they go back to their universities. Plus we draw on university talent.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Gillibrand.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank the witnesses for being here and their continued willingness to serve the country.

Mr. Fanning, a few months ago, the Air Force decided to kill a huge logistics supply chain management business system called the Expeditionary Combat Support System (ECSS) after sinking about $1 billion into the program, finding that another $1.1 billion would be needed to field just 25 percent of the promised capability and extracting from the taxpayers' total of a $1 billion investment less than $150 million in useful hardware and software.

Some of us on this committee, including the chairman and I, have been doing everything that we can to prevent the sequestration which we believe is devastating to our Nation's security. We believe our uniformed military, as well as the former Secretary of Defense who testified before this committee how devastating the effects would be.

How do I, Mr. Fanning, go tell the taxpayers of America in my State that the Air Force just wasted $1 billion on a program that obviously was a miserable failure? So far, do you know anybody who is responsible for that failure?

Mr. FANNING. I have not yet been briefed on the Air Force's lessons learned, but I have had an opportunity in my Navy position to watch the developments with this program. I approach all business information technology (IT) systems with a great deal of skepticism in the Department of Defense, and in the Department of the Navy, in fact, we stopped the development of a major personnel and pay system because we thought it was on track to not deliver what was promised and waste taxpayer funds.

I think what I see in ECSS that I see in many other programs is a rush to a material solution before non-material solutions or business process——

Senator MCCAIN. Has anybody been held responsible that you know of, Mr. Fanning?

Mr. FANNING. Not that I know of, no.

Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Estevez, anybody fired? Anybody removed from their position? Anybody said this is the person in charge that made this $1 billion—excuse me. We saved $150 million out of $1 billion.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I believe, Senator, and I would have to confirm this, that the prior program executive officer (PEO) and prior program manager were removed from their positions. They were not the people who were there when we killed the program. They were the people who were there that led to the program restructuring and led to the recommendation to kill.

Senator MCCAIN. I am sure you understand our frustration, which brings me to the F–35.

Lieutenant General Bogdan has a pretty good reputation before this committee. He was in charge of the tanker program which seems to be on track. Yet, a couple or a few days ago he said, "What I see Lockheed Martin and Pratt & Whitney doing today is behaving as if they are getting ready to sell me the very last F–35 and the very last engine and are trying to squeeze every nickel of that last F–35 and that last engine." The general told reporters, "I want them both to start behaving like they want to be around for 40 years. I want them to take on some of the risk of this program. I want them to invest in cost reductions. I want them to do the things that will build a better relationship. I'm not getting all that love yet." Then he said—asked if he had seen some improvement from the companies, are they getting better at a rate that I want them to see them getting better? He said no, not yet. Of course, now we know that with massive failures, massive cost overruns that Lockheed has earned a 7-percent profit since the program began in 2001.

Do you have any justification for that?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I cannot address the past. I can address where we are today.

Senator MCCAIN. You cannot address the past?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I cannot address what happened from 2001 until where I am today.

Senator MCCAIN. You cannot address that at all?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Senator, we have put new structures around that program. We have a new contracting process for that program. We now have a firm, fixed-price contract, incentive fee, 12 percent share. Lockheed will also pay the concurrency problems on that contract. So we have restructured the program. We brought in Admiral Venlet and now General Bogdan to run that program, two excellent PEOs, and we are working closely with Lockheed and Pratt to work through the problems that General Bogdan referenced in that news article.

Senator MCCAIN. So since 2001—and we are in 2013—we are beginning to work through the problem. Is that what I can tell my constituents, Mr. Secretary?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I believe you can over the last 4 or 5 years—5 years or so, we have restructured the program and we believe we are now on track to get a successful program.

Senator MCCAIN. Now, you are sitting here before this committee and you can tell us there will be no further cost overruns borne by the Federal Government?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I could not possibly do that, Senator.

Senator MCCAIN. Why can you not? Why can we not penalize companies for failure to live up to the obligations of their contracts?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. It is important to get the right structure of contract. Senator Levin——

Senator MCCAIN. After 12 years.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. On this particular airplane, I believe we do have the right structure of contract now and we will continue to get better contracts as we move into future development or production of this airplane.

Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Fanning or Mr. Vollrath, do you have any comments on this situation? By the way, the plane is grounded again, as we know, because of a crack in the engine. It is grounded again. Do you have any comments, Mr. Vollrath?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, I do not. I do not know enough to comment intelligently about it.

Senator MCCAIN. If I sound frustrated, I say to the witnesses it is because I am. This committee has been tracking this program for many years. We have had witness after witness. We have had promise after promise. We have had commitment after commitment. Yet, the only thing that has remained constant is that Lockheed has earned a 7 percent profit since the program began in 2012. Excuse me. Since the program began in 2001, 12 years later.

Maybe you can help me out. What am I supposed to go back and tell my constituents about a $1 billion program that the Air Force cancelled and, of course, the now most expensive weapons system in history that has now reached $1 trillion and the aircraft is now grounded? Do you have any ideas for me, Mr. Secretary?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Senator McCain, we are working very diligently, Secretary Carter, Secretary Kendall, myself, our leaders across the acquisition community to change the culture and change the processes by which we buy our programs. I know that you have been briefed on what we call Better Buying Power. That includes accountability for our PEOs and program managers. It includes managing affordability. It includes cost control so that we can change the way we do this.

Senator MCCAIN. According to one of the people who is very highly regarded by this committee because of his previous performance, General Bogdan says, are they getting better at a rate that I want to see them getting better? He said, no, not yet. I would say you have your work cut out for you.

I can just say that as strong an advocate as many of us are for maintaining a strong national security, you cannot continue these kinds of incredible, total loss of the taxpayers' dollars without there being an understandable backlash on the part of the taxpayers of America, which I believe will harm our ability to defend this Nation.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator McCain.

Before I call on Senator Donnelly, let me just tell you, Secretary Estevez, I share very deeply Senator McCain's frustration. We need answers. We need answers in addition to what Senator McCain pointed out. The folks who write the contracts, unless there is recoupment provided for from the contractors for failures, there is accountability lacking not just on the type of equipment itself, the production of that equipment, the failure of a contractor to produce something that works.

There is also perhaps failure on our part in terms of did we write contracts which did not provide for recoupment, and if there is failure there, where is there accountability inside the Department or the agency which wrote the contract which let contractors off the hook? There is a lack of accountability kind of up and down the line. This engine issue is just the most recent manifestation of it.

Senator McCain with his great initiative in this area is going to be—and I will be joining him—actively involved in this Expeditionary Combat Support System loss. Whether it is $850 million or $1 billion, it is just incredible. Where is the recoupment of that money? Why is that a loss to the Treasury instead of to the contractor? We need answers on that. It is in the middle of sequestration. It just dramatizes the problem, but this problem has been existing too long. Senator McCain and I and others on this committee and other committees have tried to rewrite laws. We have rewritten laws to provide more accountability, but we are going to be looking to you, Secretary Estevez, for answers.

Thank you.

Senator Donnelly.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

To all of you, thank you for your service to our country.

Mr. Fanning, with our National Guard and our Reserve members, they at times, obviously, are at home and are not part of serving at that point. What mental health resources does the Air Force have when they are at home, when they are not in the field and they are struggling with suicide and with mental health issues? Their alternative of going to see private care or going to talk to friends or whatever—how do we fill that hole so that they can still receive care, receive counseling when they are not on Active Duty pay status?

Mr. FANNING. Senator, I think the total force structure of the Air Force, which is something I am learning about now—it is different than what we were accustomed to in the Navy and Marine Corps—is a critical strategy for the Air Force. The Guard and Reserve are important partners with the Active component. From what I am told by the Air Force in my briefings by the Surgeon General, there are a multitude of services available for people who are not on Active Duty or who are remotely located.

If confirmed, I will look into this much more closely. I think one of the problems is making sure that those Guard members, those Reserve members who are not activated are aware of the services that are available to them. I think communication is one of the critical gaps in what we have in making sure that those individuals know what services are available.

Senator DONNELLY. If you could get further details for us because, obviously, just because their pay status has changed, their problems do not go away and their need for help does not go away. As you said, they may not know where to go for help or how to get it. So anything you can do in that process to let us know what the plans are, what the future plans are, we would appreciate.

Mr. FANNING. Absolutely.

[The information referred to follows:]

The Department of Defense, as a whole, is absolutely committed to the well-being of all our troops and personnel.

A number of resources exist for Air Force Reserve and Air National Guard members not on duty when they are struggling with suicidal thoughts and mental health issues.

The Air Force Reserve and Air National Guard are dedicated to developing a culture of resilience, by encouraging healthy lifestyles in four main areas known as Comprehensive Airmen Fitness: physical, mental, social, and spiritual. Airmen with strong physical, mental, social, and spiritual fitness have the ability to withstand, recover and even grow in the face of stressors and changing demands. By educating airmen and families about resources and focusing on the importance of the "wingman culture" and building meaningful relationships, airmen are encouraged to seek help before a crisis occurs.

The Air Force Reserve and Air National Guard provide education, outreach, and resources for families through unit leadership. Air Force regulations specifically direct unit commanders and first sergeants to proactively contact and provide support for family members of deploying Air Reserve component members. The unit commander also tasks various support agencies, including Airman and Family Readiness, to ensure that families are contacted and provided for.

The Yellow Ribbon Program offers resources on behavioral health issues and suicide mitigation and is offered to Reserve and Air National Guard airmen and their families predeployment, during deployment, and post deployment. Funded by Yellow Ribbon, the Psychological Health Advocacy Program (PHAP) is designed to assist Reserve airmen and their family members with a variety of needs, including mental health issues, financial assistance, relationship and family counseling, and substance abuse through referrals. There are three regional, four-person teams to support Reserve airmen and their families as well as provide 24/7, non-crisis telephone support. The Reserve PHAP staff attends all Yellow Ribbon events as well as provides outreach to the bases in their regions.

The Air National Guard Psychological Health Program (PHP) was developed to address psychological health needs of ANG airmen and their families. The PHP places a licensed behavioral health provider at each of the Air National Guard's 89 wings throughout the 54 States, territories, and the District of Columbia. The program provides three categories of service: leadership advisement and consultation; community capacity building; and direct services—to include assessment, referral, crisis intervention, and case management services that are available daily. The wing directors of Psychological Health are available 24/7 to operational leadership and provide services to Air National Guard airmen and their family members regardless of whether they are at home or on duty status.

The Air Force Reserve Wingman Toolkit is a broad-based Air Force Reserve initiative designed to empower airmen and their families to achieve and sustain wellness and balanced lifestyles using the four domains of Comprehensive Airman Fitness. The toolkit is located at: http://AFRC.WingmanToolkit.org. The website was first launched in 2010 and is accessible 24/7 from any computer by anyone with access to the internet. The Wingman Toolkit provides commanders, airmen, families, and friends (i.e., Air Force Reserve wingmen), access to a wide variety of resources, training opportunities, a dedicated Wingman Day page, promotion of the Ask, Care, Escort (A.C.E.) suicide intervention model, educational outreach materials, social media (Facebook, Twitter, Etc.), a mobile phone application, SMS texting capability ("WMTK" to 24587), inspirational and training videos, a YouTube page, and partnerships with other organizations. The Wingman Toolkit, in addition to annual wingman stand down days and the longstanding Air Force suicide prevention program, educates and equips airmen, commanders, first sergeants, co-workers, family members, and friends to proactively take care of themselves and avoid crises. It's also the first line of support in identifying airmen in need of assistance and prepares them to get to safer, healthier places.

Since Air Reserve component wingmen (e.g. family, friends) are often non-military personnel, the Air National Guard's Wingman Project provides information and resources for suicide prevention on publicly-accessible websites. The Air National Guard tailors marketing and resource materials for each State. The primary goal of the Wingman Project, located at http://wingmanproject.org, is to reduce warfighter, Department of Defense civilian, and family member suicides through human outreach, education, and media. The site provides education on how to intervene if someone is in emotional distress and provides tools and resources to target specific risk factors for suicide. The Wingman Project helps airmen actively engage in increasing wellness and preventing suicide. The Wingman Project has additionally published a mobile application which works on all smartphone platforms, and can be utilized to communicate in between drills, ACE training, and locating helping resources.

The Air Force Reserve has obtained additional Reserve pay funding to increase chaplain support to installations to help build unit resiliency and provide suicide prevention support during seasonal crisis times, for those bases who request additional support, and units with previous suicide incidents.

The Airman's Guide for Assisting Personnel in Distress (commander and airman versions) is a web-based tool available to all servicemembers, including Guard and Reserve, to provide vital information about the wide range of challenges, indications of distress, recommended supportive actions by peers and leaders, and links and contacts for additional resources. The tool facilitates leader involvement and can help resolve potentially volatile situations.

TRICARE Reserve Select is available for Reserve component airmen and their family members and provides coverage for both outpatient and inpatient treatment. Access to military medical care is available to servicemembers with duty related conditions through TRICARE and the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Airman & Family Readiness Program Managers (A&FRPMs) align family support capabilities with the Joint Family Program in the States to provide support to all servicemembers and their families, providing direct sustainment and support to their wings. Air Force Reserve Command and Air National Guard Family Readiness Programs are designed to maintain and support mission readiness by assisting servicemembers and families with adaptations to the challenges of the military lifestyle.

Vets4Warriors: 1–855–838–8255/1–855–VET–TALK. www.vets4warriors.com. This Toll-Free 24 hour helpline is available to servicemen and their families—peer counseling and support, telephone assessments, and referrals for mental health issues, to include suicidal thoughts.

Military OneSource is provided by the Department of Defense at no cost to active duty, Guard and Reserve servicemembers, and their families. It provides comprehensive information on every aspect of military life including deployment, reunion, relationships, grief, spouse employment and education, parenting and child care, and much more.

• Support 24/7, free and confidential resources for Air Reserve component members consultations on any number of issues such as spouse education and career opportunities, issues specific to families with a member with special needs, and financial support and resources.
• Offers personal non-medical counseling services online, via telephone, or face-to-face.
• Non-medical, short-term counseling, as well as assistance with financial management, taxes, career services, health and wellness, and much more.

The Department of Veterans Affairs offers multiple resources and benefits that are available in person, online, or through the mail. Finally, the Military (or Veterans) Crisis Line, 1–800–273–8255 (TALK), Press #1, www.militarycrisisline.net, or text to 838255 is available 24/7 to all servicemembers and their families. It is a joint venture between the Department of Defense and the Department of Veterans Affairs' call center, which is associated with Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration's National Suicide Prevention Lifeline. Resources include an online "Veteran's Chat" capability and the call center's trained personnel provide crisis intervention for those struggling with suicidal thoughts or family members seeking support for a Veteran.

Senator DONNELLY. Mr. Estevez, we have a case with our Indiana National Guard where they were working alongside a DOD contractor in Iraq in 2003 and were exposed to sodium dichromate. These are our neighbors. These are our friends. These are men and women working at the local tire store who were now over in Iraq at that time serving our country. The contractor they were working with had an indemnification provision. The question I have is, what are your views of these indemnification contract provisions used by DOD and what protection do our servicemembers have when those are in place?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Senator, I am not familiar with the case, of course, but I would be more than happy to look into it. With regard to indemnification, of course, it depends on where you were operating and what backup the Department puts in. We are asking people to take risks when we put them out on the battlefield regardless of whether they are operating on a protected area of that battlefield. But I would be happy to look into that issue, sir.

Senator DONNELLY. Part of the risk should not be that when they are working next to a contractor. It was not the risk of insurgents. It was the risk of sodium dichromate. We want to try to make sure that when we tell our young men and women and take them from the community colleges and from working at the accounting firm, that they can expect to be safe—obviously, as much as possible in the situation that they are placed in.

[The information referred to follows:]

I understand that the indemnification of contractors against unusually hazardous risks is limited. Only the Secretary of Defense, the Under Secretary of Defense (Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics), and the Secretaries of the Military Departments can approve such indemnification, and a decision to approve indemnification is made based on the unique facts of the particular case.

I understand that contractor indemnification under Public Law 85–804 does not apply to servicemembers. Should I be confirmed, I will undertake to familiarize myself further in this area.

Senator DONNELLY. Mr. Vollrath, we are facing sequestration. It was noted that we lost more men and women to suicide in the last year than were killed in Afghanistan. The challenges that we face with sequestration are great. But one of the things I would ask you in this position is to continue with the financial challenges we are facing to continue to see how can you squeeze every dollar out to try to make sure that we continue to make progress on this front.

I know General Chirelli was extraordinarily focused on this effort. It is going to take tremendous creativity in the years ahead. But I would ask, along with the other areas that my colleague, Senator Gillibrand, was talking about, to please keep a focus like a laser on how can we end this scourge.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, you have my commitment, upon confirmation, that we will continue to keep a full court press to overcome what clearly is a tragic situation.

Senator DONNELLY. Mr. Estevez, we are, obviously, having troops come home now, and as we do, we are in the situation where we have more contractors in Afghanistan now than troops. So what are the expectations of contractor numbers as we move forward over the next year or 2?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Right now, we have about 110,000 contractors in Afghanistan. A little more than a third, about 40 percent, are actually Afghans. Of course, they will stay in Afghanistan. We are actively drawing down that number. In instances, as we draw down combat forces, there will actually be more contractors because they help close down bases rather than have our military do that. We want the combat power there. But we have an active cell closing down contracts and bringing those contractors back.

Senator DONNELLY. What do you see as our footprint contractor-wise a year from now?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. It will be about one and a half higher, maybe two higher as we draw down. There is going to be a little higher spike as we draw down.

Senator DONNELLY. Than it is right now?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. No. It will be about the same ratio. Right now it is approximately 68,000 troops to 110,000 contractors. I expect that to remain over the next——

Senator DONNELLY. The ratio of troops to contractors will remain in the same neighborhood.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes.

Senator DONNELLY. Mr. Estevez, in an environment where countries like China are using cyber attacks to engage in theft of intellectual property across the board almost, what steps will you take to enhance DOD's collaboration with the defense industry to protect U.S. taxpayer-funded intellectual property? I was with one of our shipbuilding organizations the other day and they said they are subject to cyber attacks every single day for the technology they have. What do we do working forward on that?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Senator, cyber is not exactly my area. However, I share the concern. In fact, Secretary Kendall has asked me to lead a task force looking at exfiltration of data, not necessarily classified data but intellectual property, things that we care about, working with the industry to do exactly what you are asking about. It is a very serious problem for us and for our industrial partners.

Senator DONNELLY. Gentlemen, thank you very much for your time.

Mr. Chairman, thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Before I call on Senator Ayotte, let me just remind you, Secretary Estevez, we have a new law on cyber incidents involving defense contractors. It was in our defense authorization bill. They must report those incidents to us. We insist that they do that, they comply with the law, but we also want to do that in the most cooperative and joint way we possibly can. We are on the same side of that issue, but there is now a law in place on defense contractors, now not on utilities and not on electric kind of utility issues and so forth, but on defense contractors there is. We would expect that you would remind them of that and fully implement that law.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Absolutely, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank our witnesses for being here and your willingness to serve our country.

I ask, first of all, Mr. Fanning about the provisions that require the Air Force to produce a statement of DOD's budgetary resources by September 30, 2014, so that the Department can be audit-ready. Are you committed to doing that?

Mr. FANNING. I am, Senator, yes.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay, good. I wanted to be clear because the questions you were asked in the written questions made it seem like it was a goal. It is now the law as passed by the 2013 defense authorization, and so this is a very important issue. I think that it is an important issue as we look at the fiscal challenges facing the country and also, in particular, the Department of Defense so that we can have the audit to have good financial information to make good decisions. So I appreciate your commitment to that important issue.

I wanted to ask Assistant Secretary Estevez about contracting, in particular, a concern that I have had. I had the privilege of visiting Afghanistan in January and meeting with Major General Longo and talking with him about contracting in Afghanistan. Previously I had worked with Senator Brown to introduce the "no contracting with the enemy" language that allowed us to cut off funds that were going to our enemies in Afghanistan. In fact, I think the Wartime Contracting Commission found that as much as $60 billion of U.S. Government contracting funds had either been wasted or misspent, if you combined Iraq and Afghanistan.

One of the things Major General Longo said to me when I was in Afghanistan is we need additional tools to be able to make this legislation even more effective. It struck me also that this is legislation and tools that would allow DOD, when they are in contingency circumstances—should be able to cut off funds to enemies or to those who are cooperating against us.

I plan to work with Senator Blumenthal to introduce legislation to give you additional tools to cut off funds to our enemies and to cut off funds to those we are worried about going to corruption, other means that we would not want taxpayer dollars going. I think this is an authority that should be expanded beyond Afghanistan, and I want to get your thoughts on that.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I appreciate that, Senator Ayotte. First of all, I want to commend Major General Longo. I worked very closely with him and Task Force 2010 and what they are doing there.

We would love to work with you on expanding those capabilities and tools. We do want to make sure that we have due diligence for our contractors when we do that. Obviously, the authorities under A–41 use some extraordinary capabilities, using classified information, for example, to not contract with the enemy, and we want to make sure that we do not contract with the enemy worldwide. I would be happy to work with you on expanding that.

Senator AYOTTE. I appreciate it. Actually one of the problems that Major General Longo described to us was the fact that right now the way A–41 is working, we are only looking at unclassified information, and in fact that we need to actually come up with a smarter way because you may have classified information that tells you someone is an enemy. But if we are only relying on unclassified, we are actually not cutting off the full measure of people who are contracting with the enemy.

I look forward to working with you on this. This is a way we can make sure that taxpayer dollars do not go in the wrong hands.

I also wanted to ask Mr. Vollrath, you had said a statement about sequestration. I believe that Senator Inhofe had asked you a question about it, about the civilian impact as a result of sequestration. You said that it would help to move the money around but it does not solve, as I understood what you were saying, the full problem.

Can you, everyone on this panel, help me understand? Even if we give you the authority to move the money around, does it solve the impact of what the Department of Defense is going to undergo in terms of sequestration? I would particularly ask with regard to our readiness.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, the way sequestration is currently configured, the cuts have to go basically equitably across all of the programs. When we are faced with a $45 billion to $46 billion reduction to take in 6 or at most 7 months——

Senator AYOTTE. As I understand it, the Office of Management and Budget has estimated that equates to about 13 percent over the 2013 period.

Mr. VOLLRATH. I will accept that, certainly. I have not taken the time to focus on that. I have been focused on the impact on the personnel and the resultant impact, as you correctly point out, on readiness because when you furlough, of that $46 billion—$45 billion reduction, you have to take it somewhere. As I mentioned earlier, we are trying, as best as possible, to not take it out on the backs of the workforce. So furloughing for up to 22 days, that is only about $5 billion of that $45 billion. There is a lot more that needs to be done.

When you take that kind of reduction, particularly in the civilian workforce, of what amounts to about a 9 percent or for them a 20 percent reduction in their pay and furlough 1 day per week—that is basically what that amounts to—there will be an impact on readiness. You cannot get the same amount of work done that you would normally get done in 10 days in the equivalent of 8. It does not work that way unless you want to ask the civilian workforce to do things that they ought not to do. So there is going to be an impact at the depot maintenance level. There will be an impact in the service level no matter how you slice it.

Now, could it be less? I think that is the point. It might be possible that it could be less. But I do not believe under any circumstances that we could not take some of that impact in our workforce.

Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Estevez, just to put the question to you, so if we give you—right now it is an across-the-board cut. Right? You have to cut everything. If we give you the flexibility—we have been hearing from the Department of Defense. This is the fundamental question. We have been hearing from them. Secretary Panetta, it is going to undermine our national security for generations. I had Chairman Dempsey here less than a week ago or roughly a week ago and he told me on a scale of 1 to 10, it was a 10 in terms of our national security.

So as someone who wants to resolve this and respects that the chairman wants to resolve this in a way that is consistent with protecting our country, if we gave you all the flexibility in the world—let us say we did not do it across the board—where does that leave you there? I think that is an important question to be answered.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Thank you, Senator Ayotte. A couple things.

One, it is more than just sequestration. It is the Continuing Resolution that is causing much of the problem. Passing an appropriation bill or at least giving us the flexibilities in a CR is critical for us going forward. Number one.

Sequestration, the $46 billion, I do not think at this point in the year additional flexibilities there give us what we need. We will get some of that within the CR, but at this point in the year to find that $46 billion, I believe as Dr. Carter said when he was up here 2 weeks ago, we are going to be looking everywhere we can to get that money.

Senator AYOTTE. I mean, we have legislation pending that deals with flexibility, and so what I want to understand is if we pass this legislation, does that stop the impact on our national security or does that mitigate it so it is a manageable amount of impact on our national security? That is certainly what I would appreciate your advice on.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. It will not stop it. Taking $46 billion again at this point in the year is not going to stop the impact on our national security. I think giving us the flexibilities or passing a 2013 budget for the Department of Defense and making sequestration go away for 2013 is the only way to really stop the impact on our national security. Obviously, past that, flexibilities may but we will be taking money from everything. So there is going to be a devastating impact to our security.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Congratulations on your nominations. It is good to be with each of you today.

Just a few questions, and I would like to start with Mr. Vollrath, please, on some personnel issues that I am interested in the thought process now within DOD, particularly about use of the Guard and Reserve.

I had an interesting experience last week visiting a Guard unit in Stanton, VA, called the Stonewall Brigade that is quite large. I was interested when I found out that their first operations as a brigade were 20 years before the French and Indian wars. They go back to 1740 and they can trace the lineage back that far.

In my discussions with these guardsmen and women and many during the time I was Governor and was Commander of the Virginia Guard, it really struck me that the Guard and Reserve are quite different than they were 10 or 15 years ago, that the level of training, the level of operational experience has dramatically increased. That made me start to think about forward-focused personnel planning and how much do we do with the Active Force, and there is a training cost to that. How much do we do in terms of putting in training monies to keep the Guard at this new kind of elevated level of readiness? I am just kind of interested in your discussion about that looking at personnel and the kind of overall manpower needs of our defense, how the Guard and Reserve are factoring in, in a new way, and how you factor that in going forward as you evaluate manpower needs.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Senator, the Guard and Reserve are critical to our projected readiness. The Guard and Reserve, as you know having served as Governor, are now an operational force. They are no longer that last resort, that strategic reserve if you will. They are fundamental to how we fight. So on a go-forward basis, it is critical that they be maintained and sustained for our long-term readiness.

Having said that, with their experience as an operational force, it is also key to readiness that we retain as many people that we can possibly in the Reserves that have that experience because once we lose that experience, then we significantly have to start ramping up retraining.

So right now, I would tell you that is a national treasure and they are key to our national defense right now, far from being that old strategic reserve. To the Reserve and Guard, give them credit. They have stepped up to the plate.

Senator KAINE. Going forward, there is no intent from a planning perspective that the Guard would revert back to just a pure Reserve function, but there is a thought that going forward we would make the investments in Guard and Reserve to keep them at an operational level of training and readiness?

Mr. VOLLRATH. That appears to be a prudent way forward. We have the Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) coming up in this next year, and in that process, we will sort out exactly how we are going to move forward. But I do not know how we do it without.

Senator KAINE. Just thinking forward, if as part of that QDR, the decision is made we want to keep Guard at sort of an operations and not just a pure reserve asset and we want to put the training in to do that, then that would also affect other decisions about manpower levels in the Active branches because to the extent that Guard is at operational level, those numbers can provide some of the function so that it does factor into manpower planning in the Service branches as well.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Absolutely, Senator. It has to be a balanced approach to it. As we shift from contingency operations to the more full-spectrum on a go-forward basis, then we are going to have to sort out very finitely exactly how that force is going to be structured to do that. That is different from the last 10 years, as you can appreciate.

Senator KAINE. In making sure that the Guard maintains that desired state going forward, that makes things like retention and the training of guardsmen and reservists—ongoing training—absolutely critical.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Absolutely, Senator.

Senator KAINE. In my discussions with the Stonewall Brigade—and I was asking them about sequester and some of these budgetary challenges—the one thing that they were most concerned about was effects on training, the backing up of assigned training slots at various training facilities where they would go, oh, we are going to go next year, not this year or we are going to do it at home rather than go to the slot. The commander said if I have to put people into an operational capacity, I want them to be 100 percent ready and not 85 percent ready. The potential degradation in training was what was cited as their greatest concern right now.

But anyway, it is helpful to hear your thoughts on that.

Let me ask Secretary Estevez, and forgive me if this has been asked. But in the acquisition space, I would assume that the combination of sequester and CR, anything short of appropriations bills and normal budgets, imposes some inefficiencies in the contracting process because you can find more efficiencies, the greater their predictability, volume, multi-unit purchases, et cetera. I would suspect that some of the short-term savings we might be trying to obtain through something like sequester actually may work to our long-term disadvantage even on the savings side.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. That is true, Senator.

Senator KAINE. Could you give some examples of that?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. The acquisition system is kind of seized up right now. In fact, the Department as a whole is seized up in all kinds of contracts. I will speak just for what we are doing inside the Office of the Secretary of Defense. We are not letting any contracts. That means contracts to service—the SAIC types of the world or RAND or whoever. So they cannot plan their line.

Now, if we go to the industrial side—and you know what is going on in the shipyards as we cancel availabilities—when we start taking out of budget planned buys for things like the Joint Strike Fighter, that is going to increase the unit cost of those airplanes because you are not buying as many as you planned. That is not just something like the Joint Strike Fighter that is in early production. That is things like Apaches and Chinooks and anything that we are buying as we start to take those dollars out. That does not mean that that decreases the need because we still need those airplanes. So we are going to pay more to get the same plane that we could have if we had moved along through our budget and dropped whatever that capability is. It is an inefficient way of doing business. Our industrial base cannot plan for what they are doing. They are also making their own assessments. It is not a good way.

Senator KAINE. Let me just follow up with one question to follow up on Senator Ayotte's question about potential flexibility because you raised a point that I do not think everyone completely understands. Being already pretty far into a fiscal year, you at DOD have been planning around this kind of ugly, non-strategic, across-the-board cuts. Everybody would agree that is not the way we should do it, but nevertheless you have been planning around how to do it, and we are pretty far into the fiscal year.

If suddenly the rule were to change and you do not have to do that, you have the flexibility now and then you would get some time to come up with flexible cuts and now we are farther into the fiscal year, I gather that there would be some effort that those cuts would have to be presented from the White House back to Congress and have Congress look at them and decide, and now we are farther into a fiscal year. Time is of the essence in terms of managing cuts of this size by this time in the fiscal year. Is it not?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Absolutely, Senator. Of course, there are differences within the investment accounts where we are buying things that Congress has asked us to buy or that we asked Congress to help us authorize that you authorized in NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013. In the operation and maintenance accounts, where we have to pay for the war, we are going to pay for what our forces need forward. It is just a complete freeze-up because you have to push money through those things. So giving us this flexibility, while we take the time to replan, essentially means you go along with the plan that you have.

Senator KAINE. Yes.

No further questions. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Kaine.

Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me begin by thanking the chairman for having a hearing on March 13 concerning sexual assault in the military, and I expect and trust that all of you will cooperate and aid us in this very important hearing and the effort to further protect against this truly predatory, criminal action that is all too common still, even after some good faith efforts by the military to stop it.

I want to also begin by thanking each of you and your families for your service to our Nation and for what you have done in the past and what you will do in the future and hope that this committee and I personally can be of assistance to you.

On the issue of contracting with the enemy, I know Senator Ayotte has raised the issue already. She and I have been working on revisions to the current prohibitions to impose tougher penalties and also to streamline the potential investigation and prosecution and extend them to Departments other than Defense. So I appreciate your cooperation in that effort as well.

I want to begin on the Joint Strike Fighter, if I may. I know Senator McCain has raised it with you, and all of us are fully and passionately in favor of a better procurement process. I hope that we can work together on improving that process so as to cut costs and streamline the procurement and acquisition process.

But as to the Joint Strike Fighter, the F–35, do you agree with Lieutenant General Bogdan's remarks on that issue?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I cannot speak for Lieutenant General Bogdan who has the daily relationship with Lockheed and Pratt on that contract. I can appreciate his frustration, and any PEO's frustration is that we are trying to get the best value, best buy for our dollar, and best capability for the taxpayer. That puts some tension in the relationship with any contractor. We do expect our contractors and want to hold them accountable and will hold them accountable to produce.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I agree completely that they should be held answerable and accountable for the quality of the product and costs and so forth.

There is no question in your mind that this Nation is committed to the F–35. Is there?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. No, there is not.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. That the procurement and acquisition of that plane really require us to remain, as much as possible, on schedule in buying the airplane because that is the best way to reduce the cost per unit?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. That is correct, Senator, though we would also say we have flattened our buys as we work through some of the issues that, to most extents, have been resolved, but we do have some testing. A little less than 50 percent of the testing is completed. There are some issues that need to be worked, and before we ramp up production, we want to ensure that we are getting the plane that we are paying for.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. The effort to test and improve the airplane really requires a close working relationship. Does it not?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. It does, Senator. It is not just at the General Bogdan PEO level. We are working that up to the Secretary level inside the Department.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. My hope is that Lieutenant General Bogdan's remarks do not reflect the general attitude in terms of what that relationship has been or should be because I know that American taxpayers would be disappointed if they believed that somehow these contractors were in some way being disingenuous, as I think those remarks imply. I am not sure that the Department of Defense would agree with Lieutenant General Bogdan in that implication.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Again, I am not going to try to speak for General Bogdan. He and I have not talked about the remarks as reported in the newspaper. He is traveling in the world at the moment.

We need and we strive to have and I believe we do have a strong relationship with the defense industrial base to include Lockheed and Pratt.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. My own view, for what it is worth, is that that relationship perhaps could be improved, and I hope that you will endeavor to improve it, but that these remarks do not reflect even the relationship as it stands now because I think there are very complex and challenging issues related to the development of this new aircraft that we have a common interest in solving without the kind of tension that could be exacerbated by these remarks. I have great respect for Lieutenant General Bogdan. I am not being critical of him. As you say, these remarks were reported in the newspaper, but I know that Pratt & Whitney is fully committed to solving the technical issues and to providing the best value to the Department of Defense and the American taxpayer.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I appreciate that, and frankly I believe that Lieutenant General Bogdan would agree with you on that.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

If I may ask Mr. Fanning. I know that the issue of suicide in the military has been raised and I know that the Department of Defense is endeavoring to address these issues very responsibly.

My understanding is that civilian insurance companies have the capability to look at lifestyle indicators, for lack of a better word, facts about a person's lifestyle that provide some indication about the possible tendency towards suicide. In light of the very alarming statistics—and I know that "epidemic" is a vastly over-used term in the Nation's capital, but certainly it is an alarming trend—I wonder whether the Air Force has been able to make use of practices in the civilian world by insurance companies to use those indicators to identify people who may be more at risk.

Mr. FANNING. Thank you, Senator.

I think across the Department of Defense, there has been an enterprise perspective or attempt to make use of those indicators. We know, for example, that financial issues, relationship issues, legal issues have a higher correlation to suicide than even deployment schedules. I think the answer is yes, and if confirmed into the Air Force, taking care of the men and women who volunteered to serve would be the highest priority I would think in my job and that would be one of the things I would look at much more closely.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I just want to say—and I thank you for that comment—my own view is that our people are our greatest asset. As magnificent and amazing as the Joint Strike Fighter is and all of our hardware, all of our weapons systems, the people are still our greatest asset, and the more we can do to attract and retain the very best by showing that we not only care about them but we are willing to do something about it is, I think, one of the great challenges ahead. It is one of the reasons that I voted for Senator Hagel to be our next Secretary of Defense because I think he is truly committed and passionate about men and women in uniform and about our veterans. I would just urge—you do not need my urging, but offer my help in any way possible in any of those personnel issues that you may face in your next job, assuming you will be confirmed as I expect you will be.

Thank you, gentlemen, for your service to the Nation.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman. That concludes my questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Blumenthal.

Senator King.

Senator KING. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

A few quick questions to each of you, some fairly specific, and I will be submitting some questions for the record, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. That will be fine.

Senator KING. Mr. Fanning, we were disappointed and somewhat surprised when Bangor, ME, was not selected as even a potential base for the KC–46. What do you see for the future of refueling? Is the KC–135 fleet a part of the future? My concern is, obviously, that if the KC–46 is going to be the future of refueling, I wonder about the future of the 101st wing in Bangor. Can you talk to me about that?

Mr. FANNING. Not having been confirmed yet, Senator, I have not been a part of those deliberations or the process by which the Air Force decides its basing for the new tankers. But if confirmed, just the timing of these announcements would make it a first priority for me, and I would get back with you and your staff to provide you more information on that.

Senator KING. I hope you will because the 101st has done a spectacular job over the last 10 or 15 years, given the demands. I would hope that would be part of the future. Okay. There will be some other questions for the record.

Mr. Estevez, on procurement, one of the real problems that we are facing right now with the Continuing Resolution and the sequester is the loss of multi-year procurement contracts. It is bad for the taxpayers because you lose the benefit of multi-year buys, and it is also terrible for the industrial base. Will you work with us on these? In the authorization bill, we have a multi-year procurement, for example, to take just—it pops into my head, the 10-year DDG–51 procurement. How do you see this as we get through this budget situation?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I would agree with you.

Senator KING. That was the right answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. ESTEVEZ. We have asked for those authorities to proceed with those multi-years.

Now, if there is no money, that presents a problem for any procurement, to tell you the truth, because we will have to look at what is available in those accounts. But we have asked for in our appropriation bill—and hopefully we will get one—authority to do those multi-years.

Senator KING. As I understand, the Appropriations Committee bill that is ready to go has the multi-year procurement in it. Is that your understanding? Out of the committee?
